The CBS Evening News (5/3, story 9, 2:20, Schieffer) reported on the efforts of Kelsie Buckley, a young girl "who has been raising money for Mississippi libraries destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. Her story caught the eye of someone who has a special place in her heart for books, a former librarian named Laura Bush." CBS (Hartman) added, "Mrs. Bush was in Biloxi to give out the first grants from her Laura Bush Foundation, money that will help restock school libraries lost to Katrina, but she was also here to meet Kelsie." Laura Bush: "Thank you, Kelsie, for your very hard work." Hartman: "Mrs. Bush first learned of Kelsie the same way you did. She saw our story about how this 11-year-old girl was raising money to rebuild libraries even though she's legally blind and lost her home too. … You know, she's here so I don't want you to say too many nice things about her, but there must have been something in there that grabbed you, that touched you. What was it about her? You see lots of stories on the news." Laura Bush: "Well, of course, it was because she loved books, and she wanted schools to have books and libraries to have books and that's what I liked too when I was Kelsie's age that was my favorite thing to do."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Says US Drawdown Contingent On Seating Of Iraqi Ministers. The AP (5/4, Sidoti) reports Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday "he does not expect U.S. commanders to make a recommendation for withdrawing forces from Iraq until after the country appoints ministers of its fledgling government, perhaps by the end of May." Rumsfeld said Gen. George Casey, "the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad have not yet been able to begin discussions with Iraqi defense and interior ministers 'about the conditions on the ground and the responsibility being passed over to the Iraqis.'" But after the Iraqi government is installed, Rumsfeld said, "I do expect that, after that happens, they will be having those discussions and that, as we pass over more responsibility, we ought to be able to reduce our forces."

Retired General Calls For Immediate Withdrawal From Iraq. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (5/4), retired Lt. Gen. William Odom says, "Only with a rapid withdrawal from Iraq will Washington regain diplomatic and military mobility. Tied down like Gulliver in the sands of Mesopotamia, we simply cannot attract the diplomatic and military cooperation necessary to win the real battle against terror. In fact, getting out now may be our only chance to set things right in Iraq. For starters, if we withdraw, European politicians would be more likely to cooperate with us in a strategy for stabilizing the greater Middle East. Following a withdrawal, all the countries bordering Iraq would likely respond favorably to an offer to help stabilize the situation. The most important of these would be Iran."

Broder Praises Biden Partition Plan For Iraq. In his Washington Post column (5/4, A25), David Broder praised Sen. Joseph Biden's suggestion for Iraq: "This week, after his sixth trip to the war zone, he said that the threat of sectarian violence -- an incipient civil war between Shiites and Sunnis -- has become so great that the United States must redefine its political goals in Iraq. Instead of betting everything on the creation of a unified government in Baghdad, Biden said, we should encourage the development of separate but linked regional authorities in northern Iraq for the Kurds, in southern Iraq for the Shiites and in central Iraq for the Sunnis." Biden would "retain control of defense, foreign policy and oil resources for the central government now on the way to formation, but he would let the regional governments largely run their own affairs. This is, he told me, not a call for partition. It is a recognition of what he considers a reality -- that the component parts of Iraqi society need 'breathing space' to adjust their relations."

Herbert Notes US Death Toll In Iraq Has Passed 2,400. In his New York Times column (5/4), Bob Herbert says, "Like a disease for which there is no vaccine and no cure, the war in Iraq drags on. American deaths have now passed 2,400. Tens of thousands of Iraqi men, women and children have died. The suffering continues to spread like a fire sprayed with gasoline."

Suicide Bomber Kills Eighteen In Fallujah. The Los Angeles Times (5/4, Daragahi) reports a suicide bomber "wearing an explosives-laden belt set off a blast this morning amid a crowd of aspiring police recruits, killing 18 Iraqis and injuring 20 in the restive Sunni city of Fallouja, police and hospital officials said." Iraqi police "in the capital also reported a sudden increase in death squad killings, with at least 34 bodies of men bearing marks of torture and felled by single bullet-wounds to the head found in and around the capital since Tuesday morning." Meanwhile, the "ongoing gambit to stem sectarian and ethnic violence by drawing Iraq's disparate ethnic and religious groups into the political arena also continued. In a conference room inside Baghdad's U.S.-protected Green Zone, Iraqi lawmakers convened a second session of parliament, forming an 11-member rules committee and agreeing to put off potentially divisive discussions on the constitution until after a cabinet has been named and approved."

The AP (5/4, Reid) reports Sunni insurgents "boldly attacked fellow Sunni Arabs on Wednesday, the latest in a growing campaign against those who cooperate with the U.S.-backed Iraqi government." A "suicide bomber cloaked in explosives killed two policemen and 13 police recruits gathered in Fallujah, a city surrounded by U.S. Marine checkpoints. In a nearby town, three Sunni soldiers from the U.S.-trained Iraqi army were found slain." Violence "shows little sign of abating. Instead, it has shifted from mainly attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces to carefully targeted murders of Iraqis."

The Washington Post (5/4, A19, Hernandez, Ibrahim) reports a "wave of killings in the capital and a suicide bomber's attack on a group of Iraqi police recruits" in Fallujah "on Wednesday punctuated a day in which Iraq's newly formed parliament put off debating difficult issues and discussed its bylaws." Insurgents have "repeatedly targeted crowds of army and police recruits, particularly in Fallujah and other parts of Anbar province, a vast desert area west of Baghdad that is considered the heartland of the Sunni Arab insurgent movement." Iraqi police "also discovered 37 bodies in several Baghdad neighborhoods, all of them handcuffed, blindfolded and shot dead, said Maj. Gen. Mahmoud al-Waeli, an Interior Ministry official."

Taliban Intensifies Attacks On NATO Troops In Southern Afghanistan. The AP (5/4, Garwood) reports Taliban militants "and their allies have launched an intensified campaign against thousands of NATO troops deploying to southern Afghanistan, where the multinational force is taking over from U.S. soldiers." The "stepped-up attacks" by the "remnants of the ousted Islamic regime" range from "ambushing Afghan police from mountain passes or detonating bombs on lonely highways." Military officials and analysts "said Wednesday the Taliban threat is the No. 1 challenge facing more than 7,000 U.S., Canadian, British and Dutch troops that by September will be fighting under the NATO flag in four southern provinces."

US Commander In Afghanistan Seeks To Strengthen Reach Of Central Government. The Washington Post (5/4, A18, Constable) reports while "the world may be wondering whether U.S.-led troops will ever find Osama bin Laden, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry has his eye on smaller, more immediate tasks." During a "day in remote Laghman province last week," Gen. Eikenberry, "the top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, immersed himself in the daily concerns of local residents: the lack of a market road for farmers, the danger of bomb attacks against schools, the remoteness of the national government in Kabul." Although for "most of the 23,000 U.S. troops stationed in Afghanistan, the main task is still to hunt down, capture or kill anti-government fighters," after "several months of intensified attacks by insurgents, including roadside and suicide bombings, Eikenberry argues that the most effective antidote is to strengthen and protect Afghanistan's weak central government."

House Panel Would Authorize Pentagon To Increase Number Of Ground Troops. The AP (5/4, Sidoti) reports the House Armed Services Committee would permit the Pentagon to "add thousands of ground troops under" the military authorization bill, "reflecting lawmakers' long-standing concerns that U.S. forces must be increased, particularly during wartime." The provision "is part of a massive measure the House Armed Services Committee planned to approve on Wednesday. The bill sets Defense Department policy and spending levels of roughly $510 billion for the military for next year, including $50 billion to cover the first portion of next year's costs for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." The bill "permits the Army to increase the number of active-duty soldiers by 30,000 — or 6 percent beyond what President Bush requested — to a maximum target of 512,400. It also requires the Army to maintain an active-duty force of at least 504,400, roughly 2,000 more soldiers than the current level." Additionally, the "bill allows the Marine Corps to add 5,000 troops — or 3 percent more than Bush sought — to reach a force of 180,000 Marines."

DOJ Probing McNally Testimony At Ryan Trial. The AP (5/4) reports, "A letter sent to U-S Senator Richard Durbin says the Justice Department is investigating a former prosecutor from southern Illinois whose testimony at the trial of former Governor George Ryan angered government lawyers." The AP continues, "Durbin wrote to the Justice Department in March asking whether it was investigating Edward McNally. Durbin received a reply dated April 24th that says allegations against McNally are being reviewed." The AP adds, "McNally appeared as a defense witness for Ryan, his client in private practice years earlier. He testified that at an interview he was at with Ryan in 2001 he told prosecutors an F-B-I agent was taking inadequate notes. He said they stared and said nothing. At Ryan's trial, prosecutors said McNally's account was false. … McNally now works at the Justice Department in Washington."

The Chicago Sun-Times (5/3, Herman) reported, "Federal prosecutor Edward McNally is the target of an ethics investigation by the U.S. Justice Department over his involvement in the defense of former Gov. George Ryan, according to a letter from the department to Sen. Dick Durbin." The Sun-Times notes that McNally could have been sued by Winston & Strawn – the firm representing Ryan – over his partnership in a bankrupt firm before he joined DOJ. "Prosecutors…said McNally could have given testimony favorable to Ryan in exchange for Winston's refraining from suing him. The prosecutors called the situation a 'huge financial conflict of interest.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Experts Support Enron's Bookkeeping. USA Today/AP (5/4, Graczyk) reports that Walter Rush, an accounting expert hired by Enron CEO Jeff Skilling testified Wednesday that "last-minute changes to quarterly earnings reports prosecutors contend were ordered by Enron CEO Jeff Skilling to improve the company's reputation on Wall Street were accurate, and not the result of improper tapping of company reserves." Rush "also disputed the charge Enron executives improperly moved parts of the retail operation into its highly profitable wholesale business unit to hide financial problems." His testimony follows "University of Southern California professor Jerry Arnold, who testified for Enron founder and former CEO Ken Lay."

The Wall Street Journal (5/4, McWilliams) adds that Rush "said if Mr. Skilling had decided to fold a retail-energy unit into another business, the reason didn't matter. Even if it was done to hide losses, as the government contends, Enron didn't have to tell investors there would have been losses." Arnold, who "was chastised by Presiding Judge Sim Lake at one point for declining to answer a question about a reduction in Enron's shareholder equity," also "testified that Mr. Lay didn't have to write down the value of international operations if they weren't soon to be sold or if the company hadn't determined the declines were permanent."

Causey Probably Won't Be Called As A Witness. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports that Enron's chief accounting officer in the years before the company's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy, Richard Causey, "has been brought up repeatedly by both prosecution and defense." However, "it looks as if neither side is likely to call Mr. Causey to the stand." Both "appear to have the same reason for being reluctant: If he took the stand, he would likely say things that are helpful and hurtful to each party."

"Phantom" Stock Becoming More Popular For CEO Compensation. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, A1, Thurm) reports, "Amid the drive to tie executive pay more closely to company results, a little-known and poorly disclosed practice is allowing many executives to receive hundreds of thousands of dollars a year in dividends on performance stock -- shares that they may never earn." The "performance, or 'phantom,' shares are a form of restricted stock paid to an executive only if the company meets certain performance targets," and "the number of executives eligible to receive dividends on unvested shares likely has been rising as performance and restricted shares become more popular." However, "corporate-governance watchdogs and executive-pay consultants say the dividends on performance shares undermine the effort to link pay to performance."

Jabril Circuit Says Internal Reviews Didn't Find Backdating; SEC Will Conduct Probe. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "Jabil Circuit Inc. said two preliminary internal reviews determined that the company didn't backdate stock-options grants." A Jabil "special board committee will conduct its own probe," and it was "contacted Tuesday by the Securities and Exchange Commission" which "is conducting an informal inquiry of the matter" as well as "a broad review of options-grant practices, looking at whether companies backdated their options grants to take advantage of lower exercise prices or timed them ahead of favorable news."

Five Data Mongers Charged With "Pretexting" By The FTC. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Roberts) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission brought its first set of charges against five data sellers accused of 'pretexting' -- acquiring telephone records, credit-card statements or other personal data under false pretenses." This "issue has gained increased national attention over the past year, spurring scrutiny by Congress, the FTC and the wireless industry, and heightening consumer fears that private records were being widely sold." Betsy Broder, assistant director of the FTC's privacy and identity-protection unit, said the FTC wants to "send a message to the industry that selling this kind of information is illegal."

Greenberg Is Starting Over. The Washington Post (5/4, D1, Masters) reports that Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, the ousted chairman of American International Group Inc., "is starting over." He "is building a privately held insurance firm, with an 'emphasis on private,' he said in a recent interview, with a wry nod to the regulatory troubles that led to his current position." While "in Washington…he was used to being treated as a titan of not only American commerce but also of international relations and philanthropy," over "the past few years, Greenberg has seen his ties to power weaken." The article then goes onto detail Greenburg's life.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Kentucky Businessman Pleads Guilty To Bribing Jefferson. The Washington Post (5/4, A1, Lengel) reports Kentucky businessman Vernon L. Jackson "pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to bribing Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) with more than $400,000 in payments, company stock and a share of the profits to promote the Kentucky firm's high-tech business ventures in Africa. … Jefferson denied any wrongdoing in the case yesterday, but his legal problems are steadily mounting and have undercut his party's efforts to portray the Republicans as the party of political corruption." Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said in a statement yesterday, "Vernon Jackson got favorable treatment from a Congressman because he paid for it. Public corruption is not a victimless crime -- all of us lose when people believe public officials can be bought." Likewise, the AP (5/4, Barakat) notes US Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said in a statement, "Those that pay bribes in return for favorable treatment, and public officials who corruptly trade on their office and line their own pockets do so at great risk, because we will pursue these cases relentlessly."

The New York Times (5/4, Shenon) adds, "While court papers have not referred to Representative Jefferson by name, they leave no doubt that the congressman and his family are the focus of the Justice Department's investigation. … In a statement released by his House office, Mr. Jefferson said he was 'surprised and disappointed to learn of Vernon Jackson's guilty plea and his characterization of our relationship.' He added, 'I have never over all the years of my public service accepted payment from anyone for the performance of any act or duty for which I have been elected.'"

The Los Angeles Times (5/4, Vartabedian) reports, "Federal law enforcement officials said Jefferson could be indicted as early as next month, and that others were likely to be snared in the investigation. Federal agents raided Jefferson's home and office in August, reportedly seizing a large amount of cash kept in the freezer."

The AP (5/4, Barakat) reports, "Jackson faces a maximum of 20 years when he is sentenced July 27. The plea agreement calls for a sentencing guideline range not to exceed seven to nine years in prison, but the judge is not bound by that."

AFP (5/4) reports, "In the plea, Jackson said the politician first helped him get his company's equipment on the US Army's list of approved products in 2000. … The politician then told Jackson that he would not help his company, iGate, any longer unless he began making monthly payments of 7,500 dollars to the shell company, according to the Justice Department. … The politician also requested five percent iGate's gross sales over five million dollars, five percent of capital investments obtained with help of the politician, and one million shares in the company, the plea agreement said."

House Republicans Hope Questions About Jefferson Will Hurt Democrats. The Hill (5/4, Allen) reports, "House Republicans portrayed congressional corruption as a bipartisan problem yesterday" after Jackson's guilty plea and they "hope questions about Democrats' conduct will undermine the minority party's claims that the GOP is responsible for a 'culture of corruption' in the Capitol." The NRCC "used the headline 'Culture of Hypocrisy' to link to a story about the plea deal from its website yesterday," but "House Republican leaders took a more subtle approach." Majority Whip Roy Blunt said, "Too many of the Democrats want to try to politicize the problem that members of both parties have been caught up in," while Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis "characterized corruption as a bipartisan problem in the House."

Democrats Will Not Call For Jefferson To Quit, But Most Wish He Would Go. Roll Call (5/4, Bresnahan) reports, "Behind the scenes, Democratic insiders said that everyone from Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi…on down would love to see Jefferson resign from Congress, although they won't make an open declaration about Jefferson because of internal party politics. Among other things, the Democratic leadership does not want to alienate the Congressional Black Caucus." Roll Call notes, "Several CBC members…have donated to a legal defense fund set up by Jefferson in 2005, and African-American politicians have been concerned for years that law enforcement unfairly targets minority lawmakers for official scrutiny. 'There is a lot of sensitivity on the issue of African-American lawmakers being the subject of criminal investigations' by the FBI or other agencies, said an aide to one CBC member."

New Jersey Executives Sentenced To Prison For Illegal Technology Sales To PRC. The Camden Courier-Post (5/2) reported three former executives of New Jersey-based Manten Electronics "who admitted shipping nearly $400,000 of electronics that could be used for military purposes to entities controlled by the Chinese government were sentenced Monday to federal prison terms. A fourth was sentenced to home confinement." President Xu Weibo "was sentenced to 44 months in federal prison." His wife, purchasing agent Xiu Ling Chen, "was sentenced to 18 months in prison," and her brother, vice president Hao Li Chen, "was sentenced to 30 months in prison." Hao Li Chen's wife, controller Kwan Chun Chan, "was sentenced to six months of home confinement as part of a two-year probationary term." Additionally, "they agreed to forfeit the $391,337 in revenue their illegal exports generated." The AP (5/2) noted, "They admitted sending restricted items at the request of at least two Chinese agencies, the 20th and 41st Research Institutes, and lying to U.S. distributors and on documents to conceal the nature of the shipments. … The two Chinese agencies are part of the Ministry of Information Industry and develop military and civilian communications technology."

Ohio City Councilman Charged With Taking Bribes. The Toledo Blade (5/4) reports former Toledo City Councilman Bob McCloskey was charged yesterday "with two counts of bribery in a bill of information filed in U.S. District Court in Cleveland." He "is accused of violating the federal Hobbs Act for accepting two bribes totaling $5,000 from an unnamed Toledo businessman who was cooperating with an FBI sting operation." The Blade adds, "Mr. McCloskey is already scheduled to face trial Tuesday on two counts of bribery in Lucas County Common Pleas Court and is a defendant with the city in a related civil suit." The AP (5/4) notes McCloskey "is accused of accepting bribes totaling $5,000 from a businessman cooperating with the FBI."

Councilman Says McCloskey Offered Him Cash Campaign Contribution. The Toledo Blade (5/4) reports City Councilman George Sarantou said yesterday that two years ago "he was handed an envelope containing what he believed to be money by former Toledo City Councilman Bob McCloskey. … He said he immediately gave the unopened envelope back to Mr. McCloskey, and declined to characterize the incident as a bribe attempt. … The incident is similar to an incident reported by The Blade on Tuesday involving former City Councilman Wade Kapszukiewicz," who "told the FBI last week about a 2002 or 2003 incident involving him and Mr. McCloskey."

Massachusetts Man Gets Probation For Lying To FBI, IRS In Bribery Probe. The AP (5/4) reports, "A Massachusetts man was sentenced to two years probation Wednesday for lying to federal investigators looking into bribery allegations against former (Connecticut) state Sen. Ernest Newton. Federal prosecutors said Jerome Weiner…falsely told FBI and IRS agents in January 2005 that he did not directly supervise Newton and that Newton did not directly report to him." The AP notes that Newton, "who resigned amid the corruption investigation, began serving a five-year prison sentence last month for bribery and other charges."

Virginia Mayor Resigns In Wake Of Corruption Conviction. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/4) reports Lynchburg Mayor Carl B. Hutcherson Jr. "resigned Wednesday, a day after a federal jury convicted him of raiding his church's charity to pay his debts with money donated by the Rev. Jerry Falwell and his son. … He was convicted of fraud, lying to federal and bank officials and obstruction of justice." The AP adds, "Virginia United Methodist Church Bishop Charlene P. Kammerer said in a statement that Hutcherson's position as pastor of Trinity church is 'being reviewed.'" The Lynchburg News & Advance (5/4, Reilly) notes that at yesterday's announcement, "the mood was far different from the first news event Hutcherson held in December, when he said he would serve out his term despite the federal government's intervention in Lynchburg politics.

Chicago Construction Department Clerk Charged With Taking Bribes. The AP (5/4) reports, "An appointment clerk for Chicago's construction department allegedly accepted payoffs to speed up the process of getting building permits -- once taking a bribe placed in a brown bag and handed over in City Hall, federal prosecutors said." Dorothy E. Durham "took three bribes of $200 each in December and January, and one of the payoffs in January was secretly videotaped by an informant working for the FBI, said a criminal complaint filed in federal court Wednesday." The AP notes, "City officials cooperated in the investigation of Durham, said Randall Samborn, spokesman for U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald. Prosecutors also said the charge against Durham was not related to the federal investigation of Chicago's Hired Truck Program."

New Witness Says Former Daley Patronage Chief Ordered Record Deletions. The AP (5/4, Robinson) reports, "Federal prosecutors say a newly discovered witness admits that on orders from Mayor Richard M. Daley's former patronage chief, he deleted a computer index suspected of containing politically sensitive hiring records. The witness, an unnamed city computer operator, claims that patronage chief Robert Sorich and another man joked about throwing a hard drive into Lake Michigan, prosecutors said Tuesday. Prosecutors portrayed the alleged incident as an example of how Sorich and other city officials sought to thwart attempts by federal agents to investigate illegal patronage hiring." The AP notes, "Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, had no comment Wednesday on the newly filed court papers."

Prosecutor Grills Defense Witness At Philadelphia Bribery Trial. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/4, Brennan, 423K) reports, "Briefly yesterday, the theory of the legal defense for two businessmen accused of bribing former City Councilman Rick Mariano hung unchallenged in the courtroom air. And then Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Schwartz went to work on Andrea Wybranski, the office manager at Erie Steel Co.," who testified that "she had seen the company's former bookkeeper take a loan agreement signed by Mariano and other documents from the office in 2003. … Schwartz quickly shook Wybranski with questions about why she had not mentioned the loan agreement when she was interviewed twice last year by FBI Special Agent Ray Manna. 'Were you trying to hide something from Agent Manna?' Schwartz asked. 'No, I have nothing to hide,' Wybranski answered, adding she didn't remember what she had told Manna."

Jury Begins Deliberations As Nevada Bribery Trial. The AP (5/4) reports that the jury began deliberations yesterday on the bribery charges against former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncy. "Their two key accusers, the club owner and another ex-commissioner, have themselves pleaded guilty to bribery and related charges. Still another ex-commissioner, who didn't testify, will be tried in August and has already been convicted in a San Diego corruption case."

Plea Agreement Reached In Long-Running FBI Probe Of Las Vegas Strip Club. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (5/3) reports, "Agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation have been probing the Crazy Horse II nightclub for several years. However, a tentative deal was reached between the club and the government on Wednesday." The FBI has "long suspected possible mafia ties by persons at the Crazy Horse." However, "if the tentative deal holds, the 18 possible defendants would agree to plead to tax violations, but there will be no RICO charges, no organized crime charges, nothing like that. All 18 would potentially be eligible for probation and the government would consider standing mute at the sentencing. Club owner Rick Rizzolo has agreed to pay a fine of five million dollars, will set aside $10 million for customer Kirk Henry who was paralyzed after getting into a beef at the club, and Rizzolo would agree to sell the Crazy Horse within a year."

Judge Upholds Mafia Cops Conviction, But Sees "Sound Basis For Appeal." The New York Times (5/4, Feuer, 1.19M) reports US District Judge Jack B. Weinstein yesterday upheld the convictions of former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. Weinstein said that the government case "was enough — 'just barely' — to convict. 'It was not a strong case,' the judge acknowledged, 'and the government was warned that from day one. There is a sound basis for appeal.'" The New York Post (5/4, Haberman, 624K) notes, "The problem - and what the judge will most likely let an appellate court decide - is whether the pair committed a crime five years before the Sin City drug dealing. If the higher court rules that no such crime occurred, the murder conviction would be scrapped." Newsday (5/4, DeStefano), The New York Daily News (5/4, Marzulli, 729K) and the AP (5/4) also report on Weinstein's ruling and warning that the conviction may well be overturned on appeal.

Former Harris Aides Say Contractor's Deal Was Priority. Knight Ridder distributes an Orlando Sentinel article (5/4, Stratton) that reports, "Senior members of Rep. Katherine Harris' congressional staff say they initially rejected a defense contractor's $10 million appropriation request last year but reversed course after being instructed by Harris to approve it." The Sentinel continues, "Harris insisted that Mitchell Wade's request for funding be given to a defense appropriations subcommittee, despite the request's being late and difficult to understand, according to two former staff members and Harris' former chief political strategist. … 'She said, "It's important to me, so submit it,"' said an ex-staffer who is involved in the process. 'She wanted it in.'" The Sentinel adds, "Wade is the contractor at the center of a congressional bribery scandal that has landed a California lawmaker in prison. … In the weeks before Harris submitted Wade's appropriations request, Wade spent up to $2,800 entertaining Harris at one of Washington's most expensive restaurants. … There, he and Harris discussed the request and Wade - whose company had contributed thousands to her 2004 congressional campaign - offered to have a fundraiser for her 2006 Senate race." The Sentinel notes, "On Monday, a well-known government watchdog group asked the Justice Department to investigate Harris' ties to Wade, the former chief operating officer of the now-defunct MZM Inc. … Common Cause officials said Harris may have violated anti-bribery laws by seeking money for Wade's project 'in exchange for MZM's holding a fundraiser for Rep. Harris.'"

FBI Probing Ties Between Genovese Family, Trash Industry. The AP (5/4, Apuzzo, Christoffersen) reports, "Federal authorities are scrutinizing the reputed boss of the Genovese crime family as part of their investigation into the mob's influence over the trash industry in New York and Connecticut, people close to the case said Wednesday." The AP continues, "The interest focuses on Matthew 'Matty the Horse' Ianniello, 85, who prosecutors have called the acting boss of the New York crime syndicate. … FBI agents searched Ianniello's New York home in recent months, according to one person close to the case. Another person with direct knowledge of the case said agents have been asking questions about Ianniello since executing dozens of search warrants last year." The AP adds, "The federal interest comes amid a developing FBI investigation of the Connecticut trash industry. … Defense attorneys have acknowledged that Danbury trash magnate James Galante, who owns a number of companies named in federal search documents, is a target of the Connecticut racketeering case. But they say Galante is an honest businessman. … Connecticut trash hauler Joseph R. LoStocco admitted in federal court last week that he was part of a so-called 'property rights' scheme, in which companies carved out specific routes, stifling competition and driving up prices."

Alabama County Seeks Restitution In Sewer Bribery Case. The Birmingham News (5/4, Wright) reports, "Jefferson County will seek restitution from a former commissioner and companies found guilty of bribery in the county's $3 billion sewer program." The News continues, "Commissioner Gary White, who oversees environmental services, said the county is working with government officials to recover any money that may be owed to the county by Chris NcNair and contractors convicted of bribery and conspiracy. … 'I've been meeting the county attorney and he is working with the U.S. Justice Department to make sure any of the restitution money that is paid is directed back to the county,' White said at Tuesday's meeting. 'We want to give that to ratepayers and not to the federal government.'" The News adds, "Five businessmen and their three companies were found guilty last month of giving McNair materials and work in exchange for contracts to work on the sewer rehabilitation and expansion program. The businessmen and their companies are Pat Dougherty and Dougherty Engineering & Associates; Roland Pugh Construction Inc. and owners Eddie Yessick and Roland Pugh; Rast Construction Inc. and brothers Bobby and Danny Rast. … White said the county may have to wait to see if companies appeal the verdict to know how much may be owed. 'We'll have to get a dollar amount from the U.S. attorney,' he said. … The county has already collected restitution from a former employee who pleaded guilty to taking a bribe. In August, Larry P. Creel, a former county maintenance supervisor, received probation for taking a $500 bribe from a construction company involving sewer work and paid $500 in restitution to the county, said Creel's attorney, Sheldon Perhacs."

Child Sex Abuse Victim Testifies To Congress About Role Of Internet. ABC World News Tonight (5/3, story 6, 2:20, Vargas) reported, "A congressional committee heard the chilling story from one abused young girl about how the Internet played a crucial role in enabling her abuse." ABC (Quinones) added, "Masha Allen is just 13 years old. But her message to Congress today was powerful, moving." Allen testified about her abuse at the hands of Matthew Mancuso, "a single American man who turned out to be a pedophile." Her "abuse continued for five years with Mancuso taking sexually explicit pictures of Masha and sharing them with other pedophiles." Congress "says Masha's pictures are among as many as 3.5 million photos of child porn floating around in cyberspace. It's a multibillion-dollar enterprise, they say. And they're still trying to figure out what to do about the problem."

The CBS Evening News (5/3, story 3, 3:00, Attkisson) reported, "Mancuso posted so many exploitive pictures on the Internet" that Masha Allen "became famous in the online pedophile subculture, depicted as she grew from little more than a toddler into a young girl in abusive photos." When police "raided Mancuso's house, they rescued Masha and arrested him. Mancuso will likely spend the rest of his life in prison. Masha told Congress because there's no way to remove all the images of her from the Internet, she continues to suffer." Allen: "Because he put my pictures on the Internet, the abuse is still going on." Attkisson: "Why air such unimaginable details? Masha says she wanted Congress to hear her story from her own lips and urged them to pass a law that's been named after her which would strengthen penalties for Internet pedophiles and also for those who download child porn."

Anti-Piracy Law Used For First Time In California Prosecution. The National Law Journal (5/4, Bronstad) reports, "In the first trial of its kind in the United States, a federal jury in Los Angeles recently convicted a 70-year-old retired painter of illegally bringing a camcorder into a movie theater to record 'The Legend of Zorro.'" The Journal continues, 'The jury's decision against Manuel Sandoval was the first brought under the U.S. Family and Entertainment Copyright Act, a year-old law that gives prosecutors the ability to pursue charges against individuals who illegally copy movies or music. USA v. Sandoval, No. 06cr00054 (C.D. Calif.). … FECA, signed into law in April 2005, makes it a crime to upload a copyrighted work onto the Internet, and also makes it a felony, not just a misdemeanor, to copy a movie in a theater using a camcorder." The Journal adds, "Also under FECA, prosecutors do not have a minimum value of copyrighted material in order to pursue a case, said Elena Duarte, chief of the cyber and intellectual property crimes section of the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Central District of California. In the past, prosecutors were limited to bringing only those cases that involved at least $1,000 worth of copyrighted material. … 'FECA enabled us to do away with the stringent requirement as to uploading and using a camcorder,' Duarte said. 'It enables us to have deterrent impact because we can charge smaller-scale activity.' … Since the act was passed, two other individuals have pleaded guilty to similar claims, and several others have been indicted."

NYPD, Federal Agents Bust International Motorcycle Theft Ring. The New York Daily News (5/4, Gendar, 729K) reports, "The NYPD and the feds busted an international motorcycle theft ring that boosted a bike a day and shipped the hot wheels to Budapest for resale, authorities said yesterday. The joint 'Operation Biker Boyz' nabbed 18 of the slick crew that stole 300 to 400 high-performance, high-priced motorcycles a year, most in the city, authorities said. The thieves snatched rides right out of their owners' garages or off the street. … 'They stole for speed,' said Inspector Howard Lawrence of the NYPD auto crime division, which participated in the 11- month probe with Homeland Security, the FBI and the Queens district attorney's office." The New York Post (5/4, 624K) also briefly reports on the bust.

Two Indicted In Florida On Medicare Fraud Charges. The Miami Herald (5/3, Dorschner, 323K) reports, "While Florida legislators are contemplating a proposal to reduce healthcare fraud by more careful licensing of clinics, federal officials have announced that two persons connected with a Miami laboratory and a diagnostic testing facility have been indicted in connection with a Medicare kickback scheme. Armando Jose Figueredo and Angela M. Sainz are charged with conspiracy to pay kickbacks involving a Federal healthcare program and with paying kickbacks involving a Federal healthcare program." The Herald notes, "U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said his South Florida prosecutors have brought 36 new criminal healthcare fraud cases since the fiscal year began Oct. 1."

Five Data Mongers Charged With "Pretexting" By FTC. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Roberts, 2.11M) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission brought its first set of charges against five data sellers accused of 'pretexting' -- acquiring telephone records, credit-card statements or other personal data under false pretenses." This "issue has gained increased national attention over the past year, spurring scrutiny by Congress, the FTC and the wireless industry, and heightening consumer fears that private records were being widely sold." Betsy Broder, assistant director of the FTC's privacy and identity-protection unit, said the FTC wants to "send a message to the industry that selling this kind of information is illegal."

Illinois Businessman Sentenced to 40 Months In Prison For Fraud. The AP (5/1) reported, "A businessman was sentenced to more than three years in federal prison Monday after pleading guilty earlier this year to fraud at a sheep-rendering plant." Jeffrey Wayne Hooker "of Urbana, Ill., was also ordered to pay more than $1 million restitution, according to a release by U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper. … Hooker must report June 2 for a 40-month sentence." Hooker and Jon Walter Miller "faced 132 counts ranging from wire fraud to money laundering involving their management of Strube Packing Co.," which "was the largest employer in Rowena before it closed in September 2004. The U.S. Department of Agriculture shut the plant because of what it said were deceptive and unfair trade practices."

2nd Circuit Upholds Polygraph Tests For Sex Offenders. The AP (5/4, Neumeister) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled that lie detector tests can be used to ensure convicted sex offenders are obeying the rules of their probation and that a ban on Internet use is appropriate for some offenders." The AP continues, 'The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruling pertained to Jeffrey A. Johnson, an aerospace engineer and sophisticated computer user who, the court said, had used the Internet to conduct sexually explicit conversations with children from 1995 to 1997. … Johnson had been accused of luring several children to meetings, having sex with two victims under age 18 and arranging to have sex with a third. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to more than seven years in prison and three years probation." The AP adds, "Johnson challenged polygraph testing during his probation on the grounds that it could deprive him of his Fifth Amendment right to avoid self-incrimination and subject him to testing that is unreliable and not reasonably related to sentencing purposes. … U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy in Albany ruled against Johnson but agreed to install safeguards to the polygraph testing process, including a requirement that questions be limited to information necessary for supervision, case monitoring and treatment. … The appeals court said in its ruling Monday that polygraph testing 'produces an incentive to tell the truth, and thereby advances the sentencing goals.'"

Former Homeland Security Press Aide To Appear In Florida On Sex Charges. The AP (5/4) reports, "A Homeland Security Department press aide has waived extradition on charges of sexually preying on a Polk County detective who was posing on the Internet as a 14-year-old girl, authorities said." The AP continues, "Brian J. Doyle, 55, will be transported from Maryland to Florida to appear Thursday before a circuit judge on 23 felony charges, said Chip Thullberry, spokesman for State Attorney Jerry Hill. Doyle is being held without bond in Maryland. … Doyle, of Silver Spring, Maryland, is accused of having sexually graphic conversations with an undercover Polk County detective posing as a teenage girl. The charges include 16 counts of sending pornographic movie clips to a minor. … Doyle also allegedly provide his government-issued office phone and cell phone numbers, showed off his department ID and may have used his official computer in communicating with the detective, authorities have said. Doyle's security clearance, employee badge and DHS access permissions have been suspended."

Publicity Makes Selecting Muhammad Jury Difficult. The Baltimore Sun (5/4, Siegel) reports, "In a three-day parade of potential jurors," for John Allen Muhammad's trial on six counts of murder in Montgomery County arising from the Washington-area sniper rampage in 2002, "Judge James F. Ryan has found virtually no one unaware of the sniper shootings and few who had not already decided that Muhammad is guilty." However, "when pressed by the judge telling them this is a different case, some potential jurors say they can be impartial." Still, "one of Muhammad's standby defense lawyers says "this makes the possibility of seating an unbiased jury 'slim to none.'"

Despite Possible Bias, Montgomery County Jury Considered Best For Muhammad. The Washington Post (5/4, B3, Rich, Londoño) reports that while this trial "might seem like a textbook example of a case that the defense would want moved to another jurisdiction," Muhammad's public defenders, before he fired them, "never asked that the trial be moved." Lawyers uninvolved in the case said "a jury in Montgomery might be more favorable to the defense than a jury picked elsewhere," as while "another jurisdiction would probably produce jurors who felt less connected to the crimes,…that advantage would not outweigh the risk inherent in drawing a jury in what might be a more conservative county."

DNA Database From All Convictions Gains Support In New York. The New York Times (5/4, Cardwell) reports, "A push to require all convicted criminals in New York to submit their DNA to a central database is gaining crucial support in Albany" and "would make New York the only state to require collecting DNA from everyone convicted of felonies and misdemeanors, including youthful offenders convicted in criminal court." New York Gov. George E. Pataki "pushed for an all-crimes DNA database for years," and while it "has languished in the Democratic-led Assembly," now "key lawmakers…say passage of a bill is quite likely if their concerns are addressed about DNA samples held by local crime labs that have been taken from people who have not been convicted."

Pro Athletes' Community Service Sentences Often Not Typical. USA Today (5/4, McCarthy, Upton) reports, "For non-celebrities, court-ordered community service typically involves collecting roadside trash, digging ditches on road crews or cleaning public parks. But…professional athletes have been allowed to fulfill their criminal sentences before star-struck audiences, signing autographs or making public appearances sometimes arranged by their own teams. USA TODAY examined the cases of 40 pro athletes sentenced to community service from 2001 through early 2006, gleaned from multiple databases," and "in 24 of the 28 cases in which the community service assignment could be determined, it involved activities such as throwing out a ceremonial first pitch at a Major League Baseball game, posing for pictures or attending or coaching at youth sports camps." Only four "served punishments that involved the kind of menial labor typically required of non-celebrity defendants."

DeGette Slams ISP Industry Over Data Retention. CNET News (5/4, Broache, McCullagh) reports, "Congress' leading proponent of forcing Internet service providers to retain records about their users' activities lashed out at the industry on Wednesday, saying such a federal law will be a 'very minor burden' to bear." CNET continues, "Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, said at a House of Representatives hearing that new laws were necessary to thwart child pornographers and other Internet predators. Investigations into illicit behavior have been hampered because data may be routinely deleted in the normal course of business, DeGette and other data retention proponents claim. … 'This created havoc among the Internet service provider community,' DeGette said, referring to her proposed legislation announced last week. 'I am horrified that the provider community is not working with us on this, because it seems to me to be a very simple piece of legislation, and I'm going to continue to fight for it.'" CNET adds, "She added that the committee plans to grill ISP representatives at another hearing that may occur as soon as next week. … That happens to be a bipartisan view. CNET News.com was the first to report last June that the U.S. Justice Department was quietly shopping around the idea of mandatory data retention. In a move that may have led to broader interest among U.S. politicians, the European Parliament in December approved such a requirement for Internet, telephone and voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) providers. … Then, two weeks ago, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a Republican, gave a speech saying that data retention by Internet service providers is an 'issue that must be addressed.' Child pornography investigations have been 'hampered' because data may be routinely deleted, Gonzales warned."

Report Finds Hawaii Youth Prison Still Needs Improvement. The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (5/4, Daranciang) reports, "Disagreement and confusion over whether youthful offenders should be rehabilitated or incarcerated is at the heart of the problems at the Hawaii Youth Correctional Facility, said state Auditor Marion Higa." The Star-Bulletin continues, "Higa released a report yesterday with findings and recommendations echoing those of the U.S. Department of Justice following a 2004 inspection of the Kailua facility. … The Justice Department's investigation and report resulted in a lawsuit and state agreement to improve conditions at the youth prison in three years to avoid federal court oversight. Higa's audit was ordered by state lawmakers at the start of the current legislative session."

The Honolulu Advertiser (5/4, Boylan) reports, "The report, by the office of the state auditor, said the state Office of Youth Services 'has not provided the facility with adequate guidance and support to carry out its mission' and has not 'clearly communicated whether the facility's mission is primarily rehabilitation or secure incarceration.' … The report also took issue with job openings 'critical to the improvement of the facility' being left unfilled and the agency's 'reactive rather than proactive' management."

Starr Takes On Alaska Appeal Over "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" Banner. The AP (5/4) reports, "Kenneth Starr, the former Whitewater special prosecutor, will represent the (Juneau, AK) city school board in appealing a court ruling that favored a high school student who displayed a 'Bong Hits 4 Jesus' banner during an Olympic torch relay." The AP continues, "The school board wants the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the case. In April, an appeals court said school officials violated the student's free speech rights when they suspended him for 10 days. … Starr, who is dean at Pepperdine Law School in Malibu, Calif., has agreed to take the case for free, said Phyllis Carlson, president of the school board. … 'Federal law requires us to maintain a consistent message that use of drugs like marijuana is harmful and illegal. Yet, when we try to enforce our policies, our administrators are sued and exposed to damage awards,' she said." The AP notes, "Joseph Fredrick was 18 and a high school senior in 2002, when he unfurled his banner during the Winter Olympic torch relay through Juneau, hoping to grab the attention of television cameras. … School district officials said his banner violated the school's anti-drug policies and suspended him despite the fact that he was off campus at the time and did not disrupt school functions."

Support For Roe v. Wade At Lowest Level In Years. In its 'Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/4) reports, "US support for Roe v. Wade is at its lowest level in decades, according to a new Harris poll, with a slim 49% to 47% plurality of U.S. adults now favoring the 1973 Supreme Court decision on abortion. A modest majority would oppose a law that would ban abortions except to save the life of the mother, and a large majority supports a woman's right to an abortion under some circumstances."

Barbour Won't Pardon Civil Rights Advocate. The New York Times (5/4, Liptak) reports that Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour will not grant a posthumous pardon to Clyde Kennard, black man who was falsely imprisoned after trying to desegregate Mississippi. State officials repeatedly rejected Kennard's to Mississippi Southern and "plotted to kill him. They kept him out of college by convicting him of helping to steal $25 of chicken feed based on what the sole witness now says was perjury. The 1960 conviction drew a seven-year prison term, and Mr. Kennard died of cancer in 1963." Barbour's spokesman Pete Smith said, "The governor isn't going to issue a pardon here," adding that "a pardon would be an empty gesture."

Microsoft Unveils Online Ad Auction System. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, By, Delaney) reports, "Microsoft Corp. today plans to show off" adCenter, an "auction system it hopes to use to tap into the gusher of advertising dollars flowing online" and "Microsoft's most ambitious effort yet to catch Google Inc." It "is a critical part of a fundamental shift in strategy as the company tries to combine advertising with its traditional software business," as "the company has come to realize what a risk the advertising model…can pose to its traditional software business." However, adCenter is "a huge bet that demands a new set of skills that Microsoft is learning on the fly" even as "Yahoo Inc. will unveil long-awaited improvements to its auction system, and Google continues to improve and expand its approach."

Intel Seeks Dismissal Of AMD Antitrust Suit. CNET News (5/4, Kawamoto) reports, "Intel filed a motion Wednesday asking a federal court judge to dismiss an antitrust lawsuit brought by its archrival, Advanced Micro Devices." CNET continues, "Intel, in its motion filed in U.S. District Court in Delaware, states that the federal court should not have jurisdiction over AMD's antitrust case since AMD has alleged that its foreign sales, not domestic sales, are what Intel has damaged. … 'Before subjecting Intel to the burden of defending its foreign business practices in a U.S. Court, AMD must meet the burden of establishing that this court has subject matter jurisdiction over AMD's foreign commerce claims,' Intel's brief states." CNET adds, "AMD alleges that Intel violated antitrust laws by offering marketing and pricing programs that called for excluding the use of rival chipmakers."

MarketWatch (5/4, Andrejczak) reports, "Intel, the world's largest chipmaker, claims AMD cannot apply U.S. antitrust laws to alleged harms that supposedly occurred overseas. 'To a large extend, AMD seeks recovery under U.S. antitrust law for lost sales of its foreign-made processors to foreign companies in foreign locations,' Intel's attorneys wrote in court papers." MarketWatch adds, "AMD, Intel's attorneys argue, makes its personal computer chips at a factory in Germany and sells more than 70% of them to customers outside the United States. … Intel contends this falls outside the jurisdiction of U.S. federal courts under the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvement Act. Intel does not seek to dismiss AMD's claims that concern lost sales of PC chips imported to the United States."

Danaher Receives Antitrust Approval For Sybron Dental Purchase. The AP (5/4) reports, "Manufacturing conglomerate Danaher Corp. on Wednesday said it received antitrust approval for its planned $2 billion cash purchase of Sybron Dental Specialties Inc." The AP continues, "Danaher, which makes products ranging from Craftsman tools to Leica microscopes, said U.S. regulators granted early antitrust approval under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. … Danaher's cash offer for the Newport Beach, Calif., maker of dental products such as orthodontics and endodontics is set to expire May 15."

Washington To Appeal Costco Wine Sales Ruling. The Seattle Times (5/4, Ouchi) reports, "The Washington State Liquor Control Board said today it plans to appeal a federal court ruling that fundamentally alters who profits from the sale of wine and beer and how much consumers pay for it." The Times continues, "On April 21, U.S. District Court Judge Marsha Pechman ordered the state to stop enforcing key parts of its system that governs the sale and distribution of wine and beer —ruling that the state's interests do not trump federal law." The Times adds, "The state's decades-old system regulates the sale of wine and beer by creating strict controls, which include artificially inflating prices, requiring beer and wine distributors to sell their products to every retailer at the same price, and banning volume discounts to large retailers. … Costco sued the state Liquor Control Board in February 2004, charging that its regulatory system was anticompetitive and violatedfederal antitrust law. … Pechman agreed with Costco in December, ruling that the system violated federal law." The Times notes, "The aim of the trial, held in late March, was to determine whether the state was shielded by the 21st Amendment despite the violation. The 21st Amendment granted each state broad power to control the sale of alcoholic beverages within its borders."

Warner Rejects EMI Group's Takeover Bid. Bloomberg (5/4) reports, "Warner Music Group Corp., controlled by a group led by Edgar Bronfman Jr., rejected a $4.23 billion takeover offer from EMI Group Plc, the third time the British record company has been rebuffed." Bloomberg continues, "EMI, based in London, offered $28.50 in cash and stock for the U.S. company, 4.4 percent more than the closing price yesterday. New York-based Warner said in a statement today the offer wasn't 'in the best interests of our shareholders.'" Bloomberg adds, "A merger would combine EMI acts including Coldplay and Joss Stone with Warner's James Blunt and Madonna, and would create the second-biggest recorded music company. The companies tried and failed to merge in 2000 after regulators rejected the plan, followed by another EMI attempt in 2003. Antitrust concerns also derailed talks with Bertelsmann AG's BMG music division in 2001."

ENVIRONMENT:

White House Releases Emergency Response Plan For Avian Flu. The White House yesterday officially released its emergency plan for an avian flu pandemic. The story is generating extensive coverage on TV print media. Newspaper stories this morning are critical of the White House plan, charging that it does not provide enough funding or support to state and local governments. For example, USA Today (5/4, A2, Manning, Jackson) calls the report "a good step toward getting the nation ready…health experts say, but it's missing a key element: how to pay for it." Although the plan "cites President Bush's $7.1 billion funding request for preparedness," it "doesn't address how to pay for services that would be needed after a pandemic hits." Irwin Redlener, director of the National Center for Disaster Preparedness at Columbia University in New York City, "says that by placing so much of the preparedness effort on state and local agencies," the federal government has imposed "the mother of all unfunded mandates."

Similarly, the Washington Post (5/4, A3, Brown) says the plan "hinges on sharing authority with global agencies such as the World Health Organization, and, at the opposite end of the spectrum, with governors, mayors and school superintendents." At the same time, the Post says the plan "lays out an ambitious agenda of more than 300 tasks for federal agencies, along with a timetable for completing them." Nevertheless, "many crucial questions about the government's response remain unanswered."

Under the headline "States Welcome Flu Plan But Say They Need Federal Money," the New York Times (5/4, Harris) reports state and local health officials "welcomed" the plan, "but some complained that the Bush administration had failed to provide the money needed to pay for the plan's long list of recommendations." Iowa Senator Tom Harkin, who advocated preparations for a pandemic, said the administration had "been slow in implementing plans and spending money already appropriated." Meanwhile, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton said the plan failed to resolve the issue of leadership. "Under the president's plan," Clinton said, "we still don't know who is accountable within our federal government."

In a Web exclusive, Time (5/3, Allen) reports David Heyman, homeland security program director of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, "praised" the White House plan for placing "a greater emphasis on non-pharmacological interventions" than in previous reports, including Bush's plan last November. But he said "much more needed to be done," including providing more specific guidance to cities and states about what they should do.

The story was covered on all three networks, with NBC also interviewing Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt. ABC World News Tonight (5/3, story 5, 1:40, Vargas) reported, "In its plan, the White House sets out its emergency response and warns of a possible outbreak of panic." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The White House said today that the virus will likely infect wild birds in the US sometime this year." Frances Townsend, White House Homeland Security Adviser: "We are not in the midst of a human pandemic. But we cannot predict when one will happen. This is why it is important for everyone to prepare." Raddatz: "But it is clear the US is not prepared for everything." Buried "deep in the report is this disturbing note: 'Public anxiety may significantly hinder the effectiveness of the response.'" When "asked if the White House was fully prepared for an outbreak, the answer was, 'Well, we're better-prepared than last year.'"

The CBS Evening News (5/3, story 5, 0:40, Schieffer) reported, "The main focus will be screening travelers arriving from affected countries to slow the spread of the disease until vaccines can be developed. And the President is also calling on businesses to take action such as cleaning offices regularly and keeping co-workers three feet apart."

NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 3, 0:40, Williams) reported, "Some of the main points: The government will stockpile anti-viral drugs and vaccine, though actual medical response is left up to the individual states; the Federal Government will also screen travelers for flu symptoms; the borders would not be closed because in their view that wouldn't do any good; but Federal officials will encourage companies to adopt non-punitive sick leave policies so workers will stay home if they are affected."

Leavitt Says Local Communities Will Have Large Burden In Pandemic. NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 4, 1:55, Williams) interviewed Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt. Asked if the mayor of Baltimore was correct to say "in effect it looks like you're moving early to say don't expect the world from the Federal Government, preparing localities to take on a lot of the burden," Leavitt said, "It is the case. Any community, large or small, that would fail to prepare with the expectation that the Federal Government would be able to reach every community at one time in the country, would be sadly disappointed. So we're working very hard to acknowledge that there is a Federal role and we'll play it, but for a prepared nation, we need to have prepared communities."

AP Poll Finds Only One-In-10 Americans Preparing For Outbreak. The AP (5/4, Neergaard) says a recent Associated Press-Ipsos poll found "only one in 10 Americans was doing anything to plan for an outbreak."

Miscommunication Said To Have Caused Erroneous Sago Mine Message. NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 9, 0:50, Williams) reported, "In West Virginia today, a second day of public hearings on that disaster at the Sago Mine, which you will recall left 12 miners dead: Only one survived. Today, the rescue worker that was the first to find the trapped men said he was probably the one responsible for starting that chain of communication to lead the miners family to believe they were found alive." Bill Tucker, assistant mine inspector: "I started screaming for help and saying, 'They're over here, they're over here!'. I don't recall the exact words that I used, but I, I -- and I didn't have a radio. I was just screaming out for help, and I think I said they're alive, and that may have been part of the communication error." Williams: "When that rescuer, Bill Tucker, found the miners, they had been barricaded behind a curtain more than tow miles inside that mine for about 41 hours straight in toxic air. The one survivor, Randall McCoy [sic] later said at least four of their air packs had failed."

NYTimes Says Sago Mine Disaster Should Be Thoroughly Investigated. An editorial in the New York Times (5/4) says that the revelation that miners trapped after Sago Mine explosion were forced to share one another's emergency oxygen because of faulty equipment "is only the latest in a long list of lethal shortfalls by company and government officials responsible for workers' safety." The Times adds, "The Bush administration has presided over the attrition of scores of critical mine regulatory jobs, plus the patronage appointments of mining industry officials to safety agencies. It's no wonder that the victims' families fear the Sago hearings will prove to be merely a means of venting the community's grief and frustration. The disaster should be examined as thoroughly and openly as a plane crash and its lessons promulgated industrywide."

Idaho, Seattle Company Fined For Lake Pollution. The AP (5/4, Geranios) reports, "A Seattle construction company and the Idaho Transportation Department have agreed to pay federal fines totaling $895,000 after part of a road project collapsed into Lake Coeur d'Alene in Idaho, federal agencies said Wednesday." The AP continues, "The fines against Idaho Transportation and Scarsella Brothers Inc. are for violations of the Clean Water Act during expansion of U.S. 95 near Coeur d'Alene, the Justice Department and U.S. Environmental Protection Agency said. … They are the largest fines ever assessed by the EPA's Seattle regional headquarters for storm water issues, the agencies said." The AP adds, 'The fines involve a 6-mile-long project to widen U.S. 95 to four lanes near the lake. … Federal and state regulators have said the bay and creek were swamped with sediment after a 2-million-gallon pond designed to catch muddy runoff from the project failed several times. … Mica Bay homeowners contend the construction created a large tongue of mud that left water only 2 to 3 feet deep in places, killed aquatic life and impeded boats."

Senate Democrats May Hold Kempthorne Nomination Over Gulf Drilling. The AP (5/4, Heilprin) reports Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne's "nomination for interior secretary could run into trouble from Senate Democrats who want to use it as a bargaining chip to stop more oil and gas drilling in the Gulf of Mexico, or at least assure their states get a cut." Before today's hearing in the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Sen. Bill Nelson "said he would try to block Kempthorne unless Republicans back off their plan to open 3.6 million acres of the central Gulf to oil and gas drilling." Nelson said he "would 'keep all my options open' for delaying the nomination." The AP adds Sen. Mary Landrieu "also has threatened to use the maneuver if Kempthorne and the Bush administration are unwilling to let states share in federal proceeds from oil and gas leasing on the outer continental shelf."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico's President Seeks Changes In Drug-Possession Bill. Mexico's drug-possession bill received wide media coverage, with more than 500 news outlets making reference to the story. Previous reports said President Fox was set to sign the bill; however, later reports said he backed off the measure in its current form. For example, the AP (5/4) reports Mexican President Vicente Fox "refused to sign a drug decriminalization bill Wednesday, hours after U.S. officials warned the plan could encourage 'drug tourism.' Fox sent the measure back to Congress for changes, but his office did not mention the U.S. criticism. Fox will ask 'Congress to make the needed corrections to make it absolutely clear in our country, the possession of drugs and their consumption are, and will continue to be, a criminal offense,' according to a statement from the president's office. … Mexico's top police official, Eduardo Medina Mora, acknowledged on Tuesday that the U.S. anti-drug agency has expressed concern about the law."

In a separate story, the AP (5/3, Stevenson) writes, "The U.S. government urged Mexico on Wednesday to rethink a proposed law that would decriminalize possession of small amounts of drugs, after the DEA and officials in U.S. border states expressed concerns about the measure." ABC News, CNN, the New York Times, Dallas Morning News, Houston Chronicle, and Fort Worth Star Telegram are among the news outlets that used a version of the AP story.

The New York Times (5/4, McKinley, Broder) reports, "After intense pressure from the United States, President Vicente Fox has asked Congress to reconsider a law it passed last week that would decriminalize the possession of small amounts of drugs as part of a larger effort to crack down on street-level dealing. … Officials from the State Department and the White House's drug control office met with the Mexican ambassador in Washington Monday and expressed grave reservations about the law, saying it would draw tourists to Mexico who want to take drugs and would lead to more consumption, said Tom Riley."

The Los Angeles Times (5/3, Enriquez, Perry) reports the Bush administration "is refraining from public criticism of Mexico. But in private meetings Monday with Mexican officials in Washington, U.S. officials tried to discourage passage of the law, U.S. Embassy officials said. 'Any country that embarks on policies that encourage drug use will get more drug use and more drug addiction,' said Tom Riley. … 'Many countries, including the U.S. and Mexico, see the drug problem as a trafficking problem,' he said. 'But the real problem isn't trafficking, it's drug use. The costs of drug addiction are staggering.'"

The Chicago Tribune (5/3, Dellios) reports U.S. officials and others said the measure "gave the appearance that Mexico was condoning drug use. Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, met with Mexican officials to express concerns that it could increase trafficking and lure Americans over the border for 'drug tourism.' 'We welcome the idea of Mexico reviewing the legislation to avoid the perception that drug use would be tolerated in Mexico,' said Judith Bryan, the spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City." The Contra Costa Times, Kansas City Star, Myrtle Beach Sun News, Duluth Minnesota News Tribune, and Macon Georgia Telegraph are among the news outlets that published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sties the Chicago Tribune story.

Copley News Service (5/3) writes, "Stung by opposition to a bill that would permit the possession of small quantities of narcotics, a top Mexican senator said yesterday the legislation will be toughened to reassure critics that Mexico is not opening its doors to drug users. … Karen Tandy…was expressing her concerns during a meeting in Mexico City with Public Security Minister Eduardo Medina-Mora."

The San Antonio Express (5/4) wrties from Mexico City, "It seems this nation won't be a haven for small-time drug users after all, as President Vicente Fox said late Wednesday he won't sign a proposed law that would permit 'personal use' quantities of marijuana, cocaine and other illegal narcotics. … The legislation had come under heavy fire from the United States. Drug Enforcement Administration Chief Karen Tandy discussed it personally with Mexican officials here Tuesday."

For About.com (5/3), Robert Longley writes, "The same day Mexico's president Vicente Fox announced he would sign a law allowing the possession of small quantities of drugs including marijuana, cocaine and heroin, the U.S. Government praised Mexico for its efforts toward reducing the amount of those very drugs available for smuggling into the United States. According to drug czar John P. Walters…Mexico, using as many as 35,000 military troops, eradicated about 51,840 acres of opium poppy and 76,175 acres of marijuana during 2005."

The UK's Times Online (5/3) reports the United States "is up in arms over a proposed Mexican law that would decriminalize the possession of small amounts of drugs, including cocaine and heroin." Eduardo Medina Mora "met with Karen Tandy…although he said she had not been convinced about the need for the new law."

On its Web site, the Moderate Voice (5/4) writes, "Officials…expressed grave reservations about the law, saying it would draw tourists to Mexico who want to take drugs and would lead to more consumption, said Tom Riley, a spokesman for the Office of National Drug Control Policy."

Network TV Coverage. NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 6, 2:20, Williams) reported, "We are back now with NBC News 'In Depth' tonight. It is about the outrage in this country over a decision by Mexico to make possession of some illegal drugs legal. And we are talking here about marijuana, heroin, cocaine -- the Mexican government says the whole idea is to do a better job in the war on drugs. As to how that could that could be true, our report tonight from NBC's Peter Alexander." NBC included comment from John Walters who said, "We all know that encouraging people to use drugs is bad for them and bad for every nation that does it." NBC added, "And Walters is not alone. Critics warn if passed this law would send thousands of Americans over the border to experiment with the same illegal drugs this country has vowed to fight."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (5/3, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "We begin with breaking news that every parent of a teen needs to know about. If your son or daughter goes to Mexico, the country was on the verge of making it legal for them to possess marijuana, cocaine, even heroin. Mexico's president, Vicente Fox, made it clear he was going to approve the bill. Tonight it seems he caved to pressure from Washington." The report continued, "We do know that the State Department officials personally called their counterparts in Mexico, the Office of National Drug Control Policy which is the drug czar, works out of the White House, also voiced concerns."

FOX's Hannity and Colmes (5/3, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Vicente Fox refusing to sign a bill that would [de]criminalize the possession of small amounts of drugs. The U.S. has pressured Fox to oppose the bill, which initially he said he would sign."

MSNBC's The Situation with Tucker Carlson (5/3, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Just hours after U.S. officials warned it would encourage drug tourism, Mexican President Vicente Fox said he won't sign it into law. The question is why was he even considering it?"

19 Accused Of Participating In San Francisco-Based Meth, Cocaine Ring. The Bay City News (5/3) reports a federal magistrate in San Francisco has "unsealed a grand jury indictment accusing 19 men of participating in a Bay Area-based methamphetamine and cocaine ring. The 13-count indictment was issued under seal by a federal grand jury on Tuesday. All 19 defendants are accused of a count of conspiring to distribute methamphetamine and cocaine." Bay City News also reports that FBI spokesman LaRae Quy said nine who appeared in court were arrested Wednesday in the Bay Area and other defendants were arrested in Southern California, Sacramento and Hawaii.

The San Francisco Chronicle (5/3, Van Derbeken) reports, "Hundreds of federal agents up and down the state conducted raids [Wednesday] targeting a San Francisco-based methamphetamine trafficking operation that allegedly brought in millions of dollars of the illegal drug from Mexico. … LaRae Quy, spokeswoman for the FBI, confirmed that the FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration had undertaken the joint operation."

Texas Court Employee Accused Of Helping Drug Traffickers Remains Free On Bond. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (5/4) reports a federal court employee "accused of helping drug traffickers must now wear a tracking device of his own after he allegedly violated his conditional release. Federal pretrial services officer Juan M. Cantu, who works with electronic monitoring, appeared in Brownsville…at a Wednesday hearing where he was allowed to remain free on bond but ordered to wear a global positioning system device of his own. Cantu was arrested by FBI agents at the McAllen Federal Courthouse on April 18 on a charge of making a false statement to investigators looking for convicted drug trafficker Esequiel Cortez Sr." The Herald notes that court records indicate Cantu denied knowing how to contact Cortez after DEA agents saw the two together.

IMMIGRATION:

Blacks Said To Be "Increasingly Uneasy" About Immigrant Movement. The New York Times (5/4, Swarns) reports that while "some Hispanic immigrants have compared the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s struggle to their own," declaring a "new civil rights movement to win citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants," many black

"professionals, academics and blue-collar workers feel increasingly uneasy as they watch Hispanics flex their political muscle while assuming the mantle of a seminal black struggle for justice." Some "bristle at the comparison between the civil rights movement and the immigrant demonstrations," arguing that blacks "had endured centuries of enslavement, rapes, lynchings and discrimination." Others worry that low-skilled black workers will be priced out of the market. And some "fear the unfinished business of the civil rights movement will fall to the wayside as America turns its attention to a newly energized Hispanic minority with growing political and economic clout."

In a similar vein, the Washington Times (5/4, Debose) reports some black leaders say "Mexicans and other Hispanic nationals are getting preferential immigration treatment, as the U.S. systematically turns away people from countries with largely African-descended populations, such as Jamaica and the Dominican Republic." They say the US "can't have an honest immigration reform debate without discussing how much people are being paid and why only certain nationalities are allowed to come into the country illegally and work off the books." Still, this does not mean blacks are embracing anti-immigration activists. The Los Angeles Times (5/4, So) reports the Minuteman Project, "the self-proclaimed citizen border patrol that has emerged as a vocal opponent of illegal immigration, arrived in the heart of South Los Angeles Wednesday hoping to recruit blacks to their cause. But instead, they were met by protesters, most of them black, who compared the group to the Ku Klux Klan and urged them to take their campaign elsewhere."

Rasmussen Poll Suggests Monday Demonstrations Failed To Shift Public Opinion. The Washington Times (5/4, Dinan) reports Monday's "Day Without Immigrants" boycott and demonstrations "didn't do much to shift the public debate on immigration in either direction," according to a Rasmussen Reports poll. Before the demonstrations, 67% of Americans "wanted an enforcement-first approach to immigration, and that number dropped a statistically insignificant one percentage point in the poll taken after the marches. Meanwhile, support for allowing illegal aliens a path to citizenship remained steady" at 53%.

Anti-Illegal Immigration Activists Use Variety Of Tactics. The Los Angeles Times (5/4, Riccardi) writes, "In contrast to the coordinated pro-immigration rallies across the country, hundreds of grass-roots activists…are veering in different directions as they try to influence Congress to crack down on illegal immigration. They are picketing Mexican consulates; they're building a barbed wire fence on the border and phoning lawmakers to protest legislation that would allow illegal immigrants to stay in the U.S. They have sponsored anti-illegal immigrant initiatives in Colorado and Phoenix. In recent weeks, they have staged demonstrations in cities in the Midwest and Southwest that have drawn a couple of hundred protesters each."

California Minutemen Leader Calls Vigil Successful. The Washington Times (5/4, Seper) reports California Minutemen leader Tim Donnelly called its just-finished 30-day vigil along the US-Mexico border a success, saying his group "left the area more secure than they found it" by helping to "mend and extend an existing primary U.S. government-built fence along a well-established alien- and drug-smuggling corridor about 75 miles east of San Diego."

Vietnamese Immigrant Now Serves US As ICE Agent. The Washington Post (5/4, A23, Slevin) runs a feature on Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent Hung Nguyen, who "was just 12 when he fled Vietnam aboard an overstuffed motorboat, without his parents. He had no documents, but U.S. authorities smoothed his way to Illinois, where foster parents took him in. He sees his job ferreting out immigration fraud as repayment to the nation that rescued him." Nguyen said, "There has to be a proper way of doing it. You have to have rules and regulations. You can't have open borders. Coming from an immigrant like myself, that sounds ironic."

WPost Defends Spanish-Language National Anthem. In an editorial, the Washington Post (5/4, A24) writes that "two-thirds of Americans don't know all the words" to the National Anthem "in English. Of the one-third who claim they do, only 39 percent…can correctly sing the phrase that follows 'whose broad stripes and bright stars' (answer: 'through the perilous fight'). Written to a British tune that spans multiple octaves, Francis Scott Key's national anthem has always presented a vocal as well as a verbal challenge. Nevertheless, it has inspired patriotic immigrants and native Americans to produce Finnish, German and Yiddish ('O'zog kenstu senh...') translations. … Are Americans really so insecure that they can't bear to hear their anthem sung in Spanish?"

More Commentary. In a New York Times (5/4) op-ed, former Mexican foreign minister Jorge G. Castañeda writes, "There are many excellent reasons to salvage the immigration bill that collapsed two months ago in the Senate. But one of the most overlooked lies not in the protests that have filled streets in Los Angeles and Washington, but in the wave of populism that has swept Latin American cities like Caracas, La Paz, Lima and Mexico City," where anti-US nationalists are taking, or nearing, power. Looking forward to Mexico's upcoming presidential election, Castañeda warns, "It is one thing to have populism in power in the Andes; it is quite another to have it controlling a 2,000-mile border with the United States."

In his Washington Post (5/4, A25) column, Peter Beinart writes, "Last week Senate Republicans passed an amendment diverting $1.9 billion from securing Iraq to securing Arizona." Sen. Judd Gregg said the money "will pay for 'the unmanned vehicles, the cars, the helicopters which are a critical part of our fight in the war on terrorism.' Senate Democrats generally opposed the diversion. But they wholeheartedly agreed that defeating terrorism requires more enforcement along the Rio Grande. … Rarely have the two parties been so united in a belief that is so wrong. Stopping terrorists from coming across America's southern border would be an urgent concern -- if any were actually coming. So far, however, there is little evidence they are. … Sinking billions into enforcement along the southern border may or may not safeguard American culture and American jobs, but it will do precious little to protect American lives."

Immigration Reform Proposal Would Reverse Streamlining Of Appeals. The National Law Journal (5/4, MacLean) reports, "The new immigration reform package pending in the U.S. Senate includes a proposal to kill quietly the controversial streamlining regulations applied to the Board of Immigration Appeals in 2002 by former Attorney General John Ashcroft." The Journal continues, "Streamlining is not the only thing up for change. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales added three immigration appeals judges in April, increasing the number of BIA appeals judges who review the work of 220 immigration judges nationwide from 11 to 14, although that total is still less than the 23 before Ashcroft's cuts. Gonzales also replaced embattled chief immigration judge Michael J. Creppy with a new judge to oversee the system." The Journal adds, "In just 15 pages of the 614-page immigration reform bill, Senator Arlen Specter, R-Pa., calls for adding at least 20 new immigration judges, 50 immigration lawyers and at least 50 new federal prosecutors nationally assigned to immigration cases. The bill would also restore the BIA to 23 appellate judges, essentially repealing the cutbacks made by Ashcroft in 2002. … Streamlining regulations expanded significantly in 2002 to reduce the backlog of 56,000 pending cases. The regulations allowed one appeals judge, rather than the usual panel of three, to decide cases without opinions, often in one-paragraph orders. … When Ashcroft cut the number of BIA judges from 23 to 11, he eliminated many who were considered too pro-immigrant, according to immigration court experts. By March 2003, 38% of the BIA decisions were summary rulings, compared with 9% just one month earlier, according to a Los Angeles Times study at the time. … Federal appellate judges around the country have repeatedly complained about incoherent and biased rulings by immigration judges that are simply passed through the BIA with perfunctory, one-page affirmances. Practitioners have also complained of abusive immigration judges with little or no discipline system at the Executive Office of Immigration Appeals [NLJ, Jan. 30, Feb. 6]."

TAX:

New York Accountant Acquitted Of Tax Charges. Long Island Newsday (5/4, Kessler) reports, "A Bay Shore accountant has been acquitted of income-tax evasion charges after he filed returns for 36 clients claiming that salaries cannot be legally taxed. … But don't get ready to go rushing out to your tax preparer next April. While the tactic initially saved the clients $500,000 in taxes, the Internal Revenue Service has since required them to pay tax on their salaries, according to court records." Newsday continues, "The acquittal Tuesday by a jury in U.S. District Court in Central Islip was the second time in three months that the government has failed to convict Paul Petrino of charges of aiding and abetting false tax filings from 1999 to 2001. His defense was based on arguments from the tax-protester movement, which questions the validity of the federal income tax laws. Petrino prepared the returns in his home office and most of his clients were from Long Island." Newsday adds, "The case was a retrial of the same charges in February that resulted in a hung jury, split 6-6, according to Petrino's attorney, Robert Fink. … The jurors who acquitted Petrino, who faced 61/2 years in prison, were angry that they had to do so, Fink acknowledged after speaking with them yesterday. But he said they accepted his argument that there was 'reasonable doubt' that his client was intentionally committing a crime. … He called the verdict a victory for the average man 'over the overwhelming power of the federal government, the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service.' … While acknowledging that they could not immediately think of a situation in which a criminal case based on tax-protester logic has resulted in an acquittal, officials of the Justice Department and the IRS cautioned yesterday that Petrino's case was unusual and that it would probably have no impact on the average citizen's tax filings."

Attorney Specializes In Tax Defense. Long Island Newsday (5/4, Kessler) reports, "When they hear that someone needs a defense against thorny federal income-tax charges, the name that often pops into the head of fellow defense attorneys and tax specialists is Robert Fink. … 'The hung jury was remarkable, but the acquittal was astonishing,' Noel Cunningham, director of the graduate tax program of the New York University School of Law, said yesterday, upon learning of the outcome of Fink's latest case: Bay Shore accountant Paul Petrino, who was charged with 36 counts of aiding and abetting false tax filings." Newsday continues, "Fink, a partner in the Manhattan firm of Kostelantz and Fink and an adjunct professor at NYU's School of Law, not only won an acquittal on Tuesday, but also got a hung jury in February on Petrino's first trial on the charges in U.S. District Court in Central Islip. … A victory for the defense against the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service in a case based on the logic of the tax-protester movement is almost unheard-of, according to federal officials and defense attorneys. But Petrino's acquittal was only the latest in a series of wins for Fink."

Collection Firm Contracted By IRS Is "Tangled In Legal Controversy." USA Today (5/4, McCoy) reports that Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson, "A private debt-collection firm tapped by the IRS to seek repayment from Americans who owe back taxes," is "tangled in legal controversy, including a bribery scheme involving a collection contract in Texas and a federal investigation of another collection deal in Louisiana." Now "the IRS initiative, set to start this year," is "placed on temporary hold amid a challenge of the IRS selection decision by one of the unsuccessful bidders." This follows a 2006 report to Congress by Nina Olson, the IRS National Taxpayer Advocate, that "warned that private collection firms, operating 'under rules of profit maximization' could 'have less incentive to provide important taxpayer rights training to their employees.'" In fact, the contract "has been viewed as a privatization plum because the winning bidders would be allowed to keep up to 24% of the amounts they collect."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Extension Of Tax Cuts As Lawmakers Near Agreement. The Financial Times (5/4, Yeager) reports, "President George W. Bush, seeking to reverse Republicans' sagging poll ratings, on Wednesday urged Congress to extend many of his popular first-term tax cuts and renew his party's commitment to spending restraint. 'It is important for there to be fiscal discipline in Washington, DC, if we want to keep this economy strong,' Mr Bush said." Bush "appeared likely to prevail on tax cuts, after a meeting at the White House late Tuesday prompted Republican leaders to reach a compromise on the legislation, which has been stalled since last year."

The AP (5/4, Crutsinger) says that "in addition to extending those cuts by two years, the proposal would keep 15 million taxpayers from getting hit this year with a tax aimed at the wealthy. … Republicans on a House-Senate committee negotiating the tax plan agreed late Tuesday on $70 billion in relief." Talks on Wednesday "sought to resolve differences over what breaks should go into a second tax bill expected later this year."

The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Mullins) reports, "Tax lobbyists close to Republicans say that there is little chance that Congress will wrap up the legislation this week. By not reaching a deal yesterday, lawmakers won't be able to approve the bill this week, because the floor schedule in the House is booked for today, and the House is out of session tomorrow." The Journal adds, "To sidestep a procedural hurdle, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa and House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of California have agreed to craft two bills to extend the 15% rates on capital gains and dividends, exempt millions of Americans from the AMT and extend a range of temporary tax breaks for businesses and individuals that expired at the end of 2005."

The Washington Post (5/4, A4, Weisman) reports, "If the deal wins congressional approval, every major tax cut passed in Bush's first term will be set to expire on the same day five years from now. At that moment, politicians would face a choice: Either allow taxes to rise suddenly and sharply on everyone who pays income taxes, is married, has children, holds stocks and bonds, or expects a large inheritance, or impose mounting budget deficits on the government far into the future, according to projections by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office."

Bush Tax Cuts Said To Have Shifted Tax Burden On Wealthy. Stephen Moore, a member of the Wall Street Journal's editorial board, writes in this morning's edition (5/4), "With the House and Senate preparing to vote on extending…Bush's investment tax cuts, it's no surprise the cries against 'tax giveaways to the rich' grow increasingly shrill. Just yesterday Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid charged that the Bush tax plan 'offers next to nothing to average Americans while giving away the store to multi-millionaires' and then fumed that it will 'do much more for ExxonMobil board members than it will do for ExxonMobil customers.' Oh really." Moore adds "new IRS data released last month tell a very different story: In the aftermath of the Bush investment tax cuts, the federal income tax burden has substantially shifted onto the backs of the wealthy. Between 2002 and 2004, tax payments by those with adjusted gross incomes (AGI) of more than $200,000 a year, which is roughly 3% of taxpayers, increased by 19.4% -- more than double the 9.3% increase for all other taxpayers."

Senate Adds More To Spending Bill As Bush Reiterates Veto Threat. President Bush again told Congress he would veto any emergency spending bill that exceeds the $92.2 billion ceiling he has imposed. Fox News' Special Report (5/3, Hume) reported Bush, "who has yet to veto a single bill passed by Congress insists he may do it yet." Fox (Cameron) added, "During a speech to an engineering trade group in Washington, President Bush warned lawmakers working on federal spending and tax legislation that, particularly now with energy prices high, he will not tolerate waste or tax hikes." Bush said, "The Congress needs to hear me loud and clear. If they spend more than $92.2 billion plus pandemic flu emergency funds, I will veto this bill."

But as the New York Times (5/4, Hulse) reports, "The Senate did not seem deterred by the veto threat," agreeing to Sen. Edward Kennedy's request for an additional $289 million "to compensate emergency workers who might be injured by experimental flu vaccines," as well as requests for "an extra $1.6 billion for levees in Louisiana, $30 million for Gulf Coast election assistance and $30 million for forest projects." The Washington Post (5/4, A4, Murray) says senators "keep stuffing new provisions" into the bill, "ignoring President Bush's veto threat." The Washington Times (5/4, Dinan, Fagan) also notes that Bush "has threatened to veto other bills but has never done so, in part, he says, because Congress has met his targets for spending," but adds that the allocations added Wednesday "pushed the price tag of the bill near $109 billion." The Wall Street Journal (5/4, A7, Rogers) also says "senators kept adding more money" despite Bush's threat. The Los Angeles Times (5/4, Reynolds) reports the Senate "is expected to vote on the measure today, setting up a confrontation with President Bush."

Thomas Takes On Appropriators. The Hill (5/4, Bolton) reports House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas "is challenging appropriators to prove their stated desire for parity with other panels by justifying their staff and budget levels." The Hill says the action "is a carefully aimed counterattack by a chairman whose panel would be one of those most affected if earmark reform were broadened beyond appropriations to tax and authorization bills." The House Administration Committee currently oversees the management of every committee except Appropriations," and during "what one participant described as a 'knock-down, drag-out fight' in the House Republican Conference last week," Thomas said appropriators should have to "justify their panel budget" with that committee as well.

As Bush And Legislators Seek Solutions, House Votes To Criminalize Gas "Price Gouging." President Bush and members of Congress discussed gasoline prices yesterday, and Congress voted to criminalize "price gouging." While the gouging vote dominates print coverage, it was only mentioned in passing in television coverage. NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 2, 2:10, Gregory) reported Bush and members of Congress "huddled" at the White House, "looking for a political solution to high gas prices." Bush: "The prices of gasoline should serve as a wake-up call to all of us involved in public office that we have got an energy security problem and a national security problem." Gregory: "In another sign of how nervous congressional Republicans are in this election year, a House panel today pressed Exxon Mobil to disclose details of the $400 million severance package for a former CEO, Lee Raymond.." And Congress is "scrambling to respond to public anger about gas prices. Today, the House passed criminal penalties for energy companies caught price gouging but failed to pass a measure to expand sorely-needed crude oil refining capacity." As the Christian Science Monitor (5/4, Feldmann) writes, "When it comes to gasoline prices, every politician is a populist, especially in an election year. And in the current scramble to ease motorists' pain over high prices, ideology has taken a back seat to the need for immediate results -- or at least the need to be seen trying."

USA Today (5/4, 10A) headlines its report "House Bill Criminalizes Price Gouging," writing that the House voted 389-34 "to impose criminal penalties and fines of up to $150 million on energy companies caught price gouging." The bill "comes at a time when the country is angry over gasoline prices and oil industry profits. The White House has not said whether President Bush supports the bill. He met for more than an hour with a bipartisan group from Congress and said it was important 'to make sure our consumers are treated fairly' by the oil markets." The AP (5/4, Hebert) reports that despite the vote, "lawmakers acknowledged there is no quick and easy fix to higher pump prices."

The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Fialka) writes that while 29 states have already laws against price gouging, "most require a declaration by the governor that a natural disaster or some other serious supply disruption has occurred" before a case can be made. The proposed federal law "would have wider application." Sponsor Rep. Heather Wilson (R-NM) "said it 'would prohibit gouging at any time' and could also be used by state attorneys general if their powers under state law fall short."

The AP (5/4, Hebert) reports, "Under Rep. Heather Wilson's bill, the Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department would have power over energy price gouging."

Kingston Says Bush Discussed New Drilling, Ethanol, Other Measures. Rep. Jack Kingston told MSNBC's Scarborough Country (5/3, 9:14 p.m.) that Bush discussed "opening oil drilling" off the Florida coast, as well as increasing use of alternative fuel vehicles and ethanol, during the meeting.

Democrats Block Effort To Streamline Refinery Approval Process. Fox News' Special Report (5/3, Hume) reported, "Democrats went along today as the Republican controlled House of Representatives passed a bill attempting to crackdown on the alleged price gouging in the gasoline industry. But when it came to another bill to streamline the process of building new refineries in this country, the result was different." The AP (5/4, Hebert) reports the House rejected "a Republican bill that supporters said would make it easier to build refineries in hopes of easing tight gasoline supplies. All but 13 Democrats opposed the measure, intended to quicken the permitting process. They said it would not bring down gas prices, could lessen environmental protection and usurp local say where refineries go." The Washington Times (5/4, Debose) quotes Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton saying, "It is frustrating for me to sit in the White House talking to President Bush about bipartisan energy policy and have Democrats pledge to work with us and then have 94 percent of them vote against our policies."

Barton, Wilson Form "Unlikely" Partnership On Gasoline Legislation. The Hill (5/4, Kaplan) writes House GOP leaders "pressed two unlikely allies" in Wilson and Barton "to cooperate on legislation addressing the jump in gasoline prices." Republican leaders suggested Barton work with Wilson, "who is facing a tough reelection race," on the gouging bill. The "alliance between Barton and Wilson is unusual because the two lawmakers have a strained relationship. In 2004, Barton tried to oust Wilson from his prestigious committee because she voted with Democrats on a motion that would have forced the Bush administration to release internal cost estimates of the Medicare prescription-drug law," and earlier that same year, Barton "infuriated some of his committee members by requiring them to apply for waivers to serve on another top-tier committee," which could have hurt Wilson.

Several In House Switch To Support Stricter CAFE Standards. The Washington Post (5/4, A5, Eilperin) reports "several long-resistant lawmakers" said they "may consider raising fuel economy standards for passenger cars for the first time in more than 30 years." While it "remains unclear whether Congress will actually force automakers to produce more fuel-efficient fleets," several members of the House, including Republicans Michael Bilirakis, Michael Castle, Randy Kuhl, and John Sweeney, "have all switched their stance and now back stricter" federal CAFE standards.

Grassley Says No Windfall Profit Tax Coming. In an interview with Bloomberg's Money & Politics (5/5, 9:06 p.m.), Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley said Congress is "not going to pass a windfall profit tax." Instead, Grassley said "what we need to do is get more incentives for exploration of oil, number one, and…[put] more emphasis on ethanol, biodiesel and all sorts of alternative energy and incentives for conservation."

Energy Department Says Demand For Gasoline Leveling Off. The CBS Evening News (5/3, story 7, 3:15, Schieffer) reported, "The Energy Department predicted today that oil prices will remain high through next year and the high prices now seem to be having an impact on driving habits. The demand for gasoline seems to be leveling off."

Personal Income Soars In Energy-Producing States. USA Today (5/4, Cauchon) reports personal income "is growing dramatically in states that produce energy or have strong ties to the expanding federal government." The five states where per-capita income growth has grown most rapidly since 2000 "are major suppliers of oil, natural gas or coal," with Wyoming leading the list with personal income up "an inflation-adjusted 13.9% from 2000 to 2005."

Wyoming Discount Gasoline Dynasty Strives To Keep Prices Down. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Levine) runs a front-page feature on the Call family of Evanston, Wyoming, which has kept the town "America's capital of cheap gas." The family has run a discount gasoline business since the 1930s. Wyoming residents "drive an average of 18,283 miles per year, more than any other state," and while "prices for regular gasoline here are up 24% from a year ago, but they are often still the nation's cheapest."

Foreign Government-Owned Fuel Companies Help Keep Prices High. The Washington Times (5/4, Hill) reports, "A principal reason fuel prices are high and likely to remain so is a trend worldwide toward state ownership and control of oil resources that is raising questions about how quickly large tracts of oil and gas will be developed and made available to consumers." While some government-owned oil companies like Saudi Arabia's Aramco "readily develop their vast oil reserves to help hold down prices and satisfy the demands of consuming nations," other fuel-rich nations like Bolivia and Venezuela "have fallen into the hands of governments that are less attuned or outright hostile to pleas from drivers around the world who want them to continue the flow of cheap and readily available fuel."

Companies Pass Fuel Costs On To Consumers. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Brooks) reports that as energy costs climb, "delivery companies, cruise lines, taxis, electric utilities, garbage collectors, landscapers, pizza chains and numerous other businesses" across the US are passing the cost along to the consumer with added fees.

Minnesota "Fuel Bank" Cuts Customers' Gasoline Costs. NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 12, 0:40, Tibbles) reported on the St. Cloud, Minnesota fuel bank. Customers "buy gas in bulk up front. Then use a simple card each time they fill up from their reserve. The price remains fixed to the day they bought the gas." Jim Feneis, First Fuel Bank: "We currently still have 300 members that are fueling sub-$1, and literally thousands of members fueling sub-$2 per gallon."

More Commentary. In their USA Today (5/4) "Common Ground" column, "conservative columnist Cal Thomas and liberal strategist Bob Beckel" debate the gasoline price issue. Thomas argues, "I've heard this song before about high gas prices. Five years ago, when gas averaged $1.70 per gallon just before Memorial Day weekend, people complained and sharply criticized politicians and Big Oil. Though Republicans and Democrats both like to demagogue this issue, the fact is government can do little to alter the law of supply and demand." Beckel replies, "Try that little history out on American consumers who are paying $3 a gallon and you'll find they have no interest in history. I'll concede President Bush is not entirely to blame for the high price of gas, but he signed a Republican energy bill last year that was a gift to the U.S. energy industry. He has done virtually nothing to deal with the crisis we have today."

Bush To Promote Medicare Drug Benefit In Advance Of Enrollment Deadline. The AP (5/4) reports President Bush "is traveling to Florida next week to remind seniors to sign up for the Medicare prescription drug program before the May 15 deadline." Bush will visit seniors at a community college in Coconut Creek, make remarks at the retirement community Sun City Center, and host a "conversation" on the benefit in Orlando. Before "his Medicare events, Bush will be in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., on Monday to attend a reception for Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla."

GAO Report Criticizes Help Line For Medicare Prescription Benefit. The Washington Times (5/4, Fagan) reports a Government Accountability Report says "the help available to seniors signing up for Medicare's prescription drug benefit has sometimes been inadequate, and Democrats want the registration deadline -- which is less than two weeks away -- pushed back." GAO investigators "posing as seniors found problems getting their drug program questions adequately answered by the help line. The report found that the help line provided inadequate or incomplete answers to about one-third of the callers." And, "although accuracy rates varied depending on the question, when help-line officials were asked which plan would be cheapest for a senior who takes specific drugs, they answered correctly only 41 percent of the time." Medicare administrator Mark B. McClellan "refuted the findings, saying the survey was conducted months ago."

The AP (5/4, Freking) reports the GAO report prompted "Democratic critics of the Bush administration program to again request an extension of an approaching enrollment deadline." Rep. John Dingell said, "These findings also point to larger problems. Because of inaccurate or incomprehensible information, seniors haven't been given a fair shake. The president should extend the May 15th enrollment deadline and not penalize seniors for the administration's errors."

Bloomberg (5/4, Young) reports, "Medicare chief Mark McClellan said this week that the program, known as Part D, plans to stick with the deadline, and that the administration isn't 'focused at all' now on considering waiving penalties for late enrollment."

The Washington Post (5/4, A10, Connolly) says the report "also found that Medicare's written promotional materials used too much technical jargon, that call waiting times lasted from a few minutes to almost an hour, and the government Web site was so confusing that some people gave up before completing the process." Although the findings "did not surprise advocacy groups that have complained that the program is unnecessarily complicated, the report added fuel to the ongoing political brawl over one of President Bush's signature domestic achievements."

Leak Of Second Medicare Draft Rule Has Impact On Stock Markets. The Hill (5/4, Young) reports the "leaking of a Medicare document Tuesday afternoon had an immediate impact on the stock market and angered federal officials, investors and lobbyists alike." A "complete final draft of an unpublished regulation began to circulate throughout Washington and Wall Street hours before the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) was to make it public at 4 p.m., after the stock market closed." Washington lobbyists "and Wall Street analysts and investors had been passing the regulation around since at least noon, sources said. The regulation sets Medicare's payment rates for certain hospitals. Tuesday's incident was Medicare's second major leak that produced a reaction in the financial markets in only a few weeks." The leak of the document prompted the stock of Kindred Healthcare to increase by 10% in a ten minute period on Tuesday afternoon.

NYTimes Says Cap On General Revenues For Medicare Not Progressive. The New York Times (5/4) says in an editorial, "The most worrisome news in the latest annual report on Medicare is not that the hospital trust fund will run out of money in 2018 or that premiums for coverage of doctor bills are rising faster than projected. Bad as that news is, Medicare is not really to blame — the culprit is the relentlessly escalating cost of health care that is staggering employers and private insurers as well. The really troubling development is that this year's report starts a process that will force the White House and Congress to confront Medicare's fiscal problems with one hand tied behind them." Capping "the share of financing from general revenues is a perverse way to deal with Medicare's very real financial problems" and "removes the most progressive source of financing from further consideration. That leaves only the regressive Medicare payroll tax, increases in premiums and co-payments, or cuts in services or payments to providers on the table."

Frist, Specter Taking Deliberate Approach To Judicial Nominations. CQ (5/3, Perine) reports Majority Leader Bill Frist and Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "are proceeding cautiously on judicial nominations as they balance the appeals of conservative activists who want President Bush's appellate court nominees pushed through the Senate in bunches and wary moderate Democrats seeking a more deliberative pace." Frist has "promised to bring Brett M. Kavanaugh, nominated to a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, to the floor before Memorial Day." But Frist is "waiting until after the Senate acts on Kavanaugh to decide how to handle other contentious appellate court nominations. Frist said he wants to 'see how secure our overall system is' before he attempts to take up other nominations." CQ adds Democrats on the Judiciary Committee "have asked Specter, R-Pa., to summon Kavanaugh to another hearing before the panel votes on his nomination. On Wednesday they received backing from the seven Democratic members of the 'gang of 14,' a bipartisan group that holds the balance of power on judicial nominations." Democratic critics "say Kavanaugh is too inexperienced for a D.C. Circuit seat. Those on the committee want to ask Kavanaugh, previously an associate White House counsel, about what role if any he played in administration policies on warrantless eavesdropping and treatment of detainees held by the U.S. military."

WSJournal Says Kavanaugh Will Be Confirmed If GOP Sticks Together. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/4) that with Brett Kavanaugh's nomination to the DC Circuit Court of Appeals set to come for a vote before the Senate Judiciary Committee today, Democrats are being urged by the left "to use the F-word. Anything is possible, but it's hard to believe Democrats are nuts enough to launch a judicial filibuster in the middle of an election year with a GOP President so low in the polls. Talk about a get-out-the-vote gift for Republicans." The Journal adds that a "Samuel Alito scenario" is more likely. Senators John Kerry and Ted Kennedy "tried to rally (or faked) a Democratic filibuster against Mr. Alito's Supreme Court nomination, but the full Senate confirmed him by 58-42. … As long as Republicans hold together, Mr. Kavanaugh should be sworn in and sitting on the bench by summer."

Report Calls For Shift In Pentagon Spending. Knight Ridder (5/4, Brown) reports that the nonpartisan Task Force on a Unified Security Budget for the United States, "made up of defense and nonproliferation experts," says Congress should "cut $62 billion out of Cold War weapons programs and shift most of that money to homeland security, efforts to halt the spread of nuclear weapons and diplomatic measures that better address current national security needs." The report "singles out such programs as the F-22 stealth fighter jet, the Virginia-class submarine, the DD(X) destroyer, the V-22 Osprey tilt-rotor aircraft and the C-130J cargo plane as having 'scant relevance to the threats we face' and recommends that they be eliminated or reduced significantly."

First Lady Dismisses Criticism President Waited Too Long To Make Staff Changes. First Lady Laura Bush was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/3) about criticism that the President waited too long too make staff changes in the White House. Mrs. Bush said, "No, no, I don't think that at all. Andy Card served so ably. He was a terrific chief of staff. He turned -- served longer than every other chief of staff, save one, and he did a wonderful job. He's very beloved in the White House and all around Washington. But at the same time, it's great to have Josh Bolten in this job. He comes with a fresh perspective, and he'll be terrific."

First Lady Calls Rove "Valuable," And A "Brilliant Strategist." The First Lady was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/3) if Karl Rove is indispensable in President Bush's White House. Mrs. Bush said, "He's a very good friend, Karl is. He's been with the president through all his races, starting with the first governor's race. He's a very brilliant strategist. His politics are his avocation, his real interest. He's valuable, absolutely. There's no doubt about it."

First Lady Says Bush Will Continue To Be Effective Despite Low Poll Numbers. Mrs. Bush was also asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/3) about the polls showing that the President's approval rating is in the mid-30s. Mrs. Bush said, "I'm sure he doesn't like that. I don't like that either obviously. But when you're elected for a second term, and there are term limits, then of course you start off in some ways as a lame duck. I still know that my husband is going to be very effective and has been very effective, and that his agenda that he ran on in the last election, in 2004, he will be able to get through."

White House Insiders Anxious About Effect Of Staff Changes. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/3) reported, "Long-time Bush advisors say that they are a bit anxious over the recent wave of staff changes and are slowly adjusting to the ways of new Chief of Staff Josh Bolten." Insiders tell US News and the Bulletin "that his style is far different than former Chief of Staff Andy Card, but his more aggressive approach is being embraced as the White House seeks to refocus its agenda and boost poll ratings. Also winning raves is the switch for Karl Rove, who relinquished his policy role to get back to handling politics and big picture issues where he shines, they said. Unclear, however, is the role of incoming press secretary Tony Snow, who officially joins the staff on Monday. Snow has been meeting with top Bush aides this week, signaling that he will get the broader policy-making job he sought coming into the post. But rumors that he will change the faces in the press and communications operation are unsettling, say the insiders."

House Narrowly Passes Lobbying Reform Measure. The House yesterday passed a lobbying reform bill by a narrow 217-213 margin. Media reports are generally depicting the measure as weak, and focus on the sharp partisan split in the House vote. USA Today (5/4, Drinkard) notes the House bill "passed with eight Democratic votes, which helped overcome the 20 Republican votes against it." The Hill (5/4, O'Connor) says "the eight Democrats' votes signaled a reluctance to take a possible political hit by voting against any reform legislation." The Washington Post (5/4, A1, Birnbaum) lists the eight Democrats who voted for final passage: "Reps. John Barrow (Ga.), Dan Boren (Okla.), Leonard L. Boswell (Iowa), Henry Cuellar (Tex.), Jim Marshall (Ga.), Jim Matheson (Utah), Charlie Melancon (La.) and Gene Taylor (Miss.)."

Before the vote, says The Hill (5/4, Hearn), Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "issued a stern warning to her colleagues yesterday during a closed-door meeting, telling them not to buck their leadership on a pivotal lobbying reform bill. 'They want to use you to defeat us,' she warned. 'Trust us on this. It has absolutely no downside to your district.'" Democrats "have pinned their election-year hopes on painting an image of the GOP as a corrupt, entrenched majority that voters should reject in November. Pelosi and other leaders argued that Democrats would hand Republicans a victory if they voted for a measure that Democrats and others have denounced as a sham."

The Los Angeles Times (5/4, Fiore) says "the close vote on the measure -- 217 to 213, largely along party lines -- reflected criticisms by Democrats that the bill, intended to address Congress' ethically tarred image, would do little to change the way business is conducted on Capitol Hill." The House "declined to follow the lead of the Senate, which last month voted to prohibit its members from accepting gifts or meals from lobbyists."

Roll Call (5/4, Newmyer, Kornacki) reports lawmakers "now have to reconcile the House measure with stronger Senate language on earmarks, gifts, travel and disclosure, while determining the fate of a potentially deal-killing House clause that cracks down on so-called 527 groups." Republican leaders "believed that passing a reform bill was crucial to the party's chances in November and to its ability to get anything done in the House in the interim."

The AP (5/4, Abrams) reports "Democrats, and the good government groups pushing for stronger legislation, said the House bill would do little to stop acts such as the influence peddling of now-convicted lobbyist Jack Ambramoff and the corruption of former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif., who was convicted and sentenced to more than eight years in prison for taking some $2.4 million in bribes."

The New York Times (5/4, Stolberg) reports Democrats "denounced the measure as a sham, and 20 Republicans voted against it," while Knight Ridder (5/4, Kuhnhenn) says Republicans acted "in a bid to inoculate themselves from recent scandals." Knight Ridder adds the bill "is far more modest than what Republican leaders initially set out as their 'reform' anti-corruption agenda earlier this year. Watchdog groups called for the bill's defeat."

The Washington Times (5/4, Hurt) reports, "Democrats opposed the bill, saying it does not go far enough toward curbing the influence of lobbyists on members of Congress. 'The scope of what this bill doesn't do is stunning,' said Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, New York Democrat." Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer "said the bill will do little to improve the image of the Republican Party."

The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Rogers) reports, "The Republican dilemma was captured by the fact that their most powerful closing speaker was a former member of the House Ethics Committee who later opposed the bill." Rep. Kenny Hulshof, "one of 20 Republicans to defect, said he wanted most to make an appeal to Democrats not to seek short- term political gain from the scandals now." But "his appearance was striking since he was one of those Republicans purged from the Ethics panel last year after being tough on then Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R., Tex.), an Abramoff ally."

Frist Pressing House Indecency Bill In Senate. The Washington Post (5/4, D1, Mohammed) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is "trying to push through a bill that would increase indecency fines on broadcasters and threaten to take away their licenses after three violations." Frist is "championing the bill after conservative groups, a key voting bloc if he runs for president, expressed frustration at the lack of congressional action to curb broadcast indecency. His stand also puts opponents of the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act of 2005 in the position of appearing to cast a vote in an election year against decency." The House "passed the bill in February 2005, but it has languished in the Senate, where Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), rather than drafting his own legislation, has encouraged media companies to regulate themselves." The House bill "would increase the fine for broadcasting 'obscene, indecent, or profane material' to a maximum of $500,000 from $32,500."

House Democratic Leaders Paint Optimistic Picture Of Party's Chances In November. Roll Call (5/4, Kornacki) reports, "House Democratic leaders Tuesday night treated their Members to a rosy assessment of their party's chances in this fall's elections." But "the 120 or so Democrats who attended the Leaders' Dinner at Democratic National Committee headquarters were warned that the most favorable climate in a dozen years for their party will be squandered if they do not each actively contribute to the campaign effort." Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and the four elected leaders of the Democratic Caucus, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, Caucus Chairman James Clyburn and Vice Chairman John Larson, "all addressed what unofficially marked the kickoff of the House Democrats' election-year effort, an event that the same attendee described as 'one part pep talk, one part serious discussion about the state of the party and one part asking for help and unity.'"

Democrats See Strong Turnout In Tuesday's Primary Votes. Roll Call (5/4, Whittington) reports that operatives in both parties sought to spin the results of Tuesday's primary elections in Ohio, Indiana and North Carolina as favorable for their prospects in November, "voter turnout in each state could provide some of the best clues as to whether a Congressional sea change could be in the making this fall. … Overall, almost 65,800 Democrats voted Tuesday in the [Ohio's] 6th district, up from the almost 61,300 who voted there in the last midterm election in 2002. But Republican turnout was also up 4,226 votes over 2002, a year in which the GOP did not have competitive up ballot races. Republicans in Ohio had a competitive primary for governor on the ballot Tuesday, while Democrats did not have competitive races at the top of the ticket." In Indiana, "more Democratic ballots were cast than GOP ballots in all three of the competitive House districts." In North Carolina's 11th district "39,100 Democrats went to the polls in the 11th district Tuesday, compared to 33,812 Republicans."

DOE Changes Policy On Contractors' Traditional Pension Plans. In a move that is angering labor groups and some Democrats, the Energy Department has told contractors it will no longer cover the costs of traditional pension plans for their new hires. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Schroeder) reports, "DOE has long reimbursed companies working for it for the costs of their employee defined-benefit pensions -- plans that pay a set monthly amount for retirees based on length of service. Early next year, DOE will begin paying only the costs of defined contribution plans, such as 401(k)s, for new workers. Individuals already working for DOE contractors won't be affected. … Labor groups and their supporters say they fear the move could inspire other agencies -- as well as companies -- to drop traditional pensions."

Voinovich Bill Would Deny Raises To Sub-Par Federal Workers. The Washington Post (5/4, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Sen. George Voinovich announced yesterday that he will introduce a measure to improve the government's performance appraisal system and deny pay raises to federal employees rated as less than successful. Voinovich's proposal "would prohibit agencies from giving annual raises and within-grade increases to employees deemed sub-par performers. … Voinovich said his proposal would fold into the General Schedule, the largest federal pay system, and would require agencies to provide training to managers to help them better judge employee performance and communicate job expectations to employees."

Rothenberg Says Bush Is Seen As "Irrelevant." Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (5/4,) that "fewer than half of those polled" give President Bush "credit for leadership, and his poll numbers also have plummeted on integrity and honesty." One Democratic pollster said Bush is "irrelevant" noting that "those being polled will mention the president by name only when prompted to do so." Rothenberg adds, "The president is neither loved nor feared anymore, which is a problem for any chief executive trying to wield power. The country could get along like this if the international arena was relatively calm and the nation could stumble its way through the next few years. But although the economy's fundamentals look good, the country is facing problems that demand immediate attention."

Service Sector Expansion Continues At "Healthy Levels." The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Whitehouse) reports service-sector businesses "enjoyed a solid gain in already healthy activity levels last month, although rising energy prices continue to create trouble for the sector." The "closely watched ISM nonmanufacturing index, which measures business activity mainly at service-related companies, rose to 63.0 in April, versus 60.5 in March. Economists had expected to see the expansion pull back."

Chicago Fed President Expects Gradual Reduction In US Current Account Deficit. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Derby) reports Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago President Michael Moskow "said Wednesday he expects that the U.S. current account deficit will begin to adjust lower at some point, and the process is unlikely to cause harm to the economy." In comments "prepared for delivery before a business group in Northbrook, Ill.," Moskow said, "No one can say when this adjustment away from such high current account deficits will begin. But I expect that when it does, the adjustment will be gradual, without a major disruption to U.S. economic performance."

Stocks Close Down On Profit Worries. NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 10, 0:10, Williams) reported, "On Wall Street today, the Dow was off by 16 points [to close at 11,400.28]. The NASDAQ was down almost six [to close at 2,303.97]." And the Wall Street Journal (5/4, Browning) says, "Weak profit numbers and worries about a too-strong economy combined to knock the Dow Jones Industrial Average down from Tuesday's six-year high, but the decline was minor." Investors were "reacting to disappointing quarterly sales at Dow-industrials component-stock Procter & Gamble, which sent the household-products maker down more than 3%. Time Warner's sales also missed Wall Street expectations. In addition, the latest economic reports showed more strength than expected both in the nation's service sector, which accounts for the great majority of the economy, and in factory orders."

Bernanke, Others Discuss Easing Poverty In Poor DC Neighborhood. The Washington Post (5/4, D1, Irwin)

reports Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben S. Bernanke yesterday "gave his take on how to ease poverty in neighborhoods east of the Anacostia River in the District. So did World Bank President Paul D. Wolfowitz, a half-dozen Bush administration officials, and top leaders of several banks and other financial groups. It happened at the Anacostia Economic Summit, an event that aimed to engage some of the nation's financial leaders in discussing how to improve the lot of residents in the District's poorest neighborhoods and similar parts of other big cities." The officials' message was to "improve residents' access to banks, financial advice and homeownership, and broader prosperity will ensue."

Georgia Has Not Created Jobs To Keep Pace With Population Growth. USA Today (5/4, Copeland) reports that while Georgia was once a jobs magnet with firms routinely relocating or opening headquarters there, lately, economic news "has been almost all bad. … Georgia has been one of the nation's fastest-growing states for a quarter-century. … But population growth has not paid off financially for the Peach State: It ranks 49th among the states in per-capita income growth since 2000 -- ahead only of Hurricane Katrina-battered Louisiana, according to a USA TODAY analysis of government data. Georgia lost 2% of its income in the first half of this decade. The state has not generated enough new jobs, especially higher-paying ones, to keep pace with its growing population."

Annual Bible Reading Underway On Capitol Lawn. The Christian Science Monitor (5/4, Chaddock) reports that the 17th Annual US Capitol Bible Reading Marathon is underway on the west lawn of the US Capitol. According to the Monitor, "The 90-hour marathon, which will include readings by about two dozen members of Congress and their staffers, is a lead-up to Thursday's National Day of Prayer. President Harry Truman signed the day into law in 1952 as an interfaith event. But in recent years, evangelical Christian groups have taken the lead in organizing activities around the day, especially those located near seats of government. … Critics say that evangelical groups and their allies in Congress are staging events like the Bible Marathon near centers of power as a bid to link secular Washington to Christian ideals."

Phillips Book Called "Intellectual Dishonesty On Stilts." In his column in the New York Times (5/4) David Brooks reviews Ken Phillips' book "American Theocracy." Brooks notes that "when the left feels disinherited, liberals seize upon" Phillips' "conspiracy fantasies." Phillips "asserts that 50 to 60 percent of Republicans believe in Armageddon and are influenced by the argument that the 'destruction of the new Babylon' in Iraq will hasten the coming of the messiah. Phillips says that the Bush White House sends messages to these Americans through 'double-coding' in his speeches -- phrases that mean one thing to secular America but contain hidden meanings to people with the 'biblical worldview.'" Brooks notes "This is intellectual dishonesty on stilts. … And while many informed critics have picked apart Phillips's fantasies, other Americans, at once cynical and naïve, are willing to believe any whacked-out theory, so long as it focuses hatred on Bush."

Study Finds Public Seeks "Compatible" News Sources. The Washington Post (5/4, A2, Morin) reports in its "Unconventional Wisdom" column that an online experiment by The Washington Post, washingtonpost.com and Stanford University's political communication lab found that Republicans "preferred to get their news from Fox -- even when the news stories were about subjects far removed from politics, such as sports or travel. On the other hand, Democrats avoided Fox when it came to political news and preferred National Public Radio and CNN. … More than 2,000 people participated in the test of whether attention to the identical news story was increased or decreased when the story was attributed to Fox News, NPR, CNN or the BBC. … The results found strong evidence that people apply a political litmus test to the news, avoiding sources they view as unfriendly while seeking out compatible sources, a finding confirmed by researchers at Polimetrix in a national study with a representative sample of adults done in cooperation with the Stanford lab."

Doctors Oppose Collection Of Prescription Data. The New York Times (5/4, Saul) reports that some doctors are objecting to computerized dossiers showing which physicians are prescribing what drugs. They consider the data-gathering "an intrusion that feeds overzealous sales practices among the nation's estimated 90,000 drug company representatives. Public officials are also weighing in. A vote on a state bill to clamp down on the practice is scheduled for today in New Hampshire, and similar bills have been introduced in other states, including Arizona and West Virginia." The American Medical Association "will soon give individual physicians the choice of declaring their prescription records off limits to drug sales representatives. The new measure is viewed as a self-policing move that the drug industry and the A.M.A., which has lucrative contracts with data-mining companies, hope will keep states from banning sales of prescription data altogether."

Texas Cited As Example Of Effective Medical Tort Reform. Former US House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Dr. John Gill, an orthopedic surgeon in Dallas, write in the Wall Street Journal (5/4) that the state of Texas should serve as an example to senators who "want to expand access to health care by increasing the number of physicians and lowering costs." Texas lawmakers enacted medical litigation reform in the summer of 2003. A "voter-approved constitutional amendment, Proposition 12, followed later that year to solidify the changes. As a result, physicians are returning to the state, particularly in underserved specialties and counties. Insurance premiums to protect against frivolous lawsuits have declined dramatically." Gingrich and Gill add that Texas "has taken an important first step toward creating a 21st-century health justice system that meets the needs of doctors and patients alike."

Kondracke Says Politics Dominates Health Care Debate. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/4) that "partisan political cacophony dominates the health care debate -- and it's likely to get worse if Democrats win control of part or all of Congress. With no resolution in sight, the twin crises afflicting health care -- inexorable increases in both costs and the number of uninsured -- are likely to continue unabated, posing a long-term threat to the economy and the nation's health. … At the moment, the process continues inexorably, and ideological differences between Democrats and Republicans are helping it along."

Cohen Says Colbert Was Rude At Correspondents' Dinner. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (5/4, A25) that Stephen Colbert "was not funny at the White House Correspondents' Association Dinner." Colbert "was not just a failure as a comedian but rude." Cohen adds that Colbert "had a chance to tell the president and much of important (and self-important) Washington things it would have been good for them to hear. But he was, like much of the blogosphere itself, telling like-minded people what they already know and alienating all the others."

UK, France Ask Security Council To Take Action On Iranian Nuclear Program. ABC World News Tonight (5/3, story 4, :30, Vargas) reported, "The long-awaited showdown at the UN over Iran's nuclear program has begun. Britain and France introduced a resolution in the Security Council demanding that Iran stop enriching and reprocessing uranium. It warns that further measures may be necessary if Iran does not comply. It was a veiled threat of sanctions and possibly military force. The US supports the measure. But passage may be difficult. Russia and China have opposed a hard line toward Iran."

The Washington Post (5/4, A18, Lynch) reports that the draft makes "a veiled reference to possible sanctions," but "US and European diplomats stressed" it "is not intended to threaten sanctions or the use of force." Still, "Russia and China immediately signaled they will oppose" it, and "senior Iranian officials have said that they will not abide by the resolution." The Post calls the resolution "an escalation in a three-year campaign by the West to pressure Iran to scale back its accelerating nuclear activities." The Financial Times (5/4, Turner) calls the resolution "unexpectedly tough." The New York Times (5/4, Hoge) adds that negotiations on the draft "begin Thursday, leading to a scheduled meeting next Tuesday between" Secretary Rice "and the foreign ministers of Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia at which Iran is to be a central subject." Knight Ridder (5/4, Landay, Douglas), USA Today (5/4, Slavin), Los Angeles Times (5/4, Farley) and Washington Times (5/4, Curl), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

In a front-page story, the Los Angeles Times (5/4, A1, Rubin, Murphy) analyzes "Moscow's complex motives" on the Iran debate, which "may make it a difficult partner" for the US. Russia "views the volatile, oil-rich region as the key to regaining its position as a world leader, diplomats and analysts say. Moscow also has strong economic ties to Tehran: Two-way trade topped $2 billion in 2004, and Iranian officials predicted recently that it would double in coming years. … Although Moscow shares the West's desire to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear state, it has other interests as well, chief among them enhancing its own status as an alternative power to the United States, diplomats and experts say."

Meanwhile, the AP (5/4, Dareini) reports, "Iran's nuclear chief said Wednesday his nation had enriched uranium to the upper end of the range needed to make fuel for reactors, further defying U.S. and European demands to stop those efforts." The announcement by nuclear chief Gholamreza Aghazadeh "that Iran enriched uranium up to 4.8 percent purity tops Iran's declaration last month that it had surpassed the 3.6 percent purity level. Uranium enriched to between 3.5 percent and 5 percent is used to make fuel for reactors to generate electricity." Uranium enriched to more than 90 percent "becomes suitable for use in nuclear weapons."

Bush, Merkel Present Mostly United Front. The AFP (5/4) reports President Bush "met at the White House with German Chancellor Angela Merkel for talks dominated by the ongoing international crisis over Iran's nuclear program." Afterwards, "Merkel said the United States and Germany were in 'total agreement' on the need to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon." Both "agreed that Merkel would return the favor in a few months' time, hosting the US president for a July 14 summit." However, the New York Times (5/4, Hoge) notes "there were hints of differences when Mrs. Merkel emphasized the need to move slowly through the diplomatic process." She "also signaled that Germany wanted to see the support of all countries on the Council for a resolution to stop Iran's critical nuclear activities."

Potential Rifts Said To Lie Between Western Powers. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Champion) reports, "Washington and its allies still have profound differences over tactics and the bottom line -- including whether or not military force is an option -- that could pose trouble for the alliance in the future." Secretary Rice's commented last week about a "coalition of the willing," to deal with Iran, but a European diplomat said "the phrase 'frightened the horses.'" That reaction "showed underlying differences that could later break apart the new trans-Atlantic harmony."

Neighbors Uneasy With Iran's Nuclear Program. The AP (5/4, Hurst, Elias) reports that after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's "election last summer, Tehran's relations have significantly cooled with its oil- and gas-rich neighbors," and the "most anxious are Arab countries that lie on the east side of the Arabian Peninsula." Besides nuclear accidents and possible Western invasion, "there's anxiety about possible civil strife between their ruling Sunni Muslim majorities and Shiite minorities."

Iran Repudiates Statement It Would Target Israel If US Attacks. The AP (5/4, Lederer) reports, "The Iranian military on Wednesday rejected a statement from a top Revolutionary Guards commander that Israel would be Iran's first target in response to any U.S. attack." Brig. Gen. Alireza Afshar said Mohammad Ebrahim Dehghani's statement "is his personal view and has no validity as far as the Iranian military officials are concerned."

Poll Finds Radical Islamists Driven By Fear Of US Domination, Not Religiosity. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, Shah) reports that a Gallup survey of eight Islamic nations found that "what differentiates the minority that says 9/11 was either mostly or completely justified from the majority isn't religiosity or even poverty, but rather a sense of being controlled by the U.S." The threatened feeling "seemed to also extend beyond political domination to religious and cultural identity." Also, "political radicals were, comparatively, more educated and more affluent than the moderate majority." The poll found "support for extremism is on the rise in Morocco, Iran and Turkey, but declining in Pakistan and Lebanon."

Discord Grows Between Fatah, Hamas. The AP (5/4, Laub) reports that both Fatah and Hamas "insist they will not be drawn into civil war." Still, "tempers have been rising sharply in the Palestinian areas since Hamas took power" and "wrangling over control of the security forces has laid bare the deep enmity" between the two. Hamas accused Abbas of "conspiring with the West against Hamas," and "Fatah leaders countered that Hamas is trying to deflect attention from its financial troubles by attacking Abbas. In this charged climate, both sides are mobilizing."

Rattled By US Treasury, Banks Won't Transfer Funds To Palestine. The New York Times (5/4, Myre) reports, "As the Hamas-led government struggles to raise cash after the suspension of Western aid to the Palestinian Authority, it faces a new and unexpected obstacle: banks here are refusing to accept its money transfers from abroad." When the United States Treasury "barred almost all financial dealings with the Palestinian Authority" it "rattled" the banks, "which are tied to the American banking system." They "abruptly stopped handling even basic wire transfers needed for the authority to receive money donated by foreign countries." While "Arab countries…have raised more than $70 million," no bank is "willing to move the money to the West Bank or the Gaza Strip, wary of legal entanglements with the United States."

Deaths In Gaza Hospital Blamed On Shortages Due To Budget Crisis. The Washington Times (5/4, Mitnick) reports that the managing director of Gaza's Shifa Hospital says "patients…have started dying because the Palestinian Authority's budget crisis has left it without money to pay for critical medical treatment." The government "can't afford chemotherapy drugs, plaster for casts or surgery anesthetics," and the director noted that "medical employees who hadn't been paid stopped reporting for work." In addition, "the supply shortage has been compounded by Israel's frequent closure of Gaza's main commercial passage because of threats of additional suicide attacks."

US To Speed Nuclear Dismantling To Counter Impression Of New Arms Race. The Washington Post (5/4, A11, Pincus) reports, "The Bush administration plans to speed up the dismantling of old, retired nuclear warheads in coming years, in part to counter any impression that the United States is starting a new arms race with its work to develop a new generation of more reliable nuclear arms." Deputy Energy Secretary Clay Sell told a House Appropriations subcommittee "that dismantlements are 'very important for the arms-control reasons and for our own credibility.'" A "reason for the slow pace is that Pantex, the government production facility near Waco, Tex., could not handle much of the work while it is refurbishing thousands of operational nuclear weapons, officials said."

Rice Says Diplomats "Working Hard" To Produce Darfur Peace. The AFP (5/4) reports that, "as she welcomed her Japanese counterpart Taro Aso," Secretary Rice said "she had been updated on the efforts underway in Abuja" to reach a Darfur peace accord, and added, "They are all working very hard."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/4, Brinkly) adds that Deputy Secretary Zoellick "arrived in Abuja on Monday morning and has been negotiating almost nonstop." State Department officials added that "American officials took a forceful role" in the talks, "pushing through revisions of a proposed agreement." However, "given the mercurial attitudes of the Sudanese government and the rebels, Mr. Zoellick's direct involvement carries political risks."

Senate Panel Passes Measure Funding UN Peacekeeping Mission. The AP (5/4, De La Cruz) reports, "The US Senate on Wednesday passed an amendment sponsored by Sen. Robert Menendez that provides $60 million to fund a United Nations peacekeeping mission in the Darfur region of Sudan." The amendment "is part of a huge bill to fund military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and hurricane relief on the Gulf Coast. President Bush has promised to veto the bill if it exceeds $94.5 billion." The bill "is already close to $109 billion."

Sudan Appears Ready To Accept Key Concessions. The AP (5/4, Faul) reports, "Sudan appeared ready Wednesday to agree to faster disarmament of Arab militias in Darfur and to accept more rebels into its security forces, key concessions that could clear the way for progress at peace talks." Sudan spokesman Abdulrahman Zuma said, "Through this so-called American initiative, it seems that the government is going to make some concessions, especially about reintegration and disarmament." However, "two rebels close to the negotiations offered a version different from Zuma's, saying U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick and British Cabinet member Hilary Benn were preparing a substantially changed proposal to address their demands for greater power and wealth sharing."

Egeland To Visit Darfur. The AP (5/4, Lederer) reports that U.N. Undersecretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator Jan Egeland said "he is heading to Sudan's western Darfur region to draw attention to the desperate need for money to help millions of people in the conflict-wracked area." Previously, he was "barred from visiting Darfur and Sudan's capital of Khartoum in April when the Sudanese government refused landing permission for his plane after it gave him a visa," but he now says "the government…invited him to come." The Wall Street Journal (5/4) carries an op-ed by Egeland today. "If we are to avoid an imminent, massive loss of life, we need immediate action." The people of Darfur "need strengthened security," but "instead of healing the wound, the world has preferred to apply bandages to an open hemorrhage." The people "need protection on the ground and they need peace."

Cheney Praises Eastern European Democracies. The AP (5/3, Espo) continued coverage of Vice President Cheney's overseas travel. "Opening a three-nation trip," Cheney "blended praise for Eastern European countries that have embraced freedom with a reminder that other residents of the region 'don't enjoy the full benefits' of democracy." Cheney met with Lithuanian President Valdas Adamkus yesterday, and plans to deliver "what aides touted as an important speech to" a regional leaders' forum today. The AP says "it was not clear how critical — if at all — [Cheney] would be of Russia in his remarks," and notes, "He did not identify by name any countries the administration views as lacking in democratic reform. But one official said that later, over dinner, Cheney told his host the administration stands 'with them in their support of the opposition' in Belarus."

Bush Will Attend Annual US-EU Summit. The AP (5/4) reports, "President Bush will travel to Vienna on June 21 for the annual U.S.-European Union summit." It "will give Bush a chance to discuss trans-Atlantic ties with the presidents of the European Council and European Commission." Topics at the summit are expected to include "preventing nuclear proliferation, combating terrorist financing, assisting reconstruction in Iraq, promoting peace and democracy in Europe and beyond, reducing trade barriers and energy security."

US, EU Stances On China Grow Closer. The Wall Street Journal (5/4, King, Champion) reports, "The U.S. and the European Union are adopting a more skeptical and unified stance on China, a trend that adds weight to calls for Beijing to modify some of its trade practices and be more open about its military." While this agreement is "clearest on the trade front," the EU is "looking more critically at China's defense buildup" as well. EU officials attribute the shift partly to "a wholesale European review of China policy" triggered by "the bitter spat last year with Washington over plans to lift the union's 16-year-old ban on arms sales to China." While "U.S. officials hail the converging views on China as another sign of improving relations across the Atlantic" and "added leverage in negotiations with Beijing," EU officials "note that fundamental differences in approach remain."

US Denies Taiwanese Leader's Request For Stopover. Knight Ridder (5/4, Johnson) reports, "Taiwan's president was forced Wednesday to delay a trip to Latin America for a day after Washington snubbed his request for a stopover in New York or San Francisco." Taiwan "asked the Bush administration on April 21 for permission for a stopover. Such transit requests have been granted routinely for more than a decade." The New York Times (5/4, Kahn) says Taiwan's president Chen Shui-bian delayed his trip "at the last minute." The "rebuke suggests that the Bush administration remains displeased by Mr. Chen's move in February to abolish a government agency set up to study reunification with mainland China. The United States is also eager to avoid antagonizing China after some embarrassing incidents during a visit by its president, Hu Jintao, late last month." The Washington Post (5/4, Graham) reports the story under the headline "Taiwan's Leader Cancels Stopover."

Bolivia Threatens To Seize Energy Company Assets. The New York Times (5/4, Orero) reports, "Bolivian authorities said Wednesday that they planned to scour the financial records of foreign energy companies and they threatened explicitly for the first time to seize company assets if new contracts giving the state greater control could not be negotiated." Although "Bolivian officials said the briefing was intended to reassure foreign multinationals here,…it seemed to have the opposite effect, and the message was unmistakable: the government is now in charge, and the companies can take it or leave it." Those companies, "though, expressed increasing indignation."

Experts Predict Negative Long-Term Effects. The Washington Post (5/4, D1, Mufson) reports that "many foreign companies and economists" say that "Bolivia -- and other countries that follow the same path -- might end up the loser," as, "in the past, countries that have abruptly nationalized their oil industries and booted out foreign companies with little or no compensation have rarely managed to meet earlier oil and gas production levels." They end up "starved of capital by leery foreign investors and lacking the skills to fully exploit their own resources."

Under US Pressure, Fox Asks Congress To Reconsider Drug Law. The New York Times (5/4, McKinley, Broder) reports, "After intense pressure from the United States, President Vicente Fox has asked Congress to reconsider a law it passed last week that would decriminalize the possession of small amounts of drugs as part of a larger effort to crack down on street-level dealing." In a statement issued late last night, Fox "said the law should be changed 'to make it absolutely clear that in our country the possession of drugs and their consumption are and continue to be crimes.'" The Times adds, "Officials from the State Department and the White House's drug control office met with the Mexican ambassador in Washington Monday and expressed grave reservations about the law, saying it would draw tourists to Mexico who want to take drugs and would lead to more consumption, said Tom Riley, a spokesman for the Office of National Drug Control Policy."

NBC Nightly News (5/3, story 6, 2:20, Williams) showed John Walters, Office of National Drug Policy Director, saying, "We all know that encouraging people to use drugs is bad for them and bad for every nation that does it." NBC (Alexander) adds, "Walters is not alone. Critics warn if passed this law would send thousands of Americans over the border to experiment with the same illegal drugs this country has vowed to fight." General Barry McCaffrey (Ret.), Clinton Administration Drug Czar: "This is going to have a huge impact on cross-border drug tourism out of the United States, to include, in particular, college kids who will go to Mexico, buy and consume."

The AP (5/4, Stevenson) reports "Mexico's top police official said Tuesday that the bill would have to be 'analyzed' and 'considered' because Congress had strayed from the intent of an original proposal by…Fox."

Blair Defends Record On Eve Of Local Elections. USA Today (5/4, Soriano) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair, under fire over government scandals, defended his record Wednesday, the eve of local elections that could further weaken the grip of his ruling Labor Party." Blair and his party "have been rocked by embarrassing headlines and sinking public opinion polls for more than a week." Today's vote for "council members -- the equivalent of mayors and county supervisors in the USA -- will be a referendum on Blair, one of the Bush administration's closest allies, and his ruling party." According to a Populus poll published April 4 in the daily Times of London, "47% of respondents said Blair should step down now or at the end of the year -- a 6% jump since January." Blair "has said he will leave office before the next general election in 2009 or 2010." An ICM survey last week for The Guardian newspaper "found the Labor Party has a 32% approval rating, 5 points lower than a month ago and the party's lowest rating in its nine years in power."

The Financial Times (5/4, Blitz) runs a story titled "Highest Dissatisfaction With Labour In Third Term," in which it says "Labour goes into Thursday's local elections across England burdened by the highest level of public dissatisfaction with the government's performance since Tony Blair was elected in 1997, according to an opinion poll. As the government continues to reel from 10 days of torrid headlines relating to Charles Clarke and John Prescott, the poll by Ipsos MORI for the Financial Times shows that dissatisfaction with the government among Labour voters has soared remarkably in the past month." The poll "was conducted between April 27 and May 2, a period when the government was being rocked daily by negative headlines about the home secretary's handling of his department and the deputy prime minister's affair with a secretary."

The Christian Science Monitor (5/4, Rice-Oxley, Brandon) says "Thursday's vote has taken on far broader significance than usual because of two major developments: the deepening woes of Tony Blair's Labour government and the sudden emergence of the far-right British National Party (BNP) threatening an electoral breakthrough. … Will voters, dismayed at a sequence of government blunders, desert Labour en masse, putting pressure on Mr. Blair to advance his long-promised retirement? Will the new Conservative leader, David Cameron, make his mark in his first election at the helm? And will the BNP, like other anti-immigration parties elsewhere in Europe, achieve a historically high vote?"

The Washington Times (5/4, Webb) says that "if the Laborites lose 200 or more town-hall seats -- as many analysts expect -- rebels in Mr. Blair's Labor Party say they will move against him." They "can either demand that he name a precise date for his departure, or force a leadership election. 'We are reaching the position where, in order to restore confidence, we need change at the top,' said Geraldine Smith, a senior Labor member of Parliament."

Anti-Immigration Party Gaining Support. The Washington Post (5/4, A18, Sullivan) reports on the British National Party, which is "vehemently anti-immigration," a group "long dismissed by many as the racist fringe" that has "become increasingly popular as governments that once freely accepted immigrants question how many more their nations can take." The Times adds, "A British study this month concluded that up to a fourth of British voters were considering supporting the BNP. Their country now has an estimated 7 million people of various minority groups."

Nepal Declares Ceasefire With Maoists, Withdraws Terrorist Label. The Washington Post (5/4, A21, Sangraula) reports, "Nepal's new government on Wednesday declared a cease-fire with Maoist rebels and said it would no longer call them terrorists, the latest in a series of moves aimed at coaxing the guerrillas back into the political mainstream." This "added to the sense of political momentum that has been building," as "the new government has moved toward releasing imprisoned Maoists and has been in touch with the movement's underground political leaders." Also, "members of the reconvened parliament fulfilled a major demand of the Maoists when they agreed by unanimous voice vote to hold elections for a constituent assembly that would write a new constitution." This could result in the end of the monarchy, a goal of the Maoists.

Russia Rebuilding Chechnya. The New York Times (5/4, Chivers) reports, "After more than a decade of war, banditry and stubborn disorder, a noticeably different spring campaign has gained momentum" in the capital of Chechnya, as "with bombings and roadside ambushes less frequent than before, sections of Chechnya are being rebuilt at last." Despite "separatists…claims of success," Ramzan Kadyrov, Chechnya's new prime minister, "and the Kremlin have managed to set upon a program of repair in what was once the heart of rebel activity. Russia's counterinsurgency efforts now include not just guns and elections rigged to advance the careers of the Kremlin's proxies, but lumber, bricks and light."

EU Halts Serbian Membership Talks Until Mladic's Arrest. The Washington Post (5/4, A22, Williams) reports, "The European Union suspended membership talks with Serbia after a deadline passed Wednesday for the arrest of war crimes suspect Ratko Mladic," and "Serbia's failure to apprehend him has become the main obstacle to the eventual integration of Serbia into the E.U." While "Serbian Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica appealed Wednesday to Mladic's sense of patriotism to end the chase and surrender," Serbian officials "acknowledged that Mladic has received help in avoiding arrest," and "the chief negotiator with the E.U., Deputy Prime Minister Miroljub Labus, blamed the government and resigned."

Powerful Earthquake Hits South Pacific. The CBS Evening News (5/3, story 6, 0:25, Schieffer) reported, "A powerful earthquake struck a remote part of the South Pacific today, triggering tsunami warnings as far away as New Zealand. Luckily, the tsunami was small because the warning never reached the place in the greatest danger. The magnitude 7.8 quake hit near the islands of Tonga, but because of a powerful failure there, the tsunami warning was not received."

WPost Urges Administration To Support Reformers, Not Mubarak. The Washington Post (5/4, A24) editorializes, "Why does the administration continue to give nearly $2 billion each year to a government that mocks President Bush's democracy initiative?" President Hosni Mubarak, "under pressure,…promised reforms, including multi-candidate elections and an end to emergency rule. Now, though, he apparently feels less pressure." He just reneged "on his earlier promise to end emergency rule in Egypt." Our government "limit themselves to Mr. Mubarak's no-win options. If they want to help Egypt, aid should go to that nation's civic society and democratic reformers, not the corrupt regime that persecutes those who favor a freedom agenda."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Further 9/11 Prosecutions In Doubt After Moussaoui Verdict. Agence France-Presse (5/8) reports, "Now that a jury has decided Zacarias Moussaoui had only a minor role in September 11, what fate awaits the primary masterminds and plotters of the world's worst terror strikes who are already in US custody?" AFP continues, "Moussaoui escaped a death sentence over the September 11, 2001 strikes because jurors did not believe US government arguments that he had played an integral role in the murder of nearly 3,000 people on that day. … Yet, in what some have hailed as a victory for traditional justice, he was brought to trial in the US criminal justice system and jailed for life, after what many legal observers have termed a fair trial." AFP adds, "However, the mastermind of the September 11 attacks, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed; Ramzi bin al-Shibh, the money-mover behind the strikes; and the supposed intended 20th hijacker, Mohammad al-Khatani, are in US hands. … So far, there is no sign that they will have their day in court. … And the head of Al-Qaeda, Osama bin Laden, remains at large, tormenting America over crackly tapes -- despite US vows to bring him to justice over September 11." AFP notes, "Mohammed, also known as KSM, even played a key role in the Moussaoui trial -- through a summary of his interrogations at a secret US jail, in which he directly contradicted Moussaoui's claims to have been a September 11 plotter. … Prosecutor David Novak stirred intrigue when he referred to Mohammed and other top Al-Qaeda plotters in closing arguments at the Moussaoui trial. … But US authorities have given no sign they are considering any kind of criminal proceeding or even a military tribunal for suspects like Mohammed, who has simply disappeared since his arrest in 2003. … A decision on Mohammed's future will be made 'after careful evaluation of the circumstances of this particular case,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in Vienna this week."

Bush Says He Wants Guantanamo Closed. The AP (5/7) reported comments President Bush made to German radio that "he would like to close the detention center in Guantanamo in Cuba, but is waiting for a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on whether inmates can face military tribunals. 'Obviously, the Guantanamo issue is a sensitive issue for people. I very much would like to end Guantanamo; I very much would like to get people to a court.'" The AP continued, "Bush said the United States 'is strong on human rights and civil rights. That's why we're leading the case in funding for HIV/AIDS in Africa. That's why we're trying to rally the nation to do something about Darfur…. That's why we provide food for the hungry. That's why we try to liberate people when we find them in the clutches of tyranny.'"

Administration Asks Agencies To Push Its Message On War On Terror. The Washington Post (5/8, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Career appointees at the Department of Agriculture were stunned last week to receive e-mailed instructions that include Bush administration 'talking points' -- saying things such as 'President Bush has a clear strategy for victory in Iraq' -- in every speech they give for the department. 'The President has requested that all members of his cabinet and sub-cabinet incorporate message points on the Global War on Terror into speeches, including specific examples of what each agency is doing to aid the reconstruction of Iraq,' the May 2 e-mail from USDA speechwriter Heather Vaughn began. … The e-mail provided language 'being used by Secretary [Michael O.] Johanns and deputy secretary [Charles F.] Conner in all of their remarks and is being sent to you for inclusion in your speeches.'"

UN Torture Committee Probing US Interrogation Tactics. The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Richey, 61K) reports, "The US government's use of aggressive interrogation tactics in the war on terror is under a United Nations microscope." The Bush Administration "has defended its tactics as a means of obtaining actionable intelligence to help thwart terror plots. Critics say it has opened the door to illegal abuse of detainees and even torture. Just how 'aggressive' the tactics have been is under close scrutiny by the UN's Committee Against Torture in Geneva." The Monitor adds, "A US delegation appeared before the committee Friday -- its first appearance since 9/11 -- and it is to face a second round of questioning Monday. The committee is expected to issue a report by May 19. Although it has no specific enforcement powers, the session is viewed as an opportunity to hold countries publicly accountable."

State Department Report Finds Use Of Suicide Attacks On Rise. The Washington Times (5/8, Sands, 90K) reports, "A quarter century into the modern age of suicide terrorism, specialists say the grim tactic is being used more frequently than ever before." The State Department, in its latest annual report on global terrorism, "said a surge in suicide attacks -- at sites ranging from the London subway to the Middle East to Afghanistan -- pushed the number of attacks to record heights last year." The report "counted some 3,000 deaths attributed to 360 suicide bombings last year. That compares with 472 suicide attacks in five years from 2000 to 2004 documented in a study by the Center for Strategic and International Studies; another study estimated 300 suicide attacks in all the years up to the middle of 2001."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Lawmakers Uneasy About Prospective CIA Nominee's Military Background. With President Bush expected to nominate Air Force General Michael Hayden to replace Porter Goss as director of the CIA, key GOP and Democratic lawmakers over the weekend questioned whether it was appropriate to place a military officer at the head of the Agency. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Solomon, 2.11M) reports "lawmakers from both parties said yesterday that there are concerns the military's growing involvement in intelligence collection, both overseas and domestically, could threaten Americans' civil liberties." Hayden's pick, adds the Journal, could also "prove contentious…because of his role in overseeing the White House's warrantless wiretapping program, which has been contested as illegal." USA Today (5/8, Diamond, 2.31M) focuses its report on that latter point, saying "some qualities that gained Hayden favor in the White House may complicate his confirmation." The Bush policy "most closely identified with Hayden is the program to intercept without court-approved warrants international calls and e-mails in the USA involving at least one person suspected of ties to terrorists."

The Washington Post (5/8, A1, Linzer, 744K) reports, "The challenges to Hayden's expected nomination come when Bush is politically at his weakest and Republicans are distancing themselves from the White House in the hopes of retaining their grip on Congress in the midterm elections." The White House "did not formally respond to the criticisms yesterday, but strategists said privately they are confident they can address Republican concerns and have Hayden confirmed." Vice President Cheney, "who is close both to Goss and to Hayden, said the next director will need to focus on the agency's core mission of sending out spies to collect information on targets such as al-Qaeda." NBC Nightly News (5/7, lead story, 3:30, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "The Vice President today told Kelly O'Donnell fighting terrorists has created fresh challenges for the CIA." Vice President Cheney: "It's a whole different kind of target. It places a much heavier emphasis on human intelligence than what was required necessarily before."

The New York Times (5/8, Mazzetti, Stolberg, 1.19M) runs a similar report under the headline "Republicans Fault A Top Pick To Lead The CIA," in which it notes "none of the Republican or Democratic lawmakers who appeared on television on Sunday or who were interviewed separately said directly that they would vote against General Hayden's nomination." But "Hoekstra's remarks, coupled with similar sentiments expressed by leading Senate Republicans, including Pat Roberts, the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, suggest that the general might not have an easy ride toward confirmation."

The story was the lead on ABC, while CBS and NBC reported it prominently as well. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, lead story, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Reaction to Hayden is mixed, at best, from Democrats and Republicans. After a series of failures, many on Capitol Hill are asking whether Hayden is the right man to turn things around." ABC (Morrell) added, "It looks like the biggest obstacle to Michael Hayden taking over the CIA, may not be the fact he ran the President's controversial domestic spying program, but rather his uniform." GOP Sen. Saxby Chambliss: "Now, just resigning commission and moving on, putting on a striped suit, a pinstriped suit versus an Air Force uniform, I don't think makes much difference." Morrell: "The issue for Republicans and Democrats alike, is independence." CBS Evening News (5/7, story 4, 2:30, Chen, 7.66M) said that "surprisingly, a key Republican, Chair of the House Intelligence Committee Peter Hoekstra today came out fiercely opposed to a Hayden nomination." GOP Rep. Peter Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, was shown saying, Bottom line: I do believe he's wrong person, the wrong place, at the wrong time. We should not have a military person leading a civilian agency at this time."

And NBC Nightly News (5/7, lead story, 3:30, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Even though Hayden has clashed with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in the past, critics say a four-star general could still have divided loyalties." James Bamford, intelligence expert: "I think he would be subject to too much influence from the Pentagon. I mean, his chain of command takes him right up to the Secretary of Defense." Mitchell: "Another issue: Hayden's leading role in warrantless surveillance, which he has vigorously defended."

The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Schmitt, 958K) this morning refers to the "surprising opposition" to Hayden, and says it is "unclear how Sunday's burst of concern might affect the timing or substance of that announcement, or whether it reflected concerns that had been previously aired with the administration behind closed doors." USA Today (5/8, Diamond, Jackson, 2.31M) reports that according to "officials: who "spoke on the condition they not be identified," the President has decided to name Hayden as the new CIA director, and "planned to make the announcement today."

Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, appearing on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace) said, "I've got a lot of respect for Mike Hayden," but "I think putting a general in charge…is going to send the wrong signal through the agency here in Washington, but also to our agents in the field around the world." Asked if he has relayed his concerns to the White House, Hoekstra replied, "I've given them my feedback. I don't think anything that I've said to you this morning is news to the White House." Also, GOP Sen. Saxby Chambliss, on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) said, "I too have a little bit of concern, frankly, about military personnel running the CIA. It is a civilian agency. It operates differently from the way that the Defense Intelligence Agency operates. But at the end of the day, Mike Hayden is just a class individual and somebody...who has an awful lot of experience."

Meanwhile, Democratic Rep. Jane Harman, on CNN's Late Edition (5/7, Blitzer) said, "Hayden is a capable man, but there are certain strikes against him. One is his military background. … It will send a bad signal to CIA employees in the field who are worried about a DOD takeover. A second is that he has a technical background. He doesn't have experience building the clandestine service, which is what the CIA needs to transition into. And the third thing is that it's not clear he will be independent of this White House."

Sen. John McCain came out in favor of Hayden, saying on CBS' Face the Nation (5/7, Schieffer), "Hayden is really more of an intelligence person than he is an Air Force officer. As you know, his career has been spent in that area, and his background -- of course, he comes from the NSA. I think that we should also remember that there had been other former military people who have been directors of the CIA."

GOP Sen. Pat Roberts, on CNN's Late Edition (5/7, Blitzer) said, "Here we have a man who everybody says is one of the best briefers that they've ever had on intelligence, a man who has been described by people on both sides of the aisle as probably knowing more about intelligence than anybody else. But there's some real concern about somebody from the military heading up the CIA. You can solve that pretty quickly by simply resigning in terms of his post of being a general and also putting in some deputies there that I think people would agree with, that have a strong civilian background and that would help the situation with the CIA as they transform and continue the transformation." Sen. Dianne Feinstein, on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) made a similar point, saying she thought Hayden is "a logical choice. He is very well respected. He is a professional. He has run an agency, the NSA, which is twice the size of the CIA." However, the CIA is "meant to be a civilian agency. So, you know, he might think about resigning his commission if he's going to do this."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, meanwhile, expressed "serious concerns" about Hayden's role in the domestic surveillance program. On NBC's Meet The Press (5/7, Russert), Pelosi said, "First of all, he's too closely tied to this question of domestic surveillance. … There is a power struggle going on between the Department of Defense and the entire rest of the intelligence community, so I don't see how you have a four-star general heading up the CIA."

The AP (5/8, Pickler) notes additional criticism of Hayden from Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, who said the general "could leave agents with the impression that the CIA has been 'just gobbled up by the Defense Department.'" And the Financial Times (5/8, Sevastopulo) reports "one former senior CIA officer said he was concerned that the Pentagon, which controls 80 per cent of the intelligence budget, was already encroaching into intelligence areas where they traditionally had little expertise." The Washington Times (5/8, Taylor, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Bipartisan Caution Over CIA Nominee."

The AP (5/8, Margasak) profiles Hayden, saying he "doesn't run from a fight, which is just what seemingly awaits the 61-year-old Air Force general expected to be named the new CIA chief. Weeks after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the then-head of the National Security Agency was telling intelligence-gathering teams how they would fight back: White House-approved electronic monitoring, without court orders, of the international calls and e-mails of people in the United States when terrorism was suspected."

The New York Times (5/8, Shane, 1.19M) reports Hayden "won generally high marks at the NSA, though he has acknowledged that the agency deserves some blame for the Sept. 11 and Iraq weapons failures." He also "admitted to Congress last year the failings of his ambitious program to upgrade the N.S.A.'s technology, known as Trailblazer, which by all accounts has cost billions for meager results."

Pelosi Claims Goss's Resignation Was Triggered By Cunningham Investigation. On NBC's Meet The Press (5/7, Russert) Pelosi also was asked if she believes Goss resigned voluntarily, Pelosi responded, "No. … Depending on the story, he's been on his way out for at least one month because of the struggle between him and Mr. Negroponte, but I think that this dismissal was triggered by what has been happening on the scandal front for the Republicans with the third in command, who was hired by Mr. Goss, to be involved in these card games and whatever else it was."

Goss Departure Seen As Signal Negroponte Is Exercising Power. Time (5/15, Duffy) reports that "last week's coup at the CIA, orchestrated by White House officials and Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, went only slightly awry -- and only at the last moment. Bush officials had hoped to take the weekend to quietly prepare for the surprise announcement," but Goss "wanted to control the choreography." Goss "had been hired as CIA chief at the very moment the job began to lose its clout. Less than a year after Goss stepped into the Langley, Va., post, Bush named Negroponte director of national intelligence (DNI) and gave him the authority to oversee and direct 16 intelligence shops -- among them the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the FBI. … Goss's departure was, above all, a signal that Negroponte was finally exercising his powers and trying to slip the stray agencies into harness."

Staring Down Pentagon Seen As Negroponte's Next Test. Time (5/15, Duffy) reports, "Goss's departure means Negroponte's next test will be facing down the Pentagon, which has steadily been gathering clout in intelligence since the war on terrorism began. Everyone knows that battle will make the tug of war with the CIA look like a warm-up, if only because Rumsfeld's skills as an infighter are unsurpassed."

Investigators Interested In Foggo's Role In Cunningham Bribery Scandal. Newsweek (5/15) reports in its "Periscope" column that outgoing CIA Director Porter Goss "leaves an outfit that has far more resources than it did five years ago, but still seems to be struggling with low morale and turf battles. Emblematic of the CIA's woes is its number-three man, Executive Director Kyle (Dusty) Foggo." Federal investigators "are examining Foggo's ties to a congressional bribery scandal. Foggo was a high-school football teammate and college buddy of Brent Wilkes's, a defense contractor who was identified as an unindicted co-conspirator when former San Diego congressman and ex-Navy air ace Randy (Duke) Cunningham pleaded guilty. The CIA has acknowledged that its internal watchdog is investigating if Foggo helped steer any contracts to Wilkes. According to three sources who declined to be identified commenting on the details of a government probe, there are also indications that the Feds are interested in Foggo's role in the wider Cunningham bribery scandal."

Time (5/15, Duffy) reports, "A source close to the investigation tells TIME that the Justice Department is investigating reports that one of Cunningham's benefactors, Pentagon and CIA contractor Brent Wilkes, a buddy of Foggo's since high school, provided Foggo with improper gifts, such as lavish vacations. A CIA spokesman says Foggo 'denies any improper gifts,' and Wilkes' lawyer has similarly denied any wrongdoing."

Gorelick Says CIA Is Demoralized. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 2, 1:00, Harris, 8.78M) last night interviewed former 9/11 Commissioner Jamie Gorelick, who said, "The CIA is demoralized. It has lost a great deal of talent. And the first thing for a new leader will be to really build up the esprit decor and the sense of mission and lead the place." Harris: "What does low morale mean for national security?" Gorelick: "It's a disaster. We've lost some of the key operatives, some of the key analysts over the last 12 months. And it's been a terrible event for the CIA. So, we are hurting in a place we need to be strong."

The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Bowers, 61K) reports, "Morale, already low, plummeted further as Goss's team aggressively sought to identify the sources of leaks of classified information to the press, leading to a recent dismissal of a senior CIA official. … If nominated and confirmed, General Hayden will inherit the morale problems as well as the continued difficulties with collecting human intelligence."

Kristol Calls Decision To Replace Goss "An Outrage." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace), said, "I think Porter Goss was doing what he had to do. I think he was trying to carry out the President's agenda. He took a lot of heat from the permanent bureaucracy at the agency. He fired someone two weeks ago for leaking, which the President wanted, and his reward was to be fired. And I think it's an outrage, and I think it's a terrible signal to conservatives anywhere…in the federal government who are trying to carry out the president's agenda against the bureaucracy, that, unfortunately, the White House is not going to stand behind them."

More Commentary On Goss Departure. USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) editorializes that "the forced resignation after just 19 months of Porter Goss, a Republican congressman and former CIA operative brought in after Tenet to fix the agency, was a minor tremor. But it was also a reminder that the nation's spy apparatus remains ill-prepared to cope with the terrorist threat." Goss "became known more as a wrecking ball than a Mr. Fixit. He lacked experience as a manager of thousands of employees, and the deputies he brought in were widely criticized. Experienced officers and leaders fled. Even more troubling, Goss seemed not to recognize that the time had finally arrived to change the CIA's role."

Historian's Book Blames Bush, Chertoff, Nagin For Katrina Aftermath. In USA Today (5/8, 2.31M), Bob Minzesheimer reviews historian Douglas Brinkley's "account of the natural and man-made disasters that were Hurricane Katrina indicts three public officials he holds most responsible for the chaos that followed the storm. The Great Deluge blames 'the incompetence of George W. Bush, who acted as though he were disinterested in a natural disaster in which there was no enemy to be found.' It says the inaction of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff 'cost lives' and holds Chertoff more culpable than the much-ridiculed Michael Brown, the former FEMA director. And it portrays New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin as gutless, paranoid and 'cracking at the seams' when he needed to be decisive."

Mississippi Teacher Recognized. USA Today (5/8, Kaffer, 2.31M) profiles Mississippi teacher Christina Ross Daniels, a member of "the 2005 All-USA Teacher Team, USA TODAY's recognition program for outstanding K-12 teachers." Daniels "teaches behavior modification at the Picayune Center for Alternative Education. Her kids are all designated 'at risk.'" But "even Daniels' ingenuity was taxed after Katrina. Textbooks, materials and furniture were destroyed. Before the storm, the classroom was a cheery place with bright curtains and art on the walls."

New Orleans Landfill Decision Draws Fire. The New York Times (5/8, Eaton, 1.19M) reports New Orleans officials "have decided where several million tons of" the remains of houses destroyed by Hurricane Katrina "will be dumped: in man-made pits at the swampy eastern edge of town, out by the coffee-roasting plant and the space-shuttle factory and the big wildlife refuge. But more than a thousand Vietnamese-American families live less than two miles from the edge of the new landfill. And they are far from pleased at having the moldering remains of a national disaster plunked down nearby, alongside the canal that flooded their neighborhood when Hurricane Katrina surged through last year." Environmental groups "are also angry, accusing local and federal officials of ignoring or circumventing their own regulations, long after the immediate emergency has ended."

Davis, Shuster Criticize Senate Proposal To Replace FEMA. In a Washington Times op-ed (5/8), Reps. Tom Davis and Bill Shuster say, "A Senate committee recommendation to replace the Federal Emergency Management Agency with an even larger bureaucracy inside the Department of Homeland Security would compound, not solve, the problems laid bare by Hurricane Katrina. Creating the proposed National Preparedness and Response Authority (NPRA) only rearranges the deck chairs on the good ship DHS, while failing to address the most basic structural flaws that all agree hobbled the nation's response to the storm. Instead, we should go back to basics, back to the configuration and mission that enabled FEMA to succeed."

New Orleans Celebrates Jazz Festival. The CBS Evening News (5/7, story 9, 3:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The Big Easy has been back in full swing for the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival, which wraps up tonight. It has been a celebration of the past and a key to the future of an endangered city."

Swimming Pools Are Potential Mosquito Hazard In New Orleans. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 11, 2:15, Savidge, 9.87M) reported, "In the flood-ravaged neighborhoods of New Orleans, thousands of abandoned swimming pools have become giant mosquito maternity wards. More than just a nuisance, they're a danger. Public health expert Dr. James Diaz says conditions in many neighborhoods are ripe for an epidemic." One of the biggest challenges was simply finding pools. There's no city directory that tells you where they are or even how many there are. Satellite pictures are a big help and so is the faith-based charity, Operation Blessing, which provides volunteers and the fish." Costing "about a dime each, the fish are poured into pools where they will eat the bugs and make more fish: A simple solution for a big problem of so many pools."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Hit By Wave Of Suicide Attacks, Car Bombs. Iraq was hit by a wave of violence over the weekend, with reports of multiple car bombs and suicide attacks. The story was the lead on CBS and ran second on NBC; ABC reported it in a brief segment. CBS Evening News (5/7, lead story, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Car bomb explosions in Baghdad and the Shiite holy city of Karbala killed at least 16 people and the US Command today reported the death of a US Marine in Anbar province. The US death toll stands at 2,418 while 4,000 civilians were killed in sectarian violence in the first three months of this year alone."

NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 2, 2:05, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq, this was one of the most violent and deadly days in weeks. There were more suicide car bombings and a gruesome discovery, more bodies of Iraqis believed to be the victims of torture." NBC (Aspell) added, "Iraqi government officials insist the suicide bombers are mostly foreigners." Mowafaq Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Advisor: "We see them of Saudi origin. We see them of Egyptian origin, coming from Algeria, crossing the borders from Syria." Aspell: "But an underground war between Sunnis and Shiites in Baghdad has claimed more victims than suicide bombings lately. Police say the bodies of 42 men -- blindfolded and shot -- have been found in the past 24 hours."

ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 3, 0:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Another big challenge for the CIA, tracking terrorists, in Iraq. Today, in that country, 3 suicide bombers killed 16 Iraqis. Also, 35 bodies tortured and shot were dumped at a hospital in Baghdad. Almost 4,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed in Baghdad in the first three months of this year. That is the highest number since the fall of Saddam Hussein."

The AP (5/8, Reid) reports the violence cast "doubt on US hopes that formation of a new government alone would provide a quick end to the country's violence." The New York Times (5/8, Oppel, 1.19M), Washington Post (5/8, A11, Sebti, Sarhan, 744K), Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Murphy, 61K) and USA Today (5/8, 2.31M), among other sources, also report on the violence.

British Troops Attacked After Reporting To Site Of Helicopter Crash. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 2, 2:05, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Southern Iraq, violence of a different kind this weekend, after British troops were attacked with rocks and Molotov cocktails when they rushed to the site of a helicopter crash in Basra Saturday. The British say 5 Iraqis were killed by Shiite militiamen firing at them from behind the crowd. Today, Basra was quiet after an overnight curfew."

Border Forts Designed To Stop Foreign Insurgents. The AP (5/8, Wagner) reports, "They look more like motels in rural America than forts in a war zone, but a string of low concrete structures are the US-led coalition's first line of defense against foreign fighters trying to sneak into Iraq from Iran and Syria." The United States "has built or renovated nearly 260 forts along Iraq's borders, and installations like Fort Tarik south of the Iranian city of Mehran have taken on new importance because of the showdown with Tehran over its disputed nuclear program. … Border patrols based at Fort Tarik recently captured several suspected Iranian intelligence agents who had crossed into Iraq, a US official said."

Kurdish Government Unifies. The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Daragahi, Rainey, 958K) reports that Iraqi politicians took a break from government formation talks Sunday to inaugurate the Kurds' new regional administration in Irbil. According to the Times, the Kurds "unveiled a new Cabinet, nominally reunifying the government. Kurdish Prime Minister Nechirvan Barzani announced a newly created Ministry of Natural Resources to manage and exploit newly discovered oil and energy deposits. He also vowed to support 'newly liberated' parts of the Kurdish region, including Kirkuk."

Biden Promotes Plan To Decentralize Iraq. Sen. Joseph Biden writes in USA Today (5/8, 2.31M), "President Bush does not have a strategy for victory in Iraq. His strategy is to prevent defeat and to hand the problem off to his successor. Meanwhile, the frustration of Americans is mounting so fast that Congress might end up mandating a rapid withdrawal, even at the risk of trading a dictator for chaos. Both are bad alternatives." Biden adds, "There is a third way. The idea is to maintain a unified Iraq by decentralizing it and giving Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis their own regions. The central government would be left in charge of common interests, such as border security and the distribution of oil revenue. Everything I'm proposing is already in Iraq's constitution. … The only way to hold Iraq together and create conditions for our troops to responsibly withdraw is to give Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds room to breathe in their own regions."

However, in an editorial titled "3 Iraqs Not Better Than 1," USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) says, "The minimum US objective in Iraq has to be to leave behind a relatively stable, democratic country that isn't a haven for terrorists. Ultimately, Iraq might well break down along sectarian lines or descend into full-scale civil war. If that happens, however, it should be despite the best efforts of the United States, not with its encouragement."

National Guard Could Be Phased Out Of Combat Operations Next Year. National Guard troops in Iraq could be phased out of major combat responsibilities nest year, the Los Angeles Times (5/8, Barnes, 958K) reports. Iraq "was an important test of whether the Army could use the Guard more aggressively -- and not just as a last resort. … Leaders of the Guard say their Iraq service has made their force the most capable and experienced it has ever been. But the experience also has exposed weaknesses. Some active-duty soldiers argue the Guard was less prepared for the complexities of Iraq, while guardsmen complain they were subjected to longer separations from their families than active duty counterparts and had to train on out-of-date equipment."

Navy, Air Force Train Soldiers To Do Army Jobs. The Navy and Air Force are training their soldiers for jobs typically performed by the Army in Iraq and Afghanistan. USA Today (5/8, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "Navy and Air Force personnel are replacing Army soldiers to carry out such duties as guarding convoys, patrolling bases and watching for homemade bombs, the top killer of U.S. troops in Iraq. The Navy also is running a prison in Iraq, patrolling rivers and helping to clear and search buildings. … The Air Force has not said how many airmen are doing Army jobs."

US Troops Searching For Bin Laden In Kunar Province. CBS Evening News (5/7, story 3, 1:10, Van Dyke, 7.66M) reported, "In mid-April the US had 2,500 soldiers with Afghan soldiers and in 'Operation Mountain Lion,' the biggest operation in Afghanistan since the US invasion in October 2001. … They are searching for Osama bin Laden. The Pakistani Interior Ministry three weeks ago said they thought Osama bin Laden is in Kunar province and the US tried to hit the number two of al-Qaeda just 50 miles from where this helicopter went down in Pakistan so there's really no difference between Kunar province and Pakistan in this area. This is very strong al-Qaeda and Taliban area."

Ten US Soldiers Killed In Afghanistan Helicopter Crash. Ten US soldiers from Fort Drum in New York were killed in a helicopter crash in Afghanistan Friday. USA Today (5/8, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports, "They died when their CH-47 Chinook transport helicopter crashed near Asadabad in Afghanistan's Kunar province, according to the Pentagon."

CBS Evening News (5/7, story 2, 1:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "US military officials said today that enemy fire did not cause the crash of a Chinook helicopter in eastern Afghanistan Friday, which killed ten Americans. While the cause is still under investigation, the tragedy is being felt hard in Fort Drum, New York, home of the Army's 10th Mountain Division where the fallen soldiers were based." CBS (Miller) added, "The military says the helicopter in Friday's crash was not shot down and it is investigating what went wrong. It's the deadliest accident for US forces this year, the deadliest for Fort Drum since a helicopter crashed on base three years ago."

NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 3, 0:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Military officials in Afghanistan say the bodies of 10 American soldiers have been recovered from the site of yesterday's helicopter crash. The Chinook chopper went down in the eastern mountains of Kunar Province."

Growing Number Of Afghan Women Starting Businesses. The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Montero, 61K) reports that a growing number of female entrepreneurs in Afghanistan are "emerging from the isolation of war and oppression of the Taliban to contribute toward a more prosperous nation and greater independence for women, observers say. According to Microfinance Times, 75 percent of all active microcredit borrowers in Afghanistan are now women, many of whom use their loans to start businesses. … Their efforts, observers say, are indispensable in the struggle to reverse decades of deprivation in Afghanistan."

In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M), Kate Buggeln, a member of the governing board of the Business Council for Peace, writes, "Small- and medium-size entrepreneurs are emerging in Afghanistan. If nurtured, these local business owners will create the economic platform that opens the door for big international business. Some of these entrepreneurs are women, who are even greater proof of the cultural transformation. With little to lose and everything to gain, such women are stepping beyond the Taliban's legacy."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

11 Circuit Curbs Reduction Of Former HealthSouth Executive's Sentence. The Miami Daily Business Review (5/8, Jones) reports, "A federal appellate court ruled Friday that the five-year, probationary sentence given to HealthSouth executive Malcolm E. McVay was too extreme a reduction from prosecutors' recommended sentence of 65 months of prison time." The Review continues, "The three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta said that U.S. District Judge U.W. Clemon in Birmingham, Ala., gave the reduced sentence 'virtually without explanation, and on a wholly improper basis.' Federal judges are bound to consult the federal criminal sentencing guidelines, though they are not obliged to follow them since a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last year." The Review continues, "The 11th Circuit panel noted that McVay was the fourth defendant in the HealthSouth scandal for which the appellate court overturned a trial court's downward departure in sentencing." The Review adds, "The appellate panel remanded McVay's case to the Northern District of Alabama for resentencing consistent with the court's opinion. Although the federal sentencing guidelines are now advisory, appellate courts still can overturn a sentence if the decrease is too dramatic, just as it can when a sentence is enhanced too much. … The HealthSouth scandal involved allegations that company executives, including founder and chief executive Richard Scrushy, improperly inflated its earnings by $400 million. McVay served as chief financial officer, senior vice president and treasurer. The resulting scandal caused a loss in stock price that amounted to $1.4 billion."

Few In Houston Notice Enron Trial. USA Today/AP (5/8, Hays) reports, "Former Enron employees and other Houstonians are going about their lives without dissecting the [Enron] case over water coolers." It adds, "Most say they are more interested in the outcome than the journey" and predicts that "the trial's end likely will renew interest."

Zale CFO Is Put on Leave. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Zimmerman) reports, "Zale Corp. said it placed Chief Financial Officer Mark Lenz on indefinite administrative leave for failing to timely disclose delayed vendor payments that bolstered Zale's 2005 net cash flow." The Journal reports, "The delay of up to $8.2 million in payments didn't affect reported revenue and earnings but did increase net cash flow, the company said." Zale has had previous problems with the SEC: the Journal writes, "The SEC is also investigating how Zale accounted for extended-service agreements, leases and payroll accrual. Also, the SEC had requested material on executive compensation and severance, earnings forecasts, stock trading and the timing of certain vendor payments."

Investors May Take Heart From Citigroup Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Riley) reports, "An arbitration ruling against Citigroup Inc.'s wealth-management unit may lead to similar cases being brought by affluent investors who lost money in portfolios that contained more risk than they say they were led to believe." An NASD arbitration panel ruled that "Citigroup must pay $900,000 to an Ohio couple who lost $1.23 million in retirement savings in less than four years" after entrusting the money to Citigroup's Smith Barney subsidiary. The couple's attorney said, "I tend to believe there were a lot of people taken in by this," thus implying the possibility of future suits. However, the Journal writes, "Under NASD arbitration rules, the legal concept of 'precedent' doesn't apply, so the future impact of the ruling is difficult to measure. Citigroup doesn't plan to appeal the ruling."

Study Says Smaller Firms Pay Higher Costs To Comply With Sarbanes-Oxley. A GAO study has found that smaller companies are paying disproportionately higher costs to comply with new investor-protection rules. The Washington Post (5/8, A10, Day, 744K) reports, "The effect on small and mid-size public companies has been debated since the new rules were adopted by Congress as part of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002." The GAO report "says the full cost and other effects of the new rules won't be known for years because the Securities and Exchange Commission has extended the deadline for small firms' compliance until next year. Even so, the report says, 'regulators, public companies, audit firms and investors generally agree' that the law has had 'a positive and significant impact on investor protection and confidence.'"

Author Suggests How Carnegie Might Address High Executive Pay. Author Curt Weeden writes in USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) that Andrew Carnegie would argue that there is a "connection between surging executive pay and relatively sluggish corporate philanthropy." Weeden adds, "Because shareholders and other stakeholders are showing more and more displeasure about the widening compensation gap between the highest- and lowest-paid workers, here's how Carnegie might try to calm the waters: CEOs and other executives whose compensation is made public in proxy reports would voluntarily agree to donate 50% of their annual increases in salary, bonus and realized long-term compensation to community foundations or other broad-based groups in locations where their companies have a presence or interest. Executives would openly disclose the value of their 'Carnegie Commitments' and would pledge that these special grants would not offset any of their other personal charitable donations. A community-based funding agency would determine how a CEO's gift would best meet high-priority local needs, thus removing any perception of self-interest."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Reportedly Close To Final Decision On Rove. The Washington Post (5/8, A1, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald is wrapping up his investigation into White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove's role in the CIA leak case by weighing this central question: Did Rove, who was deeply involved in defending President Bush's use of prewar intelligence about Iraq, lie about a key conversation with a reporter that was aimed at rebutting a tough White House critic?" Fitzgerald, "according to sources close to the case, is reviewing testimony from Rove's five appearances before the grand jury." Fitzgerald "is weighing Rove's foggy-memory defense against evidence he has acquired over nearly 2 1/2 years that shows Rove was very involved in White House efforts to beat back allegations that Bush twisted US intelligence to justify the Iraq war, according to sources involved in the case." Rove "expects to learn as soon as this month if he will be indicted -- or publicly cleared of wrongdoing." An indictment "would be devastating to a White House already battered by low poll numbers, a staff shake-up and a stalled agenda. If Rove is cleared, however, it would allow Bush's longtime top aide to resume his central role as White House strategic guru without a legal threat hanging over him."

Judge Delays Chicago Mob Trials Until May 2007. The Chicago Tribune (5/7, 643K) reported, "The trial of reputed mob boss Joey 'the Clown' Lombardo and 11 others accused of Outfit-related murders and extortion will not begin for more than a year, a federal judge said Friday. U.S. District Judge James Zagel pushed the trial back six months, to May 15, 2007, to accommodate defense lawyers who were committed to other cases, including the March 2007 trial of former Hollinger chief executive Conrad Black. The new trial date is 'essentially unmovable,' Zagel told lawyers at a status hearing Friday."

Judge To Hear Mafia Cop's Complaints About Defense Attorney. The New York Post (5/6, Singer, 624K) reported, "Mob cop Louis Eppolito will be allowed to air his gripes about his flashy former lawyer Bruce Cutler -- who he says defended him poorly at his murder trial. At the convicted killer's request, Brooklyn federal Judge Jack Weinstein ordered lawyers back into court June 29 to hash out the matter, including Cutler." The Post notes, "The hearing is unlikely to have an impact on whether Weinstein will throw out the conviction, because the judge has already hinted strongly that he would let an appeals court decide the matter."

New York Lawmakers Seek DOJ Action On Fake Police Badge Sales. Long Island Newsday (5/8, Virasami) reports, "Fake police badges continue to be available for sale with just a few clicks on the Internet, months after a federal ban took effect, Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-Forest Hills) said Sunday." Newsday continues, "Joined by Rep. Jerrold Nadler(D-Manhattan), the lawmakers called on the Justice Department to do more to crack down on retailers that sell police badges they fear could be used by criminals. … 'Criminals in Brooklyn and across New York City continue to use fake badges because the Department of Justice has dropped the ball,' Weiner said. 'With a few dollars and the click of a mouse, anyone can still impersonate a New York City police officer.' … They sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting that the ban be enforced."

Politicians Go Silent On Maryland Sniper Trial. The Washington Times (5/8, Ward) reports, "The trial for convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad has been under way for a week in Montgomery County, but the politicians who held numerous press conferences during his three-week rampage in 2002 are silent." Observers attribute the silence of County Executive Douglas Duncan and State's Attorney Douglas Gansler to their desire to protect their ambitions for "statewide office." Duncan is running for governor; Gansler will run for attorney general if incumbent Joseph Curran retires.

Nonprofit Group Official's Bank Records Under Scrutiny In HUD Probe. The Washington Times (5/8, McElhatton) reports, "A probe into the use of federal housing money in the District has led investigators to examine the personal bank records of the chief executive of a prominent nonprofit group, court records show. Bessie E. Swann, executive director for the District-based Wheeler Creek Estates Community Development Corp., tried last year to stop investigators from obtaining her bank records, but a judge recently granted them access on the grounds that the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) was conducting a 'legitimate and reasonable' law-enforcement inquiry, court records show. Wheeler Creek is a 314-unit housing development in Southeast, and Miss Swann has won praise for the nonprofit group's work transforming old public housing into a mix of rental properties and resident-owned homes." The Times notes, "The group, which also oversees job training and senior-citizen services, has received funding through HUD and the D.C. Housing Authority. Wheeler Creek receives most of its $3 million in annual revenue through government grants, tax records show. The financial records also show Miss Swann's compensation has nearly tripled in recent years."

Professor Decries Administration "Threats" To Prosecute Newspapers. Geoffrey R. Stone, a law professor at the University of Chicago, writes in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M) that presidential administrations "have never been inclined to criminally prosecute the news media for publishing information they would rather keep secret. In recent weeks, however, the Bush administration and its advocates, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, have spoken of prosecuting," under the Espionage Act, "The Washington Post and The New York Times for publishing Pulitzer Prize-winning exposés of the administration's secret prisons in Eastern Europe and secret National Security Agency surveillance of Americans." Stone adds, "Although the threats of the White House are largely bluster, they must nonetheless be taken seriously. Not because newspapers are really in danger of being prosecuted, but because such intimidation is the latest step in this administration's relentless campaign to control the press and keep the American people in the dark."

CIVIL LAW:

Tobacco Case Features Allegations Of Conflicting Claims. The Nationial Law Journal (5/8, Geier) reports, "An Ohio state court judge is allowing lawyers for Lorillard Tobacco Co. to depose counsel in two asbestos plaintiffs' firms concerning allegedly inconsistent claims they filed relating to the same client's mesothelioma." The Journal continues, "The case of mesothelioma victim Harry Kananian's estate against Lorillard got hung up in Cuyahoga County Court of Common Pleas when the defense told the court that there were conflicting claims in other litigation filed on his behalf. Kananian v. Lorillard Tobacco Co., No. 442750 (Cuyahoga Co., Ohio, Ct. C. P.)." The Journal adds, "James F. Early, a principal of Early, Ludwick, Sweeney & Strauss of New Haven, Conn., one of the firms Lorillard will take discovery from, said his firm amended Kananian's claims when later testimony indicated the original filings were inaccurate or incomplete. The firm also volunteered to return to the trusts any parts of awards that they determined to have been unearned. 'You do the best you can with the information you have, especially when your clients are dying of mesothelioma,' Early said. … Both Early Ludwick and Brayton Purcell filed claims on behalf of Kananian and his family based on his military and occupational exposure to asbestos."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

"Unconscious Bias" Expert In Demand For Employment Bias Lawsuits. Business Week (5/15, Orey) reports that in the forum of employment law, "sociologist William T. Bielby is the leading courtroom proponent of a simple but powerful theory: 'unconscious bias.' He contends that white men will inevitably slight women and minorities because they just can't help themselves. So he tries to convince judges that no evidence of overt discrimination -- no smoking gun memo, for instance -- is needed to prove a case. As Allen G. King, an employment defense attorney at the Dallas office of Littler Mendelson, puts it: 'I just have to leave you to your own devices, and because you are a white male,' you will discriminate." Bielby has served "as an expert witness in dozens of major cases, including those currently pending against Wal-Mart (WMT), FedEx (FDX), Johnson & Johnson (JNJ), and Cargill. For plaintiffs, Bielby's fees -- now $450 an hour, and totaling $30,000 or more per case -- are often worth it. Numerous lawsuits in which he has been involved have ended in big dollar settlements, including suits against Merrill Lynch (MER), Morgan Stanley (MS), and Home Depot (HD). In 2004 a federal judge in San Francisco cited Bielby's testimony when he agreed to let the largest-ever employment class action go forward against Wal-Mart Stores Inc. The company is appealing but could face gender bias claims on behalf of more than 1 million women."

New Sorority Is Based On Islamic Principles. The Washington Post (5/8, B1, Kinzie, 744K) reports on a new sorority at the University of Maryland Baltimore County. The sorority, for Islamic women, "started with Althia Collins, an educational consultant in Alexandria, and her daughter Imani Abdul-Haqq, who wanted to pledge a sorority in North Carolina. When Abdul-Haqq walked in with her hijab , Collins said, 'everyone looked at her like she had three heads.' Collins and her daughter, who became Muslim several years ago, thought sororities' emphasis on volunteering and leadership would make Muslim women more visible and help dispel stereotypes."

ANTITRUST:

Wachovia Buys Golden West For $26 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Berman, Mollenkamp, Bauerlein) reports, "Wachovia Corp. struck a roughly $26 billion stock-and-cash deal to buy Golden West Financial Corp., making a big gamble on the volatile mortgage business as it extends its ambition to become a true national bank." It observes, "Wachovia agreed to pay 1.051 shares of its stock, valued at $62.42 based on Friday's closing prices, plus $18.65 in cash for each share of Golden West. The price represents a roughly 15% premium to Golden West's current market value." The Journal characterizes Wachovia as "the most voracious of all [banking consolidators], forging about 140 takeovers and mergers -- large and small." The Journal writes, "The deal is expected to close in this year's fourth quarter." USA Today (5/8, Woodyard) reports the deal will extend Wachovia's "reach in high-growth Sun Belt markets." The New York Times (5/8, Sorkin, Creswell) reports, "While the deal will give Wachovia a strong foothold in the mortgage-lending space, there are growing concerns among investors and Wall Street analysts that growth in that business may have peaked as interest rates creep higher."

Fisher And Thermo Are Near Deal. The New York Times (5/8, Sorkin, Pollack) reports, "Fisher Scientific International, a supplier of medical laboratory equipment, was near a deal last night to merge with Thermo Electron Corporation, a rival, in a deal valued at about $11 billion." The merger would "create a new giant in the laboratory instrument business, an industry that has already been marked by some degree of consolidation." The Times writes, "An announcement of the deal is expected today, though people involved in the talks warned that the talks could collapse. The transaction is unusual in that Thermo Electron, which has only about half the revenues of Fisher, is technically the acquirer in the deal." The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Berman) reports, "Under the terms approved by both boards last night, Fisher shareholders will receive two shares of Thermo, which closed Friday at $39.45 each on the New York Stock Exchange. At a combined $78.90, Thermo's offer represents a premium of 7% to Fisher shareholders based on where the two stocks closed trading on Friday."

ENVIRONMENT:

BP Texas Refinery Called Nation's Biggest Polluter. The AP (5/8) reports, "The nation's worst polluting plant is the BP PLC oil refinery where 15 workers died in an explosion last year, raising questions about whether the company has been underreporting toxic emissions." The AP continues, "BP's Texas City refinery released three times as much pollution in 2004 as it did in 2003, according to the most recent data from the Environmental Protection Agency. … The increase at BP was so large that it accounted for the bulk of a 15 percent increase in refinery emissions nationwide in 2004, the highest level since 2000." The AP adds, "The company is investigating whether it has been accurately documenting pollution, the Houston Chronicle reported on Sunday. There could be more federal fines levied against the energy giant if mistakes are found. … BP already faces a record $21.3 million fine from the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration for 300 safety and health violations found at the Texas City refinery after the deadly explosion in March 2005 that also injured 170 workers. … BP still faces criticism for management lapses that may have contributed to last year's explosion. The company faces a possible Justice Department investigation and is dealing with victims' lawsuits."

Former USDA Secretaries Call For Farm Policy Overhaul. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, A2, Roberts, 2.11M) reports, "US farm policy is outdated and needs to be overhauled in light of emerging global markets and tighter federal budgets," according to the American Farmland Trust that has the endorsement of two former agriculture secretaries. In a report to be released today, the Washington-based farmers group will "call on Congress to revamp the nation's agriculture programs rather than extend the 2002 Farm Bill before it expires next year." The plan, which will propose a new "safety net" for commodity-crop programs to replace certain subsidy programs, has been endorsed by former agriculture secretaries Dan Glickman and Clayton Yeutter.

Bond Said To Be Blocking Shift To Lower Emission Lawnmowers. The CBS Evening News (5/7, story 8, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported lawnmowers are "loud" and they "fill the air with surprising amounts of pollutants, but efforts to reduce more emissions are being stymied." CBS (Bowen) added, "It may not look like a pollution monster, but California officials say the old family lawnmower is a smog machine -- taken all together, little engines that foul the state's air with 22 tons of pollutants a day, the equivalent of 800,000 cars a day." Adding catalytic converters "to lawnmower engines, the same device used on cars to cut smog. But Briggs & Stratton, America's largest mower engine manufacturer is strongly resisting, and with two plants in Missouri the company is getting some extraordinary help from Missouri Senator Christopher Bond." The Senator "has been able to delay new regulations in California by requiring EPA studies of the standards and when the EPA approved the new standards, Bond's office complained the EPA study was flawed."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Official Calls Bald Resignation "Slap" At Mueller. Under the headline "FBI Counterterror Chief Bald Bolts For Exit," CQ (5/8, Stein) reports that "after just eight months on the job," NSS Director Gary Bald "abruptly submitted his resignation to agency director Robert S. Mueller III. … FBI sources dismiss the idea that Bald, never a popular figure around the J. Edgar Hoover Building, was leaving for anything but a chance to retire comfortably," but "the hasty exit 'seems like a slap at the director,' one of Bald's predecessors said in an e-mail. 'It looks bad externally. Internally some are happy.'" CQ notes the "sharp questioning" Mueller received last week before the Senate Judiciary Committee about turnover, and adds that although "no replacement has been named," a "dark horse is Art Cummings, a Mueller favorite who…now runs the National Security Branch for the Washington Field Office. Whoever the choice, Mueller has to be hoping the seventh time is the charm."

Federal Law Limits Sale Of Some Medications. The Long Island Newsday (5/6, Ochs) reports that on April 8, federal law "began limiting the sale of over-the-counter cough and sinus products such as Sudafed and Claritin D with pseudoephedrine, ephedrine or phenylpropanolamine. … The law says that a person can buy no more than 3.6 grams per day of products with pseudoephedrine, ephedrine or phenylpropanolamine. That translates to 73 60-mg tablets, said Rusty Payne, spokesman for the federal Drug Enforcement Agency."

North Dakota Seeks To Allow Farmers To Grow Industrial Hemp. The AP (5/8) reports North Dakota "is pushing ahead with plans to license state farmers to grow industrial hemp even as it tries to allay law enforcement fears about marijuana's biological cousin. State Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson and his department are crafting hemp rules after meeting in February with Drug Enforcement Agency officials in Washington. A public hearing on the proposed rules is slated for June 15." More than 20 news outlets published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sites the AP story, including The Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, and Miami Herald.

New Source Of Heroin Said To Be Increasing Demand In St. Louis Area. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (5/7) reports an incident that "kicked off a series of heroin seizures" also was an "early sign of a troubling, yet largely unnoticed, trend in the St. Louis area: the rise of a new source of heroin that is increasing the overall supply and expanding demand." The Post-Dispatch adds that the volume of Afghan heroin, which the United Nations "says now accounts for 87 percent of the world supply" means that even a small share "making its way to the United States constitutes large quantities of the drug. Afghan heroin now represents up to 20 percent of all heroin in the United States, Drug Enforcement Administration officials say."

Alaska House Passes Marijuana, Meth Bill. The AP (5/6, Volz) reports the Alaska House "passed legislation Friday night that would restore criminal penalties for marijuana possession and make it tougher to buy the ingredients to manufacture methamphetamine. The bill was approved by the Senate last month and now goes to Gov. Frank Murkowski to sign into law. … The bill says marijuana is a more potent and dangerous drug than it was 30 years ago."

The Juneau Empire (5/7) reports the vote "came up a day after Gov. Frank Murkowski called a news conference and put the 'methijuana' bill on his must pass list for the remainder of the session, which ends Tuesday night. … According to the bill, those possessing more than 4 ounces would be charged with a Class C felony, which would carry a maximum prison sentence of five years."

The Juneau Empire (5/5) also reported Murkowski "said the drug legislation, House Bill 149, is significant for children who are at risk from domestic abuse from meth addicts or want a future career in Alaska. Too many military recruits and other job applicants in Alaska fail their drug urine tests, the governor and his labor commissioner, Greg O'Claray, said."

Local TV Coverage. KCAL-TV, Los Angeles (5/6, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Alaska has the most liberal laws on marijuana possession in the country, but that could soon change. The Alaska House passed legislation yesterday that would restore criminal penalties for marijuana possession. The bill has already been approved by the Alaska Senate and now goes to Governor Frank Murkowski whose backed it from the beginning. A…decision by the Alaska Supreme Court legalized the use of small amounts of pot."

Nigerian Report On Drug Testing Accuses Pfizer Of Violating International Law. The Washington Post (5/7, A1, Stephens, 744K) reports, "A panel of Nigerian medical experts has concluded that Pfizer Inc. violated international law during a 1996 epidemic by testing an unapproved drug on children with brain infections at a field hospital. That finding is detailed in a lengthy Nigerian government report that has remained unreleased for five years, despite inquiries from the children's attorneys and from the media." According to the Post, "The report concludes that Pfizer never obtained authorization from the Nigerian government to give the unproven drug to nearly 100 children and infants. ... Pfizer's experiment was 'an illegal trial of an unregistered drug,' the Nigerian panel concluded, and a 'clear case of exploitation of the ignorant.'"

Network TV Coverage. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 5, 0:30, Harris) reported, "There are allegations reported today that Pfizer tested an experimental drug on children and infants in Nigeria without informing parents or getting permission. 'The Washington Post' says the Nigerian government says about 100 patients received a drug called Trovan during a meningitis outbreak in 1996. For its part, Pfizer insists it acted ethically and that the drug saved lives."

Faulty Arson Probe In Texas Could Have National Implications. The AP (5/8, Tanner) reports, "We hear it after a smoky blaze that destroys a house, or an all-night warehouse inferno: The cause of the fire is under investigation. … Now those investigations themselves are getting a hard look, including the case of a Texas man executed two years ago for a house fire that killed his three little girls. Fire experts say he was wrongfully convicted because junk science was accepted as expert testimony." The AP continues, "The implications go far beyond Texas. More than 5,000 people are imprisoned nationwide for arson, and at least some are likely to have been wrongfully convicted, said five experts who analyzed testimony in the Texas case. The experts included veteran arson investigators and people with backgrounds in science and engineering who have taught other investigators." The AP notes that experts "concluded bad science was at the heart of the testimony that led to Cameron Todd Willingham's conviction for a 1991 fire in Corsicana, Texas. Willingham maintained his innocence up to his execution in 2004. … The expert panel, along with The Innocence Project, a New York-based group that seeks to uncover wrongful convictions, presented their study on Tuesday to a special Texas commission set up to examine forensic misconduct. … The problems with arson convictions could be huge. The Innocence Project commissioned the panel to study Willingham's case, but said its network of state projects around the country has already begun to review other arson convictions."

IMMIGRATION:

Specter Says Senate Will Vote On Immigration Bill Next Week. Sen. Arlen Specter, appearing on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace), said he expects the McCain-Kennedy immigration reform bill to be brought to the floor for a vote "a week from tomorrow." He added, "I've talked to the majority leader, Senator Frist, and I expect to be on the conference committee. … The speaker has said he's for a guest worker program. That's what the president wants."

Implementing Immigration Reforms Seen As Likely "Nightmare." CQ (5/8, Crowley) reports, "Whatever Congress agrees on — some sort of legalization plan, a guest-worker program, mass deportation or a combination of the three — would have to be implemented by the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, and the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency. That, people on both sides of the debate agree, is likely to be a nightmare." The "big worry is that the immigration agencies are hard-pressed to handle their current responsibilities without having to administer a complicated new program such as the one envisioned by a Senate proposal that is most likely to form the basis for a congressional compromise. It would create a guest-worker program and provide different treatment for illegal immigrants depending on how long they have been in the United States. Some could stay; others would have to leave; and some could apply for re-entry." Complaints "about the agencies are widespread. The Government Accountability Office has issued 12 reports in the past year critical of the way the three agencies operate."

Report Finds Most Lawmakers Don't Know Words To National Anthem. Roll Call (5/8, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that tonight's episode of Nightline features a report by Claire Shipman in which she and a camera crew "came to Capitol Hill on Thursday and caught 16 House Members and four Senators off guard, asking each to sing the national anthem. … As Shipman will report tonight, the unscientific survey found that most lawmakers belong to the majority of Americans — 61 percent, to be exact — who don't know all the words to the national anthem, according to one recent poll."

Latin American Prosperity May Fuel Immigration To US. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Millman, 2.11M) reports that economists and politicians have long "said the solution to surging emigration is prosperity at home. If Mexico and other Latin American nations that send millions of migrants to the U.S. could grow fast enough, the theory goes, their residents wouldn't head north for work." Last month, Mexican President Vicente Fox, "looking to influence the U.S. Congress's latest efforts at an immigration overhaul, pledged his country would do its part, creating good manufacturing jobs for Mexican workers on their home soil." But "now the theory looks wrong -- or at least simplistic. Emigration often surges along with economic development. In an expanding economy, would-be migrants gain the skills at home that pay better abroad. They also are better able to save the relatively modest sums -- $200 for a cut-rate airline ticket; $1,000 or so for a reliable border-crossing guide -- that workers looking to enter a better labor market need to take their skills north."

King Appears With 9/11 Family Members To Promote Immigration Crackdown. The New York Post (5/8, 624K) reports Rep. Peter King on Sunday "appeared with relatives of 9/11 victims at Ground Zero to urge the passage of harsher immigration laws to help thwart terrorism." King, who appeared with members of 9/11 Families for a Secure America, said, "Immigration control and border security are absolutely essential to homeland security."

Terms Of Immigration Debate Little Changed Since Turn Of 20th Century. The Washington Post (5/8, A1, Powell, 744K) reports in a front page story that the "bitter arguments of the past" about immigration "echo loudly these days as Congress debates toughening the nation's immigration laws and immigrants from Latin America and Asia swell the streets of U.S. cities in protest. Most of the concerns voiced today -- that too many immigrants seek economic advantage and fail to understand democracy, that they refuse to learn English, overcrowd homes and overwhelm public services -- were heard a century ago. And there was a nub of truth to some complaints, not least that the vast influx of immigrants drove down working-class wages. Yet historians and demographers are clear about the bottom line: In the long run, New York City -- and the United States -- owes much of its economic resilience to replenishing waves of immigrants."

European Governments Restricting Immigration To Highly Skilled. The Washington Times (5/8, Bryant, 90K) reports European governments, "facing an immigration debate much like that in the United States, are pulling in the welcome mat, especially for low-skilled, illegal aliens from Africa and other developing regions." The European governments are "introducing immigration tests and other devices to screen out all but the brightest and most qualified in the face of rising anti-immigration sentiments -- despite having an aging population that leaves many European countries in need of new workers to bankroll their welfare states."

Financial Barriers Help Prevent Immigrant Assimilation In Europe. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Fleming, 2.11M) reports, "Redlining -- or the practice of refusing people bank loans based on their address -- has long been outlawed in the U.S. as discriminatory. But in Europe, although many countries are facing increasingly tense relations with their minority populations, there has been little debate about how financial discrimination -- ranging from redlining to setting higher insurance rates -- affects immigrants seeking to better integrate. Critics say that unless this changes, Europe will struggle to assimilate its already alienated immigrant population."

Many Salvadoran Villages Rely On Wages From Workers In US. The Washington Post (5/8, A1, Aizenman, 744K) reports in a front page story that "like villages across El Salvador, Piedras Blancas has been nearly emptied of its working-age inhabitants. Left behind are children and grandparents who live on money that relatives send from such previously unheard of places as 'Manassas, Virginia,' 'Houston, Texas,' and simply 'Maryland' -- the catchall term by which people here refer to a host of Washington area suburbs." Although "exact figures are difficult to determine, the director of the village school, who has tracked the student population for two decades, estimates that more than 3,500 Piedras Blancas natives, or about 40 percent of the population, live in the United States."

TAX:

Republicans, Democrats Disagree On Tax Bill's Beneficiaries. The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Havemann, 958K) reports, "Would the rich make out like bandits from the tax-cut bill that is the object of intense behind-the-scenes debate in Congress? Or would low-income taxpayers not only hold their own but come away with more than their share of tax breaks?" Republicans are "inclined to argue that the bill, notably its provision to extend beyond 2008 today's low tax rates on investment income, would particularly benefit the poor. Nonsense, say most Democrats; the bill is tilted sharply to the rich." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley "ratcheted up the fairness debate last week by contending that taxpayers in the lower brackets — particularly the elderly — would actually do better than those earning $200,000 and up." Democrats, "not surprisingly, scoff at this argument." Senate and House "tax writers have agreed on the central elements of the main tax bill — namely, relief in the 2006 tax year from the alternative minimum tax and extension for two more years, through 2009 and 2010, of the tax breaks for investment income." What has "delayed negotiations, which began late last year, are the contents of a second bill, potentially including extensions of the research and development tax credit and of the deduction for some college tuition costs, and more careful scrutiny of the tax-exempt status of charitable organizations."

More Investors Expecting Low Capital Gains Rates Caught In AMT Trap. Business Week (5/15, Gleckman) reports the alternative minimum tax "has been a problem since capital- gains rates were trimmed in '03, but it's about to get worse as millions more taxpayers fall under the AMT. In 2006, as many as 4 million investors may find themselves caught in this AMT trap, according to congressional estimates. That's twice as many as last year. And while many may not know it, they have been stuck in the middle of a battle on Capitol Hill over whether to extend the low rates on capital gains and dividends or overhaul the poorly understood AMT." The Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center "estimates that nearly 64% of those making $100,000 to $200,000 could face the AMT in 2006." For months, Congress has "been trying to figure out which tax issue to address first. Short of both time and money, lawmakers have been arguing over whether to limit the AMT or extend the 15% rate on capital gains and dividends, which is due to expire at the end of 2008. President George W. Bush and many Hill Republicans say they are closing in on a deal that would extend the low cap-gains rates until 2010 but curb the AMT's reach for only this year." Ask investors "which problem they would rather see Congress address, and most would probably vote for capital-gains relief. But for many under the shadow of the AMT, that would be a bad choice."

Author Says Tax Cuts Correlated With Spending Increases. In his Washington Post column (5/8, A19), Sebastian Mallaby says tax cutters believe "that tax cuts will force matching cuts in spending by the government. It's a faith that" author Jonathan Rauch "traces to the presidential debates of 1980." The "starve the beast" argument "has been a favorite of Republicans. It's an expedient argument, of course, since it justifies the tax cuts that voters are assumed to love. But even the most nakedly cynical politicians need policy fig leaves. 'Starve the beast' has allowed tax cutters to feel decent." But the argument "has been discredited. Rauch cites William Niskanen, an economist who worked in the Reagan White House and now chairs the Cato Institute." Niskanen's "result punctures his own party's dogma. Tax cuts are associated with increases in government spending. The best strategy for forcing cuts in government is actually to raise taxes."

NYTimes Criticizes Use Of Supplementals To Finance Iraq War. An editorial in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M) says, "President Bush is trying to score unearned points for fiscal rectitude by railing against the Senate's outsize $109 billion supplemental spending package, which includes money for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as well as hurricane relief. But the real scandal is Mr. Bush's own preference for financing much of the cost of the Iraq war outside the normal budget process. … Congress would gladly vote the Pentagon every cent it needs to fight in Iraq and Afghanistan and rebuild its ground forces so that they are available for other military emergencies. But with so much of the war off budget, as it were, Congress is instead being asked to approve one of the biggest military budgets in American history for projects having little to do with current fighting."

NYTimes Calls For Modest Social Security Benefit Cuts, Tax Increases. Another editorial in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M), "Buried in the newly released 2006 annual report on Social Security, there is good news on the program's long-term health. … Projected 'cost rates' in this year's report show smaller annual deficits in Social Security than had previously been assumed, starting around mid-century." The Times adds, "What the big impact of small adjustments shows is that Social Security is a dynamic system, adaptable to the 21st century. … To that end, phasing in a modest package of benefit cuts and tax increases over the next several decades is the best way to ensure that the system won't come up short a generation from now.'

WPost Says Bush Leaving "Terrible Fiscal Predicament." In an editorial (5/8, A18), the Washington Post says, "Sheer coincidence: Last Monday, the Social Security and Medicare trustees released their annual depressing report. On Tuesday, congressional negotiators handed President Bush a 'victory' -- his assessment -- in agreeing to extend his capital gains and dividend tax cuts. Mr. Bush and his fellow tax-cuts-above-all proponents would like you to believe that the two events are unrelated. But taken together they underscore the terrible fiscal predicament that Mr. Bush has chosen to bequeath to his successor."

Novak Says Grassley Using "Phantom Bill" To Hold Up Pressing Tax Legislation. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (5/8) writes this morning that Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley (R), who "last Tuesday cavalierly rejected a summons to meet in the Oval Office with" President Bush, "is playing his own game on tax legislation without interference from anybody, even the president." Grassley "has blocked the tax bill extending dividend and capital gains tax cuts that is essential to the economy. Until now, he has held it hostage for a 'second bill' on taxes containing unknown private deals cut by Grassley with other senators. In short, high-priority tax legislation is delayed by a phantom bill." Novak notes, "The 'second bill' is described in the news media as containing routine extenders of tax benefits, but it is surely more than that. The assumption on Capitol Hill is that Grassley has made specially tailored promises to individual senators to get enough votes for the tax reconciliation bill. If so, these tax goodies will have to be compensated for in the same bill by revenue raisers." Grassley's "critics among reform-minded Republicans refer to tax pork in the second bill, but they cannot be sure about something that is hidden. It is impossible to conduct a meaningful debate on a phantom bill, and that is precisely the way Grassley has constructed the situation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Says Retirement Not An Option. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 4, 2:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M) interviewed Vice President Cheney. Asked if there was a benefit "if you were to retire, to allow the President to choose someone else who might then have an advantage in 2008," Vice President Cheney said, "Well, I'm not sure it would be an advantage, but that's not my concern. I, in effect, took on the obligation when I put my name on the ballot to serve out my term. I've got a contract, if you will, with the American people. My term ends in January of 2009 and barring some unforeseen disaster, that's what I'll do." O'Donnell: "What role do you think you play for 2008?" Vice President Cheney:

"We've got a lot of good candidates out there. At the appropriate time, I'll be happy to campaign for the ticket in 2008, if they want me do, they may not want me to. That'll be their call."

Rumsfeld Says He Has No Plans To Retire.

Fox News (5/7, Baier) ran an hour-long special report on Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld last night. The special examined Rumsfeld's tenure in the Bush Administration, including his high poll numbers and status as a "media star" following the 9/11 attacks and President Bush's response in Afghanistan, as well as his decline in the polls since then. The Fox report noted that former thee star Marine Corps General Paul Van Ryper "is the 8th retired general to say Rumsfeld must go," but the special also included an interview with Rumsfeld in which he said he has no plans to retire. The Secretary also said he does not think about his legacy, noting, "I think about doing what I am doing and I live full days I get up early, I stay up late. I feel fortunate to be doing what I am doing. To be able to be involved in something as important as this at this moment in our country's history I think is something that I feel fortunate to be involved in."

Rumsfeld Dismisses Journalist Criticism Of Iraq War. On Fox News (5/7, Baier), the Secretary also criticized journalists and their coverage of the Iraq war, saying that there is "a whole cluster of people in our country, a lot of them in the journalism business who had much of their lives formed by the Vietnam war, so it's understandable they would try to relate everything that happens in the 21st century to what they experienced in the 20th century. That doesn't make it accurate or apt."

Rumsfeld Says Success In War On Terror Is Hard To Measure. Asked how he measures success in the war on terror, Rumsfeld said on Fox News (5/7, Baier), "First of all, it's very hard to do. It's going to be a long war it will take years I am afraid like the Cold War. We are putting a lot of pressure on terrorists and life is more difficult for them. It's harder for them to raise money and harder for them to move around and harder for them to communicate with each other. More difficult to recruit people. But it's a difficult thing to measure."

Rumsfeld Says World Was Simpler When He Served Under Ford. Rumsfeld, who also served as Defense Secretary under President Gerald Ford, was also asked on Fox News (5/7, Baier) what is different between the job now and the job as it was under Ford. Rumsfeld said, "It was a simpler world. We had one major problem, the Soviet Union was expanding and it was active in this hemisphere. We had the advantage we could look at it month after month, year after year get good at understanding it and keep an eye on it."

Rumsfeld Critic's Anti-Israeli Views Noted. The Weekly Standard (5/15) reports in its "Scrapbook" column that, "The story line was compelling: A face-off between a beleaguered secretary of defense and a brave former intelligence professional. 'Rumsfeld Heckled by Former CIA Analyst' blared the headline on the ABC News website. The AP reported that a 'former CIA analyst, Ray McGovern, asked [Donald Rumsfeld], 'Why did you lie to get us into a war that caused these kind of casualties and was not necessary?'"" But almost all of the reports "failed to report was the relevant fact that McGovern is not simply a veteran of the CIA but a hard-left conspiracy theorist who blames the Iraq war on 'O.I.L.' As McGovern that night told MSNBC's Tucker Carlson, the only member of the mainstream media with the elementary curiosity to broach the subject, O stands 'for oil; I for Israel; and L for logistics, logistics being the permanent . . . military bases that the U.S. wants to keep in Iraq.'"

Biden Is "Unalterably Opposed" To Boyle's Nomination.

Sen. Joseph Biden was asked on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace) if he expects federal judge nominees Brett Kavanaugh or Terrence Boyle will be filibustered, Biden said, "I have no line in the sand with Kavanaugh. I want to know more. I haven't made my judgment whether I'm for or against him, and I don't think we'd be part of a filibuster there. With regard to Boyle. … I am unalterably opposed to Boyle…and I think Boyle will not go forward, and I would consider joining an effort to prevent his vote."

Snow Expected To Improve White House Relationship With Press Corps.

NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 9, 2:35, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that starting today, "It will be Tony Snow's turn to step up to the podium to face the Washington press corps." NBC (Alter) added, "Snow is the latest to go on the firing line. The Fox News anchor replaces Scott McClellan, who had problems handling the White House press corps. Snow is expected to do better." Benjamin Bradlee, former Washington Post editor: "He seems outspoken, confident."

In the National Review (5/15), Byron York says outgoing White House press secretary Scott McClellan "wasn't really right for the job, and two, he sometimes wasn't clued in on what was really going on. Add to that all the difficulties the Bush White House has experienced in the last year, and you've got the need for a new start. That's where Tony Snow comes in." When Snow's appointment was "announced, it was met with pretty much universal praise, at least from Republicans. Even the way it was announced was an encouraging sign, as some in the GOP saw it." Snow is "certainly expected to be more deft and understanding in dealing with the press," and as "far as being in the loop is concerned, Snow is said to have received assurances that he will be included in the policy-making process so that he can better explain it to the world." York concludes Snow will "undoubtedly have a honeymoon, and then, when the first big bad thing happens — or maybe when there's one of those tempests in a teapot that periodically consume the White House press corps — he'll be tested under fire. No one can say what will happen, but White House officials are looking for better days in the briefing room."

50% View Bush Decision To Hire Snow Favorably. The Washington Times (5/8, Harper, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Americans give a favorable initial assessment of Tony Snow, the newest White House press secretary, according to a new Zogby poll. The decision to bring the former Fox News TV and radio host on board is seen as 'an excellent or good' decision by 50 percent of the respondents and viewed negatively by 40 percent. … The online survey was conducted April 28 through May 1 and included 5,578 likely voters. The poll carries a margin of error of 1 percentage point."

Democratic Report Says Bush Team Less Diverse Than Clinton's. The Washington Post (5/8, A17, Lee, 744K) reports, "President Bush's crop of political appointees includes fewer women and minorities than did President Bill Clinton's at comparable points in their presidencies, according to a new report by House Democrats. Women made up about 37 percent of the 2,786 political appointees in the Bush administration in 2005, compared with about 47 percent in the Clinton administration in 1997, according to the report and supplemental data released last week by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee. Similarly, about 13 percent of Bush administration appointees last year were racial minorities, compared with 24 percent in the fifth year of Clinton's presidency, the report found." The Post adds, "The 13-page report, compiled using data from the Office of Personnel Management, says the number of women and minority appointees increased during the first five years after Clinton took office and has declined during Bush's tenure." However, the report "does not mention…that Bush has established a record of diversity in his Cabinet. Bush's Cabinet, which includes the vice president and the heads of 15 executive departments, currently has two Hispanics, two African Americans and two Asian Americans. Three departments -- State, Education and Labor -- are headed by women, and a fourth, Interior, has an acting secretary who is a woman. Before Bush took office, no minority had occupied any of the four highest-profile Cabinet positions -- attorney general and the secretaries of the Defense, State and Treasury departments."

Invitation For NIH Official's Party May Violate Ethics Rules. The Washington Post (5/8, A17, Weiss, 744K) reports there is a "cloud hanging over a going-away party for National Cancer Institute Director Andrew C. von Eschenbach, who in March was nominated by President Bush to head the Food and Drug Administration." An invitation "recently circulated to National Institutes of Health employees for a 'farewell reception and roast' to be held on the NIH campus in Bethesda in honor of von Eschenbach" asks for a "$25 entrance fee for the May 17 event" and "solicits additional 'contributions' for a gift for the outgoing boss. Problem is, that's a violation of federal ethics rules, according to legal eagles inside and outside the Beltway."

House, Senate Ethics Bills Would Identify Earmark Sponsors. Roll Call (5/8, Ackley) reports the House and Senate ethics bills "mirror one another when it comes to one earmark measure, with both calling for Members who sponsor the narrowly targeted pots of funding to attach their name." Vincent Versage, "a lobbyist with the National Group who has worked for appropriations clients for decades," said, "I don't know of any Member who would not want to have his or her name attached. A lot of these Members are proud of bringing projects back." Roll Call adds another appropriations lobbyist "said that forcing Members to disclose which earmarks they push for will have a chilling effect on Members' support for projects outside of their home states, even if the project is relevant to the committees they sit on."

Contractors Who Benefited From Earmarks Paid For Mollohan Travel. Roll Call (5/8, Bresnahan) reports

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), "his wife and two top aides took a five-day trip to Spain in June 2004 that was paid for by a group of government contractors for whom Mollohan steered tens of millions of dollars in earmarked funds, according to travel records and other documents." The trip sponsor "listed on travel disclosure forms is the 'West Virginia (WV)-01 Trade Delegation,' which Mollohan's office described as an 'ad hoc group' of 19 government contractors and West Virginia-based nonprofits that came together to pay for the trip. The total cost of the trip for Mollohan, his wife and aides was $7,874."

Former Aide Benefited From Stevens Earmark. CQ (5/8, Zeller) reports Sen. Ted Stevens "may someday be able to boast paternity of an Office Building That Made a Former Aide Rich. The aide in question is Trevor McCabe, who spent his first eight years out of Harvard in the 1990s rising from legislative correspondent to legislative director in Stevens' office. Now a lawyer and real estate developer in Anchorage, last fall he made a bit of a killing on the $558,000 sale of a bedraggled quarter-acre plot in downtown Seward to the nonprofit Alaska SeaLife Center — which had suddenly found itself with money to spend last summer thanks to some earmarking legerdemain by Stevens." McCabe has "a knack for owning property in the right place at the right time. He's also an investor in waterfront property in tiny Mat-Su, which should appreciate nicely once the hamlet is linked to Anchorage with the construction of Don Young's Way — one of the two Alaska bridges that drew such ridicule last summer when they received generous earmarks in the new highway and mass transit law." The Seward deal "was announced last October, two months after Stevens, the longest-serving Republican on the Senate Appropriations Committee, used the fiscal 2006 Interior spending law to take $1.6 million away from the National Park Service and give it to the SeaLife Center, an aquarium started eight years ago mainly with proceeds from the Exxon Valdez oil spill settlement."

Dean Distinguishes Democrats' Scandals From GOP's "Culture Of Corruption." DNC Chair Howard Dean was asked on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) if he thought recent controversies surrounding Democratic members of congress could blunt his party's contention that the GOP is characterized by a "culture of corruption." Dean said, "There are individual Congressmen that have made mistakes. Unlike the Republicans, our leader, Nancy Pelosi, particularly asked for an ethics investigation of Congressman Jefferson. … This is a culture of corruption the Republicans have brought to Washington…that goes from the White House to the vice president's office to the leadership of the United States Senate to the leadership of the United States House of Representatives. And in the agencies, corruption has become a way of life, and it has to change."

WPost Says White House Should Release Records Of Abramoff Visits. The Washington Post (5/8, A18, 744K) says in an editorial, "It's taken a Freedom of Information Act request, a lawsuit and a court order, but the White House will soon release Secret Service records detailing lobbyist Jack Abramoff's visits there. This is long overdue, and the delay has been due to -- there's no other word for it -- stonewalling by the Bush administration. The administration says the lobbyist attended a Hanukkah party or two and 'a few staff-level meetings.' With whom? About what? We don't know, and it's not clear the Secret Service records will reveal that. But certainly, at this point, the White House does know, and leaving these questions unanswered, as it has tried to do, remains unacceptable." The Post's "challenge to -- and advice for -- the incoming press secretary, Tony Snow: Rather than a steady drip, drip, drip of Abramoff news, get it all out, quickly and with enough details to make clear what, exactly, transpired between the corrupt lobbyist and the president's aides."

Rhode Island Democrats Expected To Back Kennedy. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 6, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Rhode Island, Democrats are expected to unanimously endorse Congressman Patrick Kennedy for reelection at their convention tomorrow. This comes days after Kennedy's public statement that he is struggling with drug addiction, and the congressman's claim that the sleep aid, Ambien, may have in part caused him to drive his car into a security barrier on Capitol Hill last week. … He's not the only person to claim a link between that pill and some unusual actions." NBC (Ellis) added, "Patrick Kennedy insists Ambien, the popular sleeping pill, is partly to blame. Kennedy is just the latest person involved in bizarre behavior to say, in effect, the Ambien made me do it."

USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) also reports Kennedy's "decision Friday to return to drug-abuse rehabilitation after a traffic accident appears unlikely to have an impact on his political fortunes, political analysts say." Rhode Island Democratic Chairman Bill Lynch "said he expects Kennedy will be unanimously endorsed for re-election at tonight's state party convention." State GOP Chairman Patricia Morgan "issued a statement calling on Kennedy to vacate his House seat while he deals with the problems. No Republican has emerged as a potential challenger to the sixth-term lawmaker."

Kennedy Enters Rehab At Mayo Clinic. Time (5/15, Tumulty) reports in its "Periscope" column that Rep. Patrick Kennedy "once seemed the great hope of his generation of America's most storied political dynasty. … But Patrick's story turned stereotypically Kennedy in other ways. … The car crash last Thursday at about 2:45 a.m. was the most bizarre incident yet. … Strangest of all, Kennedy claimed, 'I simply do not remember' the incident. He blamed the sleeping pill Ambien and the gastrointestinal drug Phenergan and checked himself into the Mayo Clinic, where he had been treated in December for addiction to prescription painkillers."

Kennedy's April Car Accident In Rhode Island Not Widely Reported. The Weekly Standard (5/15) reports in its "Scrapbook" column that, "In last week's issue, The Scrapbook brought you the woefully under-reported tale of how Rhode Island Democratic congressman Patrick Kennedy had last month wrecked his car pulling into a CVS parking lot in his home state. His own handwritten account of the accident (in a police report supplied to us by Boston Herald columnist Howie Carr) looked like it had been scrawled with his teeth so that he could keep his cocktail-shaker hands free." Kennedy, "who usually takes a year or two off between career-debilitating incidents such as trashing yachts and pushing around female airport security guards, this time decided a quick follow-up was in order. Early last Thursday morning, at 2:45 a.m., he was involved in a single-car accident near the Capitol building."

Kurtz Says Kennedy Has Gotten "Easy Ride." Howard Kurtz writes in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (5/8, C1, 744K) , Kurtz) reports in its "Media Notes" that given the journalistic obsession with the Kennedy family and its tragicomic soap opera," Rep. Patrick Kennedy "seem to have gotten an easy ride -- except in the New England press, which has chronicled his every misstep." Kurtz adds, "While Kennedy, the 38-year-old son of Ted Kennedy, was widely reported to have held a news conference Friday, it was nothing of the sort. He read a statement designed to elicit sympathy, saying he was going into rehab, and took no questions. This amounted to an age-old damage-control technique: changing the subject."

Capitol Police Upset Over Kennedy Fiasco, McKinney "Attack." Roll Call (5/8, McArdle) reports, "As an internal investigation conducted by the acting chief of the Capitol Police found that two police management officials improperly handled the department's investigation into a car crash involving Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.) last Thursday, national Fraternal Order of Police called the incident a symptom of a broader problem of 'political policing' being encouraged by agency brass." Chuck Canterbury, president of the National FOP, said in a release Friday evening, "First, we had [Rep. Cynthia] McKinney (D-Ga.) attack a police officer, and now we allegedly have Rep. Kennedy narrowly miss striking a police cruiser before crashing into a security barrier. … In both cases, Capitol Police management favored politics over protocol." Union "officials are particularly upset that the officer who responded to Kennedy's accident was not allowed to complete his investigation at the scene but was instead ordered to leave the scene while Kennedy was given a ride home by department officials."

Protesters Rally Against Drug Benefit Plan Outside Leavitt's Home. Hundreds of demonstrators gathered outside HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt to protest the Medicare drug benefit. The Washington Post (5/8, B3, Thompson, 744K) reports, "The unannounced visit to Leavitt's home in Arlington County was made by members of the Chicago-based National People's Action, a coalition of neighborhood advocacy groups that is more than 30 years old." The group "demanded that the HHS chief extend until Dec. 31 the deadline that millions of seniors who lack prescription drug coverage have to select a plan." HHS spokesman Bill Hall said "Leavitt is out of town this week and will not meet with the group. 'He has said before that he opposes extending the May 15 deadline' for enrolling in Medicare Part D, which provides prescription drug coverage for people who qualify for Medicare."

Intelligence Employees Have Higher Job Satisfaction Rate Than Overall Government. The Washington Post (5/8, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "A survey of intelligence community employees shows they are dedicated to their work, with job satisfaction rates higher than for the overall government. The survey also shows that intelligence agencies have room to improve on some personnel practices, particularly in the areas of leadership and performance. Only 44 percent of the survey respondents said they were satisfied with the policies and practices of their senior leaders, and only 29 percent said their agencies take steps to deal with sub-par colleagues who cannot or will not improve their job performance." Seventy-seven percent "of IC employees said they have 'a real opportunity' to improve their skills at their agencies, compared with 63 percent of all federal employees."

Lawmakers' Use Of Acronyms To Name Bills Noted. The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Simon, 958K) reports that to "haiku, the limerick and the cameo brooch, Washington has added its own contribution to the diminutive arts. Remember Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, the deficit-fighting bill? Or Sarbanes-Oxley, the corporate reform law? Bills named for lawmakers are pretty much passe. These days, an attention-getting acronym — the political equivalent of a vanity license plate — is in." Though some bills "in the past did have acronyms, they rarely grabbed the public's attention. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1993, or OBRA, for example, is remembered by few people other than Washington's most die-hard number-crunchers. Now, acronyms help explain what the bill is all about. They are proof that even bill names have become part of Washington's all-consuming political spin."

FDA To Examine Infections In Women Who Took Abortion Pill. The FDA has released the agenda for meeting that will focus on infections in women who took a drug to induce abortion. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Mathews, McKay, 2.11M) reports, "The meeting, to be held jointly with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases at the CDC's Atlanta campus on Thursday, will focus on scientific questions about the origins, cause and need for future research about infections due to the bacterium Clostridium sordellii, as well as another type of pathogen that has no tie to the drug. … Panels of scientists are expected to discuss the infections, but possible regulatory actions won't be debated."

Former Official Decries FDA Budget Cuts. William Hubbard, who retired last year after more than 25 years at the Food and Drug Administration, writes in the Washington Post (5/8, A19, 744K), "For most of the FDA's 100-year history, presidents and congresses have recognized its importance to public health by giving it the resources and authority to respond to the rapid evolution in risks from the thousands of products it regulates. But for some years now, the agency's budget has remained essentially flat while major new responsibilities have been piled on. … How much does Congress appropriate for the agency that has responsibility for the safety of the whole country's supply of food, drugs, vaccines, medical devices, cosmetics, animal foods and drugs, dietary supplements, and more? The same amount as Fairfax County, Va., provides for its schools."

Pentagon Has Backlog Of Private Sector Security Clearance Applications. Since the Pentagon stopped processing applications for security clearances from the private sector, a backlog of thousands of applications has developed, according to the Washington Times (5/8, Waterman, 90K). The Times says "some are fretting that the moratorium is starting to threaten American security. The decision by the Defense Security Service "was announced late last month, but has attracted surprisingly little notice, perhaps because the Armed Services committees of both chambers of Congress were busy last week marking up the Pentagon budget authorization bill. In a statement e-mailed to contractors April 28, the agency, blaming 'funding constraints' said they had 'discontinued accepting industry requests for new personnel security clearances and periodic reinvestigations effective immediately and until further notice.'"

OTHER NEWS:

GOP Said Not To Be Benefiting From Positive Economic News. Roll Call (5/8, Pershing) reports that Friday morning, "the White House and Congressional Republican leaders sent out a flurry of press releases bragging about the latest economic news: 138,000 jobs were created in April, productivity is high, unemployment is low and consumer spending is on the rise." Meanwhile, the Associated Press "was reporting details about its latest national poll results: The job approval ratings of both Congress and President Bush were the lowest they'd ever been in the survey, while the percentage of Americans who believed the country is on the wrong track had climbed to 73 percent." The "question for Republicans — who are increasingly worried by the disconnect between those two sets of numbers — is whether voters can be convinced before they go to the polls in November that a) the economy is doing well; and b) that their Member of Congress deserves to be re-elected because of it." Republican "strategists and pollsters believe that high gas prices are definitely helping to prevent Americans from viewing the economy in rosy terms."

The AP (5/8, Raum) reports, "America's economy is strong. Or it's in trouble. It just depends on who's talking. Trying to retool his message and right his listing presidency, President Bush is speaking out more frequently and forcefully on the economy. It's in good shape right now, his advisers say, and they want him to take more credit for it." The latest reports "show healthy increases in economic growth, job creation, home ownership, retail sales and consumer spending. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is at a six-year high." But "Democrats are peddling a different message: Soaring gasoline and health care costs are burdening ordinary people; mortgage costs and credit card rates are on the rise; jobs are threatened by outsourcing. As for those tax cuts treasured by Bush, Democrats argue they have benefited mainly the wealthy." Friday's unemployment report, "showing the jobless rate holding steady at 4.7 percent with a lower-than-expected job-creation rate of 138,000 in April, was seized by both sides to buttress their great-economy/troubled-economy arguments. Each party accuses the other of 'cherry picking' statistics to bolster its case."

Dow Nears All-Time Record High. USA Today (5/8, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "A rousing rally Friday — sparked by a weaker-than-expected jobs report that renewed hope that the Federal Reserve might soon stop raising interest rates -- lifted the Dow 139 points to 11,578 -- its highest close since its Jan. 14, 2000, peak. As a result, the venerable index, home to blue-chip names such as Caterpillar, McDonald's, IBM, Boeing and Home Depot, is just 145 points shy of topping its 11,722.98 record close. … If the Dow can set a record, despite a dizzying array of roadblocks ranging from $70-a-barrel oil to rising interest rates to ongoing instability in the Middle East, it's likely to provide a huge psychological boost to Wall Street."

Bush Aides Tout Job Market. Edward P. Lazear, chairman, and Katherine Baicker, a member, of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, write in the Wall Street Journal (5/8, Lazear, Baicker, 2.11M), "There is no question that the US is experiencing strong economic gains, with GDP growing at an impressive annual rate of 4.8% in the last quarter. The economy created about two million jobs last year, and Friday's jobs report for April showed that we are on track to add more than two million new jobs this year." This "job growth is undeniable." The labor market is "strong. Job growth has been impressive, and unemployment is at a very low 4.7%. Productivity is increasing at more than 3% per year. This strong economy means that we can look forward to even higher wages and living standards in the future. We should continue to strive to ensure that all Americans are able to obtain the skills that will enable them to share in this prosperity."

Small Business Employment Seen As "Mixed." USA Today (5/8, Hopkins, 2.31M) reports, "Small employers are sending contradictory signals about hiring, a new survey shows, as the broader economy produced unexpectedly slim job gains last month. Filling jobs continues to be tough: 31% of 1,094 small employers in a just-released April survey reported at least one hard-to-fill job opening, says the National Federation of Independent Business trade group. That's the highest share in six years. Plus, 16% of those surveyed said they plan to add jobs in the next three months, up from 9% in March. … The report offered a mixed view of US employment and suggested the economy is heading for more moderate growth that's less likely to trigger inflation woes."

Ranks Of "Near Poor" Said To Be Rising. The New York Times (5/8, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "Americans on the lower rungs of the economic ladder have always been exposed to sudden ruin. But in recent years, with the soaring costs of housing and medical care and a decline in low-end wages and benefits, tens of millions are living on even shakier ground than before, according to studies of what some scholars call the 'near poor.'" In "a rare study of vulnerability to poverty," Mark R. Rank, a sociologist at Washington University in St. Louis, has "found that the risk of a plummet of at least a year below the official poverty line rose sharply in the 1990's, compared with the two previous decades. By all signs, he said, such insecurity has continued to worsen."

Fed Widely Expected To Boost Rates This Week. USA Today (5/8, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "There is little doubt Federal Reserve policymakers will raise interest rates for the 16th time in nearly two years when they meet Wednesday." But "when it comes to predicting what they will do after that, the picture is unusually cloudy." Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues "are widely expected to raise their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs economywide, a quarter-percentage point to 5% this week. That would bring rates to the highest level in more than five years."

Gas Prices Rise To Average $2.95 Nationally.

The CBS Evening News (5/7, story 7, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Gas prices are still climbing, only not as fast.

According to the Lundberg Survey, prices at the pump rose just four cents over the past two weeks to a national average of $2.95 for self-service regular."

Despite Record Profits, Oil Industry Faces Uncertain Future. Business Week (5/15, Reed) reports, "Big Oil, that clutch of oil and gas giants in the U.S. and Europe, has big problems. Yes, we know it sounds ridiculous. Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM) has been reporting the lushest earnings in the history of the business, notching up $8.4 billion in its latest quarterly report. Combine the forecasted 2006 earnings of BP, Royal Dutch Shell (RD), Chevron (CVX), Total (TOT), ConocoPhillips (COP), and ExxonMobil, and you get roughly $135 billion, a sum greater than the gross domestic product of the Czech Republic or Israel. These companies, moreover, enjoy huge political clout in their home countries, have spotty environmental records, and staunchly defend outrageous prices at the gasoline pump." But one does not "have to love the big oil companies to worry about their ability to provide us with the energy we need. That job is getting difficult, thanks to huge technical challenges, competition from national oil companies, and demanding, even hostile foreign governments. Just look at events in Bolivia on May 1, when the government abruptly nationalized the nation's gas fields."

Daschle, Khosla Call For Setting Fuel Standards To Increase Ethanol Consumption. In a New York Times op-ed (5/8), former Sen. Tom Daschle and venture capitalist Vinod Khosla say, "Our national leadership must promote a market-based shift away from petroleum-based fuels toward renewable fuels produced in America with American technology. The CAFE standard does nothing to encourage that change. It requires American automakers to build cars and trucks that meet a minimum standard of average mileage traveled per gallon of gasoline." The US instead needs to "to upgrade to a new CAFE: Carbon Alternative Fuel Equivalent. This new CAFE will measure 'petroleum mileage' and give automakers incentives and credits for increasing ethanol consumption as a percentage of fuel use of their vehicles, not least by promoting flex-fuel vehicles, which can run on either gasoline or E85 fuel, a blend of 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline. This approach promises several significant benefits."

Convergence Of Factors Puts Focus On Raising CAFE Standards. The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports the "confluence of skyrocketing gasoline prices, new reports on climate change, and the never-ending debate over US energy policy sharpens efforts to encourage - if not mandate - better gas mileage in the cars Americans drive." New legislation "is being introduced, and President Bush has asked Congress to give him the authority to increase passenger-car fuel economy standards." In Washington Friday, "a bipartisan group of five senators introduced legislation that would offer government loan guarantees and grants to automakers and parts manufacturers. The bill would speed up development of vehicle technology designed to conserve fuel. This includes using lightweight materials, being able to plug in and recharge batteries of gas-electric hybrids, and making alternative fuels more available around the country. Another bipartisan bill would raise the CAFE standard for cars and light trucks to 33 m.p.g."

Higher Fuel Costs Contributing To Increases In Airline Fares. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 6, 1:45, Harris, 8.78M) reported airlines "recently raised ticket prices to their highest level since September 11th. Airlines are doing everything they can to save money. But airfares will not be descending anytime soon." ABC (Jamieson) added, "Quietly, airlines, even low-cost carriers, have been raising fares since January." Analysts say "recent fare increases are only the beginning as the skyrocketing fuel prices threaten the airlines' already shaky balance sheets. For the nation's biggest airline, American, every penny increase in the price of jet fuel adds another $28 million a year in costs."

Higher Gas Prices Not Deterring Vacation Travel. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 7, 2:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "According to a new AP poll, 70% of Americans say they expect high gas prices will cause them financial hardship. 66% admit they are already cutting back on driving. How will that affect travel plans as the summer vacation season revs up?" NBC (Hattori) added, "With regular gas close to $3 a gallon nationwide and even higher in many western states, you'd think sticker shock would deter vacationers. Last Memorial Day weekend, an estimated 30 million Americans took a road trip. Believe it or not this year, even $3 a gallon gasoline isn't likely to put a huge dent in those plans." Travel experts "say vacationers are planning shorter trips or staying closer to home, but they're still going."

WSJournal Says Raising CAFE Standards Will Lead To More Dangerous Cars. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "John Kerry, take a bow. You may have lost the last election, but at least one of your policy ideas has seen its ship come in anyway. We refer to the Bush administration's recent embrace of higher auto-mileage standards." The White House "has now completed its surrender by inviting a similar change for cars as a 'proven way to conserve gasoline.' This is where President Bush's new 'addicted to oil' rhetoric is taking him and us -- namely, to the government further dictating the kind of cars Americans will be able to drive, even if those cars aren't as safe on the road. It is undeniable that higher CAFE standards kill people: Larger, heavier cars have lower death rates in crashes."

WSJournal Praises Shadegg Proposal To Lift Tariffs On Imported Ethanol. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) praises Rep. John Shadegg, the "the first politician of note to propose that the government suspend the outrageously high tariffs on imported ethanol. The idea here is to offset some of the gas price hikes that Congress has caused via the ethanol mandate it passed last year. That requirement -- that drivers use 7.5 billion gallons of ethanol annually by 2012 -- is currently helping to increase the cost of gas, since ethanol is in short supply. Gas refiners and transporters are struggling to move ethanol from its Midwest production base to places like the East and Gulf Coasts, contributing to the shortages."

Rove Using Threat Of Democratic Control As Way To Turn Out Base. The New York Times (5/8, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports the "prospect of the administration spending its last two years being grilled by angry Democrats under the heat of partisan spotlights has added urgency to the efforts by Karl Rove and Mr. Bush's political team to hang on to the Republican majorities in Congress." Rove is "facing an increasingly difficult climate for Republicans, and an increasingly assertive Democratic Party." But the "prospect of Democrats capturing either, however, may be one of the best weapons Mr. Rove has as he turns to what he has traditionally done best: motivating his party's conservative base to turn out on Election Day."

GOP Also Sees Battle Over Judicial Nominees As Way To Motivate Base. The New York Times (5/8, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports it has "been a year since a bipartisan group of 14 senators, the Gang of 14, reached a compromise that smoothed the way for confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees, including two Supreme Court justices. Conservatives, eager to stir some enthusiasm among their base in an otherwise gloomy election year, have spent months prodding the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, to take up candidates left out of that deal." Frist "is doing just that. On Tuesday, the Senate Judiciary Committee will hold a hearing on the confirmation of Brett M. Kavanaugh, a White House aide, whose nomination to a federal appeals court has been stalled for three years. Mr. Frist has promised a vote on Mr. Kavanaugh this month. Conservatives are also pushing for a vote on an even more contentious nominee, Judge Terrence W. Boyle, a longtime federal district judge in North Carolina." With Democrats "promising to question Mr. Kavanaugh extensively and threatening to block Judge Boyle by filibuster, Republicans say they could not be happier." Sen. John Thune said, "A good fight on judges does nothing but energize our base."

Democrats Vow Probes Of Administration If They Win Congress. USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) reports Democrats will "launch investigations of the Bush administration if they take control of Congress in November but are not out to impeach the president, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said Sunday." On NBC's Meet the Press, Pelosi said Democrats "would hold hearings on the use of intelligence in the lead-up to the Iraq war and investigate the high price of energy and prescription drugs if they win the extra 15 seats they need for a House majority in the midterm elections." But she added "investigation does not equate to impeachment."

GOP Campaign Officials Tell Candidates To Focus On Local Issues. The Washington Times (5/8, Lambro, 90K) reports Republican campaign officials "are urging their candidates to focus on local issues to blunt what they think is a sour national mood that could cut deeply into House and Senate majorities in the November elections." In a "strategic shift in response to generic congressional polls that show the Democrats lead the Republicans by 15 points among registered voters, the Republican campaign committees are falling back on an old election axiom: All politics is local. And they point to numerous races where their candidates have begun addressing more local issues -- from sales-tax increases to overcrowded suburbs -- issues that can spark more voter anger than some of the national issues Democrats would like the election to be about."

Republicans Benefit From More Even Distribution Across Country. The Washington Post (5/8, A3, Edsall, Goldfarb, 744K) reports that with Democrats "locked out of the White House and in the minority in Congress, it might seem that there just aren't enough Democratic voters to win elections. But political scientist Gary Jacobson says the problem is actually more complicated: The distribution of Republican voters is more politically effective across the nation." Jacobson's research "shows a little more than half of all the nation's 435 congressional districts over recent decades consistently favored Republican presidential candidates. A little less than 40 percent went for Democrats." Jacobson "said this is due to an 'inefficient' distribution of Democratic voters, with many concentrations of 60 percent or more in urban areas and places with large numbers of minorities. Republicans, he found, are distributed more evenly, yielding more districts in which GOP voters have a slimmer but sturdy majority."

The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Brownstein, Hook, 958K) reports control of Congress "may turn on whether the public's clear desire for change is powerful enough to overcome the resistance to change built into the political system." Discontent "with the nation's direction and the federal government's performance is virtually screaming from public opinion surveys, which show approval ratings for President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress falling to their lowest levels." But "today's wave of dissatisfaction is crashing into a political structure that is much more stable than in 1994. It now is tougher to beat House incumbents or to win Senate seats in states that usually back the other party in presidential elections."

DeLay Admits GOP Has "Problems With Our Base." In an appearance on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) former Rep. Tom DeLay was asked if the GOP should be concerned by diminished support from conservatives, DeLay answered, "We do have wind in our face. We do have problems with our base. We've also got six months to turn that around. … They may have problems with what's happening on a national basis, but they support their incumbent."

Local GOP Leaders Seek DeLay Replacement. The AP (5/8) reports, "Environmental lawyer Tom Campbell, who finished a distant second to Rep. Tom DeLay in the March primary, was among seven hopefuls who interviewed this weekend for the outgoing Republican's place on the November ballot." The potential candidates "met with GOP leaders from Harris County in a closed session on Saturday. Each handed in a questionnaire and gave presentations to about 50 local GOP officials. … A committee of party precinct chairmen from the four counties in DeLay's congressional district will pick a nominee to face Democrat Nick Lampson." Others who interviewed were Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs; state Rep. Robert Talton of Pasadena; state Rep. Charlie Howard of Sugar Land; state Sen. Mike Jackson of La Porte; businessman Timothy Turner and Precinct 3 Fort Bend County Commissioner Andy Meyers.

Gore May Run For President In 2008 After All. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Calmes, 2.11M) reports, "For former Vice President Al Gore, a rash of favorable publicity surrounding this month's opening of his movie 'An Inconvenient Truth,' and the growing political resonance of its subject -- global warming -- are stoking the most serious speculation about a Gore political comeback since his loss in the 2000 US presidential election." In 2008, "that could mean a once-unimaginable battle for Democrats' nomination between Bill Clinton's former vice president and his wife, Hillary Clinton. To some pro-Gore Democrats, worried about Mrs. Clinton's electability, that is part of the appeal."

Democrats Believe Webb Can Hobble Allen As Presidential Candidate. Time (5/15) reports in its "Periscope" column that with their US Senate candidate in Virginia, Jim Webb, Democrats "think they can score a trifecta by beating a Republican incumbent in the South, hobbling him as a possible presidential candidate and boosting the fortunes of one of their White House wannabes." Webb "still has to get through the June 13 Democratic primary, but pragmatists in his party are already tipping him as the man to win in November against the folksy Allen, who is also mulling a run for President in 2008. … University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato says both score about 40% in polls. 'Jim Webb is George Allen's worst nightmare: a war hero and a Reagan appointee who holds moderate positions,' says Sabato. 'Allen tries to project a Reagan aura, but Webb already has it.'"

Allen's Support Of Confederate Flag Said To Be More Extensive Than Previously Known. In the New Republic (5/15), Ryan Lizza says in his first statewide TV ad in his 1993 gubernatorial campaign, Republican Sen. George Allen "You can see the red field. You can make out the diagonal blue bar. And you can see what looks like a white star. It is the Confederate flag." Then-Allen media consultant Greg Stevens "denies that the flag was purposefully added to the scene, which lasts for ten seconds of the 60-second commercial, to appeal to pro-Confederate voters." But "as revealed by the 1993 campaign ad -- as well as the accounts of Allen associates now stepping forward -- his embrace of the Confederate flag is even more extensive than TNR previously reported. According to his colleagues, classmates, and published reports, Allen has either displayed the flag--on himself, his car, inside his home -- or expressed his enthusiastic approval of the emblem from approximately 1967 to 2000."

Mary Cheney Memoir To Be Released Tuesday. USA Today (5/8, Memmott, 2.31M) reports that "Now It's My Turn," a memoir by Mary Cheney, daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, will be published on Tuesday. Cheney, "who ran her father's 2004 vice presidential campaign," said, "My job was to do whatever I could to help my dad. It wasn't to be making policy statements of my own." But now, she is "ready to share her feelings and opinions. … She says the vice president is 'a wonderful father and a wonderful grandfather, but he's also a very private person in terms of family life.'"

Elizabeth Birch, former executive director of the Human Rights Campaign, and Hilary Rosen, a partner in Berman Rosen Global Strategies, write in the Washington Post (5/8, A19, 744K) that in her book, Mary Cheney "says publicly for the first time that she disagrees with the positions President Bush has taken with respect to gay and lesbian issues. We had presumed that was the case but are certainly glad to hear it." They add, "Until now, in the calculus of choosing between her father and the realities of her own life, Cheney has apparently opted to be a loyal daughter. … Mary is leading the Cheney family to bring new understanding to dinner-table discussions across the land. We look forward to the Cheney family embracing this teachable moment, not just on the book tour but in election halls, state legislatures and Congress."

Huffington Post Has Become Online Force. USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) reports that Ariana Huffington's web log, The Huffington Post marks its one year anniversary this week. USA notes, "It's open to debate whether the Greek-born, Cambridge-educated Huffington, who famously went from conservative to liberal in the mid-1990s, is as influential a blogger as she says. But with what she says is 2 million visitors to her website each month, Huffpost has definitely emerged as an online force."

Herbert Says Hillary Clinton Should Show More Leadership On Iraq. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M) writes that labor organizer Jonathan Tasini "is trying to piece together a primary challenge to the re-election bid of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, primarily because of her stance on the Iraq war. Mr. Tasini is against the war and wants American troops pulled out of Iraq forthwith." Herbert adds, "It's not at all clear what Senator Clinton's position is. And for a Democratic Party that has suffered a succession of brutal defeats with excessively cautious candidates, Mrs. Clinton's indecisiveness on the war may be a hint of yet another disaster in the making." Herbert notes that in terms of overall policy, Clinton "seems to be right there with Bush, Cheney, Condi et al," and adds that as the early front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, she "has a special obligation to Democratic voters. They deserve much better leadership than they've been getting from their party on President Bush's mindless trillion-dollar tragedy in Iraq."

Krugman Says Bush Supporters Have Taken Refuge In Conspiracy Theory. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M), "Some people say that bizarre conspiracy theories play a disturbingly large role in current American political discourse. … For the last few years, the term 'conspiracy theory' has been used primarily to belittle critics of the Bush administration -- in particular, anyone suggesting that the Bush administration used 9/11 as an excuse to fight an unrelated war in Iraq." Krugman adds Administration supporters "won't admit that they built a personality cult around a man who has proved almost pathetically unequal to the job. Nor will they admit that opponents of the Iraq war, whom they called traitors for warning that invading Iraq was a mistake, have been proved right. So they have taken refuge in the belief that a vast conspiracy of America-haters in the media is hiding the good news from the public."

Newsweek Examines AIDS At 25. Newsweek dedicates most of its issue this week to a special report on AIDS at 25. Newsweek (5/15, Jefferson) notes that the disease has killed "more Americans than every conflict from World War II through Iraq," leaving "an indelible mark on our history and culture. … The death toll to date: 25 million and counting. Through the crucible of AIDS, America was forced to face its fears and prejudices." Other stories in the Special Report include examinations of AIDS' impact on black America and the challenges it poses for the black community, a profile of Dr. Peter Pilot, director of UNAIDS, the United Nations' Joint Program on HIV/AIDS, the story of Margaret

Mukacyaka, a Rwandan women who learned she had contracted the disease after being raped, as well as an op-ed from former President Bill Clinton on the global fight against the disease and another from Melinda Gates about the disease's impact on women.

Turmoil In Puerto Rico Stems From Close 2004 Election. The New York Times (5/8, Lyman, 1.19M) reports on political turmoil in Puerto Rico, noting that it has its roots in the "razor-close 2004 election. The government has been unable to pass a new budget for two years, meaning that Puerto Rico continues to operate under the old one, even though costs have risen and the size of the government and the population have continued to grow. The result was that last week, Governor Acevedo-Vilá said the federal government had run out of money, almost two months before the end of the fiscal year on June 30. He ordered a partial government shutdown, furloughing 95,000 civil servants — more than half of them teachers — and closing some 43 agencies, including the largest, the Department of Education, which tossed thousands of students out of school and ended daily school-lunch programs that many of the island's poor families depend upon to feed their children."

Pastor Says Liberals, Conservatives Must Find Common Ground. Henry G. Brinton, pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church, writes in USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) that "conservatives and liberals tend to retreat to their respective corners and gird themselves for battle." Brinton says it is instructive to see these conflicts as an "ongoing struggle between 'obligation-keepers' and 'liberation-seekers.' … One group focuses on the obligations of religious life and seeks moral clarity, while the other tends to see religion as a liberation movement and stresses God's love for the oppressed." Brinton adds that "we need to find ways to combine respect for obligation with an understanding of the need for liberation. Because conservatives and liberals tend to have stakes in both categories, our nation's political polarization might actually shrink as people work together to reconcile the competing demands of these two spiritual truths."

Cheney Maintains Criticism Of Putin. The AP (5/8, Espo) reports that Vice President Cheney "defended his criticism of Russian President Vladimir Putin as measured in tone," rejecting claims that his remarks had been "strident." Cheney emphasized the need for "open, honest, frank discussions." On NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 4, 2:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M), Vice President Cheney was shown saying, "We have no desire to alienate Russia, but you also need to speak truth to your friends." The Wall Street Journal (5/8, McKinnon, 2.11M) says that Cheney endorsed equally critical remarks by former Putin advisor Andrei Illarionov, who said, "The story of destruction of freedom in my own country, Russia, is sad." The Journal says Cheney's "mention of the economist's views represents another ratcheting up of U.S. pressure on Russia, as the two countries' relations continue to fray, particularly over what administration officials describe as Russia's use of its oil and gas resources as a political club against other nations. Mr. Cheney also has criticized Russia's internal repression."

Putin's Popularity Allows Him To Brush Off Critics In The West. Time (5/15, Gumbel) reports, "With oil prices now more than $70 per bbl., Russia is awash in cash -- and more of it is trickling down to ordinary people in ordinary places. … President Vladimir Putin is reaping the benefit of the soaring economy. His approval rating is a rock-solid 70%. That support has allowed Putin to brush off his critics in the West, where the Russian President is often painted as a throwback to autocracy." The Bush Administration "has grown uneasy about Russian assertiveness beyond its borders," and "issued an unusually harsh indictment last week when Vice President Dick Cheney said Russia has 'unfairly and improperly restricted the rights of her people' and warned Moscow against trying to meddle in the affairs of neighboring countries."

Russian Energy Minister Strikes Back At Cheney. The Financial Times (5/8, Buckley) reports Russian Energy Minister Viktor Khristenko "has hit back at accusations by" Vice President Cheney "of [Russia] using its energy resources as 'tools of intimidation and blackmail.'" Khristenko's op-ed in today's Financial Times (5/8) says Russia is "deeply puzzled by recent commentary in the west that distorts Russian energy policies."

McCain Backs Cheney's Remarks. On CBS' Face the Nation (5/7, Schieffer) Sen. John McCain said, "I was very pleased with [Cheney's] comments. … There has been a steady retrogression and a sort of an effort to restore the old Soviet empire, intimidation -- Russian Empire. There's intimidation of its neighbors, using the oil card, throwing people in jail, centralization of power in the Kremlin."

Cheney's Remarks In Russia Were "Carefully Vetted." The New York Daily News (5/8, DeFrank, 729K) reports that as a "quintessential realist" Vice President Dick Cheney "understands full well that his negative public image -- his approval numbers are far worse than Bush's -- has contributed to his boss' decline." Cheney "remains the vice leader of the free world, and his muscular message at a regional conference in Lithuania resonated in many newly independent democracies struggling to reverse decades of Soviet domination." The News adds, "Cheney's remarks overseas had been carefully vetted - he knew precisely what he was saying." The Daly News adds, "The furor over Cheney's prose cleverly served another calculated purpose - deflecting media attention away from his lovefest with [Kazakhstan President Nursultan] Nazarbayev. The dictatorial leader sits on enormous oil reserves coveted by the U.S., but he's hardly a model of democratic reform."

Former Soviet Republics Strive To Conserve Energy. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Champion, 2.11M) reports, "Russia's price shock … is also having an unexpected benefit: It's starting to force fundamental change on some of the most energy-wasteful economies in the world, those of former Soviet republics." Ukraine, Georgia, and Armenia are all investigating means of conserving energy, since Gazprom's pricing strategy has given them a sense of "great urgency."

Cheney Endorses NATO Hopes Of Three Nations. The AP (5/8, Espo) reports that Vice President Cheney "endorsed the NATO membership aspirations of Croatia, Albania and Macedonia." He praised the countries for their ability to "help rejuvenate [the EU and NATO] and rededicate ourselves to the basic and fundamental values of freedom and democracy." However, he "made no mention of any of the controversies on the path toward full membership by later this decade." The New York Times (5/8, Wood, 1.19M) reports that by visiting Dubrovnik, Cheney doled out a "reward for Croatia," which he praised for "substantial progress" such as delivering war crime suspect Gen. Ante Gotovina to an international tribunal. Croatia is now the "favorite" among ex-Yugoslav states "to be accepted into the [EU] and NATO," but it still "has resisted American pressure to sign an agreement that would shield American soldiers from prosecution at the International Criminal Court" and has lost US military aid as a result.

Merkel Invites Bush To Visit Former East Germany. The AP (5/8) reports, "Chancellor Angela Merkel has invited [President Bush] to see the old East Germany where she grew up." Speaking to the German newspaper Bild, Bush said, ""We're all products of how we are raised and, in many ways, where we were raised." He stated that Merkel would plan the itinerary for his July visit.

Iran Threatens To Withdraw From Nuclear Pact. With the UN Security Council expected to debate a draft resolution on Iran this week, the Washington Post/AP (5/8, A13, Dareini) reports, "Iran's parliament on Sunday threatened to pass legislation that would force the government to withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. ... In a letter to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan read on state-run radio, Iranian lawmakers said they would have 'no option' but to ask the government to withdraw from the treaty if the UN chief and the Security Council 'fail in their crucial responsibility to resolve differences peacefully.'" The USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) reports that US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton said the Iranians were "desperate" to conceal the military intent of their nuclear program.

US Pushing "De Facto Financial Sanctions." The Financial Times (5/8, Alden, Daniel) reports, "The US is attempting to persuade European governments, banks and companies to isolate the Iranian government by engaging in de facto financial sanctions, according to US government officials and advisers. The tactics are modeled on those used for the first time last year against North Korea." According to the Times, "John Snow, the US Treasury secretary, last week hinted strongly at the new effort against Iran, saying: 'When the US is confronted with a threat that is unreceptive to diplomatic outreach and when military action is not an option, [financial] tools are often the best authorities available to exert pressure and to wield a tangible impact.'" The Times goes on to quote a senior US official as saying, "I think these financial institutions are very responsible for the most part, and they're trying to figure out what kind of corporate citizens they want to be. They're starting to look at whether they really want to do business with the government of Iran."

Bush Says He's Taking Ahmadinejad's Threats "Very Seriously." The AP (5/8) reports President Bush "says he's paying close attention to threats made against Israel by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. 'I think that it's very important for us to take his words very seriously. When people speak, it is important that we listen carefully to what they say and take them seriously.'"

Former Clinton Advisor Berger Says "Talk to Tehran." In a Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) op-ed column headlined "Talk To Tehran," former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger writes that "another course is possible, one that is more likely to prevent a military confrontation or, if it nonetheless becomes unavoidable, less likely to produce such dangerous aftershocks. The US should sit down with those who should share a sense of danger -- including, first and foremost, the European Union, Russia and China -- and explain that we are prepared for a bold diplomatic move toward Tehran if our allies are ready in exchange to impose tough sanctions on Iran should it reject a reasonable offer." Although "the Bush administration is quick to acknowledge that military confrontation is neither its only option, nor its first one...its ideological inflexibility may be the surest way of getting us there and getting us there in the worst possible posture: without strong international support and facing a united Iranian population. The president has stated that all options are on the table and that is as it should be. But all options include the diplomatic one. The least we ought to do is to try it robustly."

Israeli Police Evict Jewish Settlers In Hebron. In an incident seen as a test for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's newly minted government, the New York Times (5/8, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "The Israeli police on Sunday evicted about 40 Jewish settlers from a Palestinian house in the volatile West Bank town of Hebron. A large police contingent cut through a barricaded door and persuaded some settlers to leave voluntarily, but others were dragged out." The AP (5/8, Plushnick-Masti) adds, "Olmert waited just minutes after the Hebron operation ended before telling his Cabinet that he would also remove unauthorized West Bank outposts" and quotes Olmert saying, "In the next few years, we will change Israel's character to ensure it will be a state with a solid Jewish majority living in defensible borders that can provide security to the residents of Israel." The Washington Times/AP (5/8, Plushnick-Masti) reports that Olmert has angered both settlers and Palestinians by (i) planning "to pull out from most of the West Bank and draw Israel's borders by 2010" and (ii) by vowing to "proceed even without a peace deal."

Jerusalem Barrier Has Unintended Consequences. The Washington Times (5/8, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "An unanticipated consequence of Israel's West Bank security barrier has been an influx of Israeli Arabs into Jewish neighborhoods in East Jerusalem who hope to remain on the Israeli side of the barrier." Palestinians fear "that they may be stripped of residency rights that give them access to Israeli government social services" and therefore "are willing to pay higher prices for small dwellings on the Israeli side of the barrier."

Public Health Declines In Cash-Strapped Gaza. The New York Times (5/8, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "Gaza's once impressive public health system is running down fast under the dual pressure of aid cutoffs and the closing of the Karni crossing point with Israel." Drugs and treatments are in short supply. A report by Physicians for Human Rights/Israel predicts, ""Lack of funding for this system will lead to the deaths of thousands of people in the short term and extensive morbidity in the long term."

Darfur Refugees See Little Change From Peace Pact. The New York Times (5/8, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports that the Darfur peace treaty has brought little tangible benefit so far. UN official Jan Egeland described "a 'scorched earth onslaught' that has driven 250,000 people from their homes in just the past three months, deepening despair even as hopes for peace began to rise." The Times writes that the treaty is threatened by "the failure of negotiators to persuade two [smaller] rebel factions to sign it." However, the Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Houreld, Soares, 61K) reports more optimistically, "Observers say that the most important result of the deal is that it could pave the way for a UN peacekeeping force to enter Sudan. In the past few days different spokesmen for the Sudanese government have confirmed that the government would now at least consider allowing UN peacekeeping troops on the ground, something Khartoum had flatly rejected before Friday's deal." The Monitor adds, "Crucially, this pact seeks to contain and disarm janjaweed fighters before the rebels are asked to withdraw from their positions."

Egeland Is Allowed To Visit Darfur. USA Today (5/8, Slavin, 2.31M) reports, "Sudan allowed a top United Nations relief official to visit the war-torn Darfur region Sunday, the first tangible result of a peace agreement reached Friday with the largest Darfur rebel group." Jan Egeland had "previously been blocked" by Sudan from visiting. US Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said expecting a quick end to the bloodshed would be "unrealistic" but expressed hope that the pact would be "an important step" toward peace.

Blair Faces Growing Labour Party Revolt. After reshuffling his cabinet late last week, the Washington Post (5/8, A11, Sullivan, Jordan, 744K) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair, battered over his Iraq policy and a series of scandals in his cabinet, is facing a growing revolt within his Labour Party as scores of Labour members of Parliament demand that he set a date to step aside." The future of "the Bush administration's closest European ally suddenly appears more shaky and uncertain. Blair, who was already suffering low approval ratings and rebellion among some factions of his party after nine years in office, is facing sharp, new attacks." The AP (5/8, Gardiner) says Labor lawmakers "are circulating a draft of a letter calling on the prime minister to set a date for his departure, a legislator told The Associated Press Sunday." The letter "addressed to Labour's executive committee was widely reported in the British media on Sunday, two days after Blair's major overhaul of his government."

USA Today (5/8, Stinson, Soriano, 2.31M) notes Blair "reshuffled his government Friday after Labor lost 319 seats on local governing boards, mostly to Conservative Party candidates, in Thursday's local elections." It was "the Labor Party's worst election defeat since it rose to national power under Blair in 1997."

AFP (5/8) reports Blair's cabinet reshuffle "failed to silence calls for him to quit. Urging renewal, finance minister Gordon Brown -- widely expected to be his successor -- said a 'stable and orderly transition' of power was required, and put the onus on Blair to name the day for his departure." Meanwhile, according to the Financial Times (5/8, Eaglesham), "The defiant prime minister will on Monday use a press conference and a speech to Labour MPs to stress the risks of not driving through reform. His emissaries were sent out to 'spell out, in stark terms, the risks [of a rebellion] before anything crystallizes that danger', a senior Labour official told the Financial Times, adding that 'he is not going to have a timetable for his leaving dictated to him.'" According to the Times, "Tensions within the party over the succession risked escalating out of control yesterday. Relations between the prime minister and the chancellor appeared to have deteriorated to the point where a smooth handover will be extremely hard to engineer."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) editorializes, "After the worst electoral loss of his career, Tony Blair has carried out the bloodiest purge ever of his cabinet. A last gasp from the British leader, or a big step toward a political rebirth?" Friday's reshuffle "can't substitute for a governing vision or the will to implement it. Mr. Blair and New Labour have been short on both counts of late and paid for it with a pasting in Thursday's local council elections."

Albright Says US Must Keep Pushing Mideast Democracy. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (5/8, A19, 744K), former Secretary Albright writes, "While "it is customary for politicians and commentators to distance themselves from those responsible for foreign policy setbacks...my fear is that, in the process, a new conventional wisdom will emerge that promoting democracy in the Middle East is a mistake. It is not." Although "we should remember that the alternative to support for democracy is complicity in backing governments that lack the blessing of their own people...at the same time, we should keep a rein on our expectations. [President] Bush has said that America 'has a calling from beyond the stars' to proclaim liberty throughout the world." Secretary Rice "argues that the democratic transformation of the Middle East is the only way to guarantee that men do not fly airplanes into buildings. Such rhetoric is overblown. Just because the denial of political freedom is bad, that doesn't mean that the exercise of freedom will always be to our liking. … A successful foreign policy must begin with the world as it is but also work for what we would like it to be. ... If all America stands for is stability, no one will follow us for the simple reason that we aren't going anywhere."

Trial Of Egyptian Dissident Ayman Nour Decried. In the Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M), American Enterprise Institute fellow Joshua Muravchik writes, "None of the setbacks [to democracy in the Mideast] echoes more loudly than President Hosni Mubarak's decision to take the one truly independent candidate who had the temerity to run against him and clap him in jail." Muravchik writes that Mubarak has done his utmost to silence Nour and Nour's wife with court proceedings; however, "a majority of Egypt's judges are in rebellion against the regime, demanding full judicial independence. Although less widely noted outside the country, this may prove to be a more important landmark on the road to democracy than last year's elections." Muravchik concludes that official Egyptian claims that US pressure is "inappropriate and pointless" are belied by the judiciary's "rebellion" and by the sense of insecurity that led to Nour's arrest.

Congress Urged To Ratify Nuclear Deal With India. In the Washington Times (5/8, 90K), security expert Stanley Weiss says that, even though the US-Indian nuclear deal may be imperfect, Washington should ratify it. He warns that rejection could cause Prime Minister Manmohan Singth to "suffer a fatal political blow for aligning India so closely with Washington" and could give "a fresh dose of oxygen [to] the rapidly dying Moscow-New Delhi-Beijing triangle." Weiss concludes, "You go to the altar with the dowry you have, not the dowry you might want. Trying to renegotiate this nuclear deal could poison the U.S.-Indian relationship for years to come."

China Ordains Two Bishops Without Vatican Approval. Time (5/15, Elegant) reports on the "latest episode in the stormy relationship" between the Chinese government and the Catholic church. Last week, the state-controlled Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association "ordained two new bishops without the Vatican's permission. Considering that Rome has claimed absolute authority over clerical appointments for almost two millenniums, its reaction to the news was predictably swift." Time adds, "To some, China's decision to ordain the two bishops was a deliberate bid to reassert its authority over the country's Catholics. … The question is whether Beijing's moves have wrecked the possibility of détente with Rome."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Further 9/11 Prosecutions In Doubt After Moussaoui Verdict. Agence France-Presse (5/8) reports, "Now that a jury has decided Zacarias Moussaoui had only a minor role in September 11, what fate awaits the primary masterminds and plotters of the world's worst terror strikes who are already in US custody?" AFP continues, "Moussaoui escaped a death sentence over the September 11, 2001 strikes because jurors did not believe US government arguments that he had played an integral role in the murder of nearly 3,000 people on that day. … Yet, in what some have hailed as a victory for traditional justice, he was brought to trial in the US criminal justice system and jailed for life, after what many legal observers have termed a fair trial." AFP adds, "However, the mastermind of the September 11 attacks, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed; Ramzi bin al-Shibh, the money-mover behind the strikes; and the supposed intended 20th hijacker, Mohammad al-Khatani, are in US hands. … So far, there is no sign that they will have their day in court. … And the head of Al-Qaeda, Osama bin Laden, remains at large, tormenting America over crackly tapes -- despite US vows to bring him to justice over September 11." AFP notes, "Mohammed, also known as KSM, even played a key role in the Moussaoui trial -- through a summary of his interrogations at a secret US jail, in which he directly contradicted Moussaoui's claims to have been a September 11 plotter. … Prosecutor David Novak stirred intrigue when he referred to Mohammed and other top Al-Qaeda plotters in closing arguments at the Moussaoui trial. … But US authorities have given no sign they are considering any kind of criminal proceeding or even a military tribunal for suspects like Mohammed, who has simply disappeared since his arrest in 2003. … A decision on Mohammed's future will be made 'after careful evaluation of the circumstances of this particular case,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in Vienna this week."

Bush Says He Wants Guantanamo Closed. The AP (5/7) reported comments President Bush made to German radio that "he would like to close the detention center in Guantanamo in Cuba, but is waiting for a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on whether inmates can face military tribunals. 'Obviously, the Guantanamo issue is a sensitive issue for people. I very much would like to end Guantanamo; I very much would like to get people to a court.'" The AP continued, "Bush said the United States 'is strong on human rights and civil rights. That's why we're leading the case in funding for HIV/AIDS in Africa. That's why we're trying to rally the nation to do something about Darfur…. That's why we provide food for the hungry. That's why we try to liberate people when we find them in the clutches of tyranny.'"

Administration Asks Agencies To Push Its Message On War On Terror. The Washington Post (5/8, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Career appointees at the Department of Agriculture were stunned last week to receive e-mailed instructions that include Bush administration 'talking points' -- saying things such as 'President Bush has a clear strategy for victory in Iraq' -- in every speech they give for the department. 'The President has requested that all members of his cabinet and sub-cabinet incorporate message points on the Global War on Terror into speeches, including specific examples of what each agency is doing to aid the reconstruction of Iraq,' the May 2 e-mail from USDA speechwriter Heather Vaughn began. … The e-mail provided language 'being used by Secretary [Michael O.] Johanns and deputy secretary [Charles F.] Conner in all of their remarks and is being sent to you for inclusion in your speeches.'"

UN Torture Committee Probing US Interrogation Tactics. The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Richey, 61K) reports, "The US government's use of aggressive interrogation tactics in the war on terror is under a United Nations microscope." The Bush Administration "has defended its tactics as a means of obtaining actionable intelligence to help thwart terror plots. Critics say it has opened the door to illegal abuse of detainees and even torture. Just how 'aggressive' the tactics have been is under close scrutiny by the UN's Committee Against Torture in Geneva." The Monitor adds, "A US delegation appeared before the committee Friday -- its first appearance since 9/11 -- and it is to face a second round of questioning Monday. The committee is expected to issue a report by May 19. Although it has no specific enforcement powers, the session is viewed as an opportunity to hold countries publicly accountable."

State Department Report Finds Use Of Suicide Attacks On Rise. The Washington Times (5/8, Sands, 90K) reports, "A quarter century into the modern age of suicide terrorism, specialists say the grim tactic is being used more frequently than ever before." The State Department, in its latest annual report on global terrorism, "said a surge in suicide attacks -- at sites ranging from the London subway to the Middle East to Afghanistan -- pushed the number of attacks to record heights last year." The report "counted some 3,000 deaths attributed to 360 suicide bombings last year. That compares with 472 suicide attacks in five years from 2000 to 2004 documented in a study by the Center for Strategic and International Studies; another study estimated 300 suicide attacks in all the years up to the middle of 2001."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Lawmakers Uneasy About Prospective CIA Nominee's Military Background. With President Bush expected to nominate Air Force General Michael Hayden to replace Porter Goss as director of the CIA, key GOP and Democratic lawmakers over the weekend questioned whether it was appropriate to place a military officer at the head of the Agency. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Solomon, 2.11M) reports "lawmakers from both parties said yesterday that there are concerns the military's growing involvement in intelligence collection, both overseas and domestically, could threaten Americans' civil liberties." Hayden's pick, adds the Journal, could also "prove contentious…because of his role in overseeing the White House's warrantless wiretapping program, which has been contested as illegal." USA Today (5/8, Diamond, 2.31M) focuses its report on that latter point, saying "some qualities that gained Hayden favor in the White House may complicate his confirmation." The Bush policy "most closely identified with Hayden is the program to intercept without court-approved warrants international calls and e-mails in the USA involving at least one person suspected of ties to terrorists."

The Washington Post (5/8, A1, Linzer, 744K) reports, "The challenges to Hayden's expected nomination come when Bush is politically at his weakest and Republicans are distancing themselves from the White House in the hopes of retaining their grip on Congress in the midterm elections." The White House "did not formally respond to the criticisms yesterday, but strategists said privately they are confident they can address Republican concerns and have Hayden confirmed." Vice President Cheney, "who is close both to Goss and to Hayden, said the next director will need to focus on the agency's core mission of sending out spies to collect information on targets such as al-Qaeda." NBC Nightly News (5/7, lead story, 3:30, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "The Vice President today told Kelly O'Donnell fighting terrorists has created fresh challenges for the CIA." Vice President Cheney: "It's a whole different kind of target. It places a much heavier emphasis on human intelligence than what was required necessarily before."

The New York Times (5/8, Mazzetti, Stolberg, 1.19M) runs a similar report under the headline "Republicans Fault A Top Pick To Lead The CIA," in which it notes "none of the Republican or Democratic lawmakers who appeared on television on Sunday or who were interviewed separately said directly that they would vote against General Hayden's nomination." But "Hoekstra's remarks, coupled with similar sentiments expressed by leading Senate Republicans, including Pat Roberts, the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, suggest that the general might not have an easy ride toward confirmation."

The story was the lead on ABC, while CBS and NBC reported it prominently as well. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, lead story, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Reaction to Hayden is mixed, at best, from Democrats and Republicans. After a series of failures, many on Capitol Hill are asking whether Hayden is the right man to turn things around." ABC (Morrell) added, "It looks like the biggest obstacle to Michael Hayden taking over the CIA, may not be the fact he ran the President's controversial domestic spying program, but rather his uniform." GOP Sen. Saxby Chambliss: "Now, just resigning commission and moving on, putting on a striped suit, a pinstriped suit versus an Air Force uniform, I don't think makes much difference." Morrell: "The issue for Republicans and Democrats alike, is independence." CBS Evening News (5/7, story 4, 2:30, Chen, 7.66M) said that "surprisingly, a key Republican, Chair of the House Intelligence Committee Peter Hoekstra today came out fiercely opposed to a Hayden nomination." GOP Rep. Peter Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, was shown saying, Bottom line: I do believe he's wrong person, the wrong place, at the wrong time. We should not have a military person leading a civilian agency at this time."

And NBC Nightly News (5/7, lead story, 3:30, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Even though Hayden has clashed with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in the past, critics say a four-star general could still have divided loyalties." James Bamford, intelligence expert: "I think he would be subject to too much influence from the Pentagon. I mean, his chain of command takes him right up to the Secretary of Defense." Mitchell: "Another issue: Hayden's leading role in warrantless surveillance, which he has vigorously defended."

The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Schmitt, 958K) this morning refers to the "surprising opposition" to Hayden, and says it is "unclear how Sunday's burst of concern might affect the timing or substance of that announcement, or whether it reflected concerns that had been previously aired with the administration behind closed doors." USA Today (5/8, Diamond, Jackson, 2.31M) reports that according to "officials: who "spoke on the condition they not be identified," the President has decided to name Hayden as the new CIA director, and "planned to make the announcement today."

Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, appearing on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace) said, "I've got a lot of respect for Mike Hayden," but "I think putting a general in charge…is going to send the wrong signal through the agency here in Washington, but also to our agents in the field around the world." Asked if he has relayed his concerns to the White House, Hoekstra replied, "I've given them my feedback. I don't think anything that I've said to you this morning is news to the White House." Also, GOP Sen. Saxby Chambliss, on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) said, "I too have a little bit of concern, frankly, about military personnel running the CIA. It is a civilian agency. It operates differently from the way that the Defense Intelligence Agency operates. But at the end of the day, Mike Hayden is just a class individual and somebody...who has an awful lot of experience."

Meanwhile, Democratic Rep. Jane Harman, on CNN's Late Edition (5/7, Blitzer) said, "Hayden is a capable man, but there are certain strikes against him. One is his military background. … It will send a bad signal to CIA employees in the field who are worried about a DOD takeover. A second is that he has a technical background. He doesn't have experience building the clandestine service, which is what the CIA needs to transition into. And the third thing is that it's not clear he will be independent of this White House."

Sen. John McCain came out in favor of Hayden, saying on CBS' Face the Nation (5/7, Schieffer), "Hayden is really more of an intelligence person than he is an Air Force officer. As you know, his career has been spent in that area, and his background -- of course, he comes from the NSA. I think that we should also remember that there had been other former military people who have been directors of the CIA."

GOP Sen. Pat Roberts, on CNN's Late Edition (5/7, Blitzer) said, "Here we have a man who everybody says is one of the best briefers that they've ever had on intelligence, a man who has been described by people on both sides of the aisle as probably knowing more about intelligence than anybody else. But there's some real concern about somebody from the military heading up the CIA. You can solve that pretty quickly by simply resigning in terms of his post of being a general and also putting in some deputies there that I think people would agree with, that have a strong civilian background and that would help the situation with the CIA as they transform and continue the transformation." Sen. Dianne Feinstein, on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) made a similar point, saying she thought Hayden is "a logical choice. He is very well respected. He is a professional. He has run an agency, the NSA, which is twice the size of the CIA." However, the CIA is "meant to be a civilian agency. So, you know, he might think about resigning his commission if he's going to do this."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, meanwhile, expressed "serious concerns" about Hayden's role in the domestic surveillance program. On NBC's Meet The Press (5/7, Russert), Pelosi said, "First of all, he's too closely tied to this question of domestic surveillance. … There is a power struggle going on between the Department of Defense and the entire rest of the intelligence community, so I don't see how you have a four-star general heading up the CIA."

The AP (5/8, Pickler) notes additional criticism of Hayden from Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, who said the general "could leave agents with the impression that the CIA has been 'just gobbled up by the Defense Department.'" And the Financial Times (5/8, Sevastopulo) reports "one former senior CIA officer said he was concerned that the Pentagon, which controls 80 per cent of the intelligence budget, was already encroaching into intelligence areas where they traditionally had little expertise." The Washington Times (5/8, Taylor, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Bipartisan Caution Over CIA Nominee."

The AP (5/8, Margasak) profiles Hayden, saying he "doesn't run from a fight, which is just what seemingly awaits the 61-year-old Air Force general expected to be named the new CIA chief. Weeks after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the then-head of the National Security Agency was telling intelligence-gathering teams how they would fight back: White House-approved electronic monitoring, without court orders, of the international calls and e-mails of people in the United States when terrorism was suspected."

The New York Times (5/8, Shane, 1.19M) reports Hayden "won generally high marks at the NSA, though he has acknowledged that the agency deserves some blame for the Sept. 11 and Iraq weapons failures." He also "admitted to Congress last year the failings of his ambitious program to upgrade the N.S.A.'s technology, known as Trailblazer, which by all accounts has cost billions for meager results."

Pelosi Claims Goss's Resignation Was Triggered By Cunningham Investigation. On NBC's Meet The Press (5/7, Russert) Pelosi also was asked if she believes Goss resigned voluntarily, Pelosi responded, "No. … Depending on the story, he's been on his way out for at least one month because of the struggle between him and Mr. Negroponte, but I think that this dismissal was triggered by what has been happening on the scandal front for the Republicans with the third in command, who was hired by Mr. Goss, to be involved in these card games and whatever else it was."

Goss Departure Seen As Signal Negroponte Is Exercising Power. Time (5/15, Duffy) reports that "last week's coup at the CIA, orchestrated by White House officials and Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, went only slightly awry -- and only at the last moment. Bush officials had hoped to take the weekend to quietly prepare for the surprise announcement," but Goss "wanted to control the choreography." Goss "had been hired as CIA chief at the very moment the job began to lose its clout. Less than a year after Goss stepped into the Langley, Va., post, Bush named Negroponte director of national intelligence (DNI) and gave him the authority to oversee and direct 16 intelligence shops -- among them the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the FBI. … Goss's departure was, above all, a signal that Negroponte was finally exercising his powers and trying to slip the stray agencies into harness."

Staring Down Pentagon Seen As Negroponte's Next Test. Time (5/15, Duffy) reports, "Goss's departure means Negroponte's next test will be facing down the Pentagon, which has steadily been gathering clout in intelligence since the war on terrorism began. Everyone knows that battle will make the tug of war with the CIA look like a warm-up, if only because Rumsfeld's skills as an infighter are unsurpassed."

Investigators Interested In Foggo's Role In Cunningham Bribery Scandal. Newsweek (5/15) reports in its "Periscope" column that outgoing CIA Director Porter Goss "leaves an outfit that has far more resources than it did five years ago, but still seems to be struggling with low morale and turf battles. Emblematic of the CIA's woes is its number-three man, Executive Director Kyle (Dusty) Foggo." Federal investigators "are examining Foggo's ties to a congressional bribery scandal. Foggo was a high-school football teammate and college buddy of Brent Wilkes's, a defense contractor who was identified as an unindicted co-conspirator when former San Diego congressman and ex-Navy air ace Randy (Duke) Cunningham pleaded guilty. The CIA has acknowledged that its internal watchdog is investigating if Foggo helped steer any contracts to Wilkes. According to three sources who declined to be identified commenting on the details of a government probe, there are also indications that the Feds are interested in Foggo's role in the wider Cunningham bribery scandal."

Time (5/15, Duffy) reports, "A source close to the investigation tells TIME that the Justice Department is investigating reports that one of Cunningham's benefactors, Pentagon and CIA contractor Brent Wilkes, a buddy of Foggo's since high school, provided Foggo with improper gifts, such as lavish vacations. A CIA spokesman says Foggo 'denies any improper gifts,' and Wilkes' lawyer has similarly denied any wrongdoing."

Gorelick Says CIA Is Demoralized. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 2, 1:00, Harris, 8.78M) last night interviewed former 9/11 Commissioner Jamie Gorelick, who said, "The CIA is demoralized. It has lost a great deal of talent. And the first thing for a new leader will be to really build up the esprit decor and the sense of mission and lead the place." Harris: "What does low morale mean for national security?" Gorelick: "It's a disaster. We've lost some of the key operatives, some of the key analysts over the last 12 months. And it's been a terrible event for the CIA. So, we are hurting in a place we need to be strong."

The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Bowers, 61K) reports, "Morale, already low, plummeted further as Goss's team aggressively sought to identify the sources of leaks of classified information to the press, leading to a recent dismissal of a senior CIA official. … If nominated and confirmed, General Hayden will inherit the morale problems as well as the continued difficulties with collecting human intelligence."

Kristol Calls Decision To Replace Goss "An Outrage." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace), said, "I think Porter Goss was doing what he had to do. I think he was trying to carry out the President's agenda. He took a lot of heat from the permanent bureaucracy at the agency. He fired someone two weeks ago for leaking, which the President wanted, and his reward was to be fired. And I think it's an outrage, and I think it's a terrible signal to conservatives anywhere…in the federal government who are trying to carry out the president's agenda against the bureaucracy, that, unfortunately, the White House is not going to stand behind them."

More Commentary On Goss Departure. USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) editorializes that "the forced resignation after just 19 months of Porter Goss, a Republican congressman and former CIA operative brought in after Tenet to fix the agency, was a minor tremor. But it was also a reminder that the nation's spy apparatus remains ill-prepared to cope with the terrorist threat." Goss "became known more as a wrecking ball than a Mr. Fixit. He lacked experience as a manager of thousands of employees, and the deputies he brought in were widely criticized. Experienced officers and leaders fled. Even more troubling, Goss seemed not to recognize that the time had finally arrived to change the CIA's role."

Historian's Book Blames Bush, Chertoff, Nagin For Katrina Aftermath. In USA Today (5/8, 2.31M), Bob Minzesheimer reviews historian Douglas Brinkley's "account of the natural and man-made disasters that were Hurricane Katrina indicts three public officials he holds most responsible for the chaos that followed the storm. The Great Deluge blames 'the incompetence of George W. Bush, who acted as though he were disinterested in a natural disaster in which there was no enemy to be found.' It says the inaction of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff 'cost lives' and holds Chertoff more culpable than the much-ridiculed Michael Brown, the former FEMA director. And it portrays New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin as gutless, paranoid and 'cracking at the seams' when he needed to be decisive."

Mississippi Teacher Recognized. USA Today (5/8, Kaffer, 2.31M) profiles Mississippi teacher Christina Ross Daniels, a member of "the 2005 All-USA Teacher Team, USA TODAY's recognition program for outstanding K-12 teachers." Daniels "teaches behavior modification at the Picayune Center for Alternative Education. Her kids are all designated 'at risk.'" But "even Daniels' ingenuity was taxed after Katrina. Textbooks, materials and furniture were destroyed. Before the storm, the classroom was a cheery place with bright curtains and art on the walls."

New Orleans Landfill Decision Draws Fire. The New York Times (5/8, Eaton, 1.19M) reports New Orleans officials "have decided where several million tons of" the remains of houses destroyed by Hurricane Katrina "will be dumped: in man-made pits at the swampy eastern edge of town, out by the coffee-roasting plant and the space-shuttle factory and the big wildlife refuge. But more than a thousand Vietnamese-American families live less than two miles from the edge of the new landfill. And they are far from pleased at having the moldering remains of a national disaster plunked down nearby, alongside the canal that flooded their neighborhood when Hurricane Katrina surged through last year." Environmental groups "are also angry, accusing local and federal officials of ignoring or circumventing their own regulations, long after the immediate emergency has ended."

Davis, Shuster Criticize Senate Proposal To Replace FEMA. In a Washington Times op-ed (5/8), Reps. Tom Davis and Bill Shuster say, "A Senate committee recommendation to replace the Federal Emergency Management Agency with an even larger bureaucracy inside the Department of Homeland Security would compound, not solve, the problems laid bare by Hurricane Katrina. Creating the proposed National Preparedness and Response Authority (NPRA) only rearranges the deck chairs on the good ship DHS, while failing to address the most basic structural flaws that all agree hobbled the nation's response to the storm. Instead, we should go back to basics, back to the configuration and mission that enabled FEMA to succeed."

New Orleans Celebrates Jazz Festival. The CBS Evening News (5/7, story 9, 3:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The Big Easy has been back in full swing for the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival, which wraps up tonight. It has been a celebration of the past and a key to the future of an endangered city."

Swimming Pools Are Potential Mosquito Hazard In New Orleans. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 11, 2:15, Savidge, 9.87M) reported, "In the flood-ravaged neighborhoods of New Orleans, thousands of abandoned swimming pools have become giant mosquito maternity wards. More than just a nuisance, they're a danger. Public health expert Dr. James Diaz says conditions in many neighborhoods are ripe for an epidemic." One of the biggest challenges was simply finding pools. There's no city directory that tells you where they are or even how many there are. Satellite pictures are a big help and so is the faith-based charity, Operation Blessing, which provides volunteers and the fish." Costing "about a dime each, the fish are poured into pools where they will eat the bugs and make more fish: A simple solution for a big problem of so many pools."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Hit By Wave Of Suicide Attacks, Car Bombs. Iraq was hit by a wave of violence over the weekend, with reports of multiple car bombs and suicide attacks. The story was the lead on CBS and ran second on NBC; ABC reported it in a brief segment. CBS Evening News (5/7, lead story, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Car bomb explosions in Baghdad and the Shiite holy city of Karbala killed at least 16 people and the US Command today reported the death of a US Marine in Anbar province. The US death toll stands at 2,418 while 4,000 civilians were killed in sectarian violence in the first three months of this year alone."

NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 2, 2:05, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq, this was one of the most violent and deadly days in weeks. There were more suicide car bombings and a gruesome discovery, more bodies of Iraqis believed to be the victims of torture." NBC (Aspell) added, "Iraqi government officials insist the suicide bombers are mostly foreigners." Mowafaq Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Advisor: "We see them of Saudi origin. We see them of Egyptian origin, coming from Algeria, crossing the borders from Syria." Aspell: "But an underground war between Sunnis and Shiites in Baghdad has claimed more victims than suicide bombings lately. Police say the bodies of 42 men -- blindfolded and shot -- have been found in the past 24 hours."

ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 3, 0:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Another big challenge for the CIA, tracking terrorists, in Iraq. Today, in that country, 3 suicide bombers killed 16 Iraqis. Also, 35 bodies tortured and shot were dumped at a hospital in Baghdad. Almost 4,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed in Baghdad in the first three months of this year. That is the highest number since the fall of Saddam Hussein."

The AP (5/8, Reid) reports the violence cast "doubt on US hopes that formation of a new government alone would provide a quick end to the country's violence." The New York Times (5/8, Oppel, 1.19M), Washington Post (5/8, A11, Sebti, Sarhan, 744K), Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Murphy, 61K) and USA Today (5/8, 2.31M), among other sources, also report on the violence.

British Troops Attacked After Reporting To Site Of Helicopter Crash. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 2, 2:05, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Southern Iraq, violence of a different kind this weekend, after British troops were attacked with rocks and Molotov cocktails when they rushed to the site of a helicopter crash in Basra Saturday. The British say 5 Iraqis were killed by Shiite militiamen firing at them from behind the crowd. Today, Basra was quiet after an overnight curfew."

Border Forts Designed To Stop Foreign Insurgents. The AP (5/8, Wagner) reports, "They look more like motels in rural America than forts in a war zone, but a string of low concrete structures are the US-led coalition's first line of defense against foreign fighters trying to sneak into Iraq from Iran and Syria." The United States "has built or renovated nearly 260 forts along Iraq's borders, and installations like Fort Tarik south of the Iranian city of Mehran have taken on new importance because of the showdown with Tehran over its disputed nuclear program. … Border patrols based at Fort Tarik recently captured several suspected Iranian intelligence agents who had crossed into Iraq, a US official said."

Kurdish Government Unifies. The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Daragahi, Rainey, 958K) reports that Iraqi politicians took a break from government formation talks Sunday to inaugurate the Kurds' new regional administration in Irbil. According to the Times, the Kurds "unveiled a new Cabinet, nominally reunifying the government. Kurdish Prime Minister Nechirvan Barzani announced a newly created Ministry of Natural Resources to manage and exploit newly discovered oil and energy deposits. He also vowed to support 'newly liberated' parts of the Kurdish region, including Kirkuk."

Biden Promotes Plan To Decentralize Iraq. Sen. Joseph Biden writes in USA Today (5/8, 2.31M), "President Bush does not have a strategy for victory in Iraq. His strategy is to prevent defeat and to hand the problem off to his successor. Meanwhile, the frustration of Americans is mounting so fast that Congress might end up mandating a rapid withdrawal, even at the risk of trading a dictator for chaos. Both are bad alternatives." Biden adds, "There is a third way. The idea is to maintain a unified Iraq by decentralizing it and giving Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis their own regions. The central government would be left in charge of common interests, such as border security and the distribution of oil revenue. Everything I'm proposing is already in Iraq's constitution. … The only way to hold Iraq together and create conditions for our troops to responsibly withdraw is to give Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds room to breathe in their own regions."

However, in an editorial titled "3 Iraqs Not Better Than 1," USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) says, "The minimum US objective in Iraq has to be to leave behind a relatively stable, democratic country that isn't a haven for terrorists. Ultimately, Iraq might well break down along sectarian lines or descend into full-scale civil war. If that happens, however, it should be despite the best efforts of the United States, not with its encouragement."

National Guard Could Be Phased Out Of Combat Operations Next Year. National Guard troops in Iraq could be phased out of major combat responsibilities nest year, the Los Angeles Times (5/8, Barnes, 958K) reports. Iraq "was an important test of whether the Army could use the Guard more aggressively -- and not just as a last resort. … Leaders of the Guard say their Iraq service has made their force the most capable and experienced it has ever been. But the experience also has exposed weaknesses. Some active-duty soldiers argue the Guard was less prepared for the complexities of Iraq, while guardsmen complain they were subjected to longer separations from their families than active duty counterparts and had to train on out-of-date equipment."

Navy, Air Force Train Soldiers To Do Army Jobs. The Navy and Air Force are training their soldiers for jobs typically performed by the Army in Iraq and Afghanistan. USA Today (5/8, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "Navy and Air Force personnel are replacing Army soldiers to carry out such duties as guarding convoys, patrolling bases and watching for homemade bombs, the top killer of U.S. troops in Iraq. The Navy also is running a prison in Iraq, patrolling rivers and helping to clear and search buildings. … The Air Force has not said how many airmen are doing Army jobs."

US Troops Searching For Bin Laden In Kunar Province. CBS Evening News (5/7, story 3, 1:10, Van Dyke, 7.66M) reported, "In mid-April the US had 2,500 soldiers with Afghan soldiers and in 'Operation Mountain Lion,' the biggest operation in Afghanistan since the US invasion in October 2001. … They are searching for Osama bin Laden. The Pakistani Interior Ministry three weeks ago said they thought Osama bin Laden is in Kunar province and the US tried to hit the number two of al-Qaeda just 50 miles from where this helicopter went down in Pakistan so there's really no difference between Kunar province and Pakistan in this area. This is very strong al-Qaeda and Taliban area."

Ten US Soldiers Killed In Afghanistan Helicopter Crash. Ten US soldiers from Fort Drum in New York were killed in a helicopter crash in Afghanistan Friday. USA Today (5/8, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports, "They died when their CH-47 Chinook transport helicopter crashed near Asadabad in Afghanistan's Kunar province, according to the Pentagon."

CBS Evening News (5/7, story 2, 1:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "US military officials said today that enemy fire did not cause the crash of a Chinook helicopter in eastern Afghanistan Friday, which killed ten Americans. While the cause is still under investigation, the tragedy is being felt hard in Fort Drum, New York, home of the Army's 10th Mountain Division where the fallen soldiers were based." CBS (Miller) added, "The military says the helicopter in Friday's crash was not shot down and it is investigating what went wrong. It's the deadliest accident for US forces this year, the deadliest for Fort Drum since a helicopter crashed on base three years ago."

NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 3, 0:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Military officials in Afghanistan say the bodies of 10 American soldiers have been recovered from the site of yesterday's helicopter crash. The Chinook chopper went down in the eastern mountains of Kunar Province."

Growing Number Of Afghan Women Starting Businesses. The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Montero, 61K) reports that a growing number of female entrepreneurs in Afghanistan are "emerging from the isolation of war and oppression of the Taliban to contribute toward a more prosperous nation and greater independence for women, observers say. According to Microfinance Times, 75 percent of all active microcredit borrowers in Afghanistan are now women, many of whom use their loans to start businesses. … Their efforts, observers say, are indispensable in the struggle to reverse decades of deprivation in Afghanistan."

In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M), Kate Buggeln, a member of the governing board of the Business Council for Peace, writes, "Small- and medium-size entrepreneurs are emerging in Afghanistan. If nurtured, these local business owners will create the economic platform that opens the door for big international business. Some of these entrepreneurs are women, who are even greater proof of the cultural transformation. With little to lose and everything to gain, such women are stepping beyond the Taliban's legacy."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

11 Circuit Curbs Reduction Of Former HealthSouth Executive's Sentence. The Miami Daily Business Review (5/8, Jones) reports, "A federal appellate court ruled Friday that the five-year, probationary sentence given to HealthSouth executive Malcolm E. McVay was too extreme a reduction from prosecutors' recommended sentence of 65 months of prison time." The Review continues, "The three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta said that U.S. District Judge U.W. Clemon in Birmingham, Ala., gave the reduced sentence 'virtually without explanation, and on a wholly improper basis.' Federal judges are bound to consult the federal criminal sentencing guidelines, though they are not obliged to follow them since a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last year." The Review continues, "The 11th Circuit panel noted that McVay was the fourth defendant in the HealthSouth scandal for which the appellate court overturned a trial court's downward departure in sentencing." The Review adds, "The appellate panel remanded McVay's case to the Northern District of Alabama for resentencing consistent with the court's opinion. Although the federal sentencing guidelines are now advisory, appellate courts still can overturn a sentence if the decrease is too dramatic, just as it can when a sentence is enhanced too much. … The HealthSouth scandal involved allegations that company executives, including founder and chief executive Richard Scrushy, improperly inflated its earnings by $400 million. McVay served as chief financial officer, senior vice president and treasurer. The resulting scandal caused a loss in stock price that amounted to $1.4 billion."

Few In Houston Notice Enron Trial. USA Today/AP (5/8, Hays) reports, "Former Enron employees and other Houstonians are going about their lives without dissecting the [Enron] case over water coolers." It adds, "Most say they are more interested in the outcome than the journey" and predicts that "the trial's end likely will renew interest."

Zale CFO Is Put on Leave. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Zimmerman) reports, "Zale Corp. said it placed Chief Financial Officer Mark Lenz on indefinite administrative leave for failing to timely disclose delayed vendor payments that bolstered Zale's 2005 net cash flow." The Journal reports, "The delay of up to $8.2 million in payments didn't affect reported revenue and earnings but did increase net cash flow, the company said." Zale has had previous problems with the SEC: the Journal writes, "The SEC is also investigating how Zale accounted for extended-service agreements, leases and payroll accrual. Also, the SEC had requested material on executive compensation and severance, earnings forecasts, stock trading and the timing of certain vendor payments."

Investors May Take Heart From Citigroup Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Riley) reports, "An arbitration ruling against Citigroup Inc.'s wealth-management unit may lead to similar cases being brought by affluent investors who lost money in portfolios that contained more risk than they say they were led to believe." An NASD arbitration panel ruled that "Citigroup must pay $900,000 to an Ohio couple who lost $1.23 million in retirement savings in less than four years" after entrusting the money to Citigroup's Smith Barney subsidiary. The couple's attorney said, "I tend to believe there were a lot of people taken in by this," thus implying the possibility of future suits. However, the Journal writes, "Under NASD arbitration rules, the legal concept of 'precedent' doesn't apply, so the future impact of the ruling is difficult to measure. Citigroup doesn't plan to appeal the ruling."

Study Says Smaller Firms Pay Higher Costs To Comply With Sarbanes-Oxley. A GAO study has found that smaller companies are paying disproportionately higher costs to comply with new investor-protection rules. The Washington Post (5/8, A10, Day, 744K) reports, "The effect on small and mid-size public companies has been debated since the new rules were adopted by Congress as part of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002." The GAO report "says the full cost and other effects of the new rules won't be known for years because the Securities and Exchange Commission has extended the deadline for small firms' compliance until next year. Even so, the report says, 'regulators, public companies, audit firms and investors generally agree' that the law has had 'a positive and significant impact on investor protection and confidence.'"

Author Suggests How Carnegie Might Address High Executive Pay. Author Curt Weeden writes in USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) that Andrew Carnegie would argue that there is a "connection between surging executive pay and relatively sluggish corporate philanthropy." Weeden adds, "Because shareholders and other stakeholders are showing more and more displeasure about the widening compensation gap between the highest- and lowest-paid workers, here's how Carnegie might try to calm the waters: CEOs and other executives whose compensation is made public in proxy reports would voluntarily agree to donate 50% of their annual increases in salary, bonus and realized long-term compensation to community foundations or other broad-based groups in locations where their companies have a presence or interest. Executives would openly disclose the value of their 'Carnegie Commitments' and would pledge that these special grants would not offset any of their other personal charitable donations. A community-based funding agency would determine how a CEO's gift would best meet high-priority local needs, thus removing any perception of self-interest."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Reportedly Close To Final Decision On Rove. The Washington Post (5/8, A1, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald is wrapping up his investigation into White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove's role in the CIA leak case by weighing this central question: Did Rove, who was deeply involved in defending President Bush's use of prewar intelligence about Iraq, lie about a key conversation with a reporter that was aimed at rebutting a tough White House critic?" Fitzgerald, "according to sources close to the case, is reviewing testimony from Rove's five appearances before the grand jury." Fitzgerald "is weighing Rove's foggy-memory defense against evidence he has acquired over nearly 2 1/2 years that shows Rove was very involved in White House efforts to beat back allegations that Bush twisted US intelligence to justify the Iraq war, according to sources involved in the case." Rove "expects to learn as soon as this month if he will be indicted -- or publicly cleared of wrongdoing." An indictment "would be devastating to a White House already battered by low poll numbers, a staff shake-up and a stalled agenda. If Rove is cleared, however, it would allow Bush's longtime top aide to resume his central role as White House strategic guru without a legal threat hanging over him."

Judge Delays Chicago Mob Trials Until May 2007. The Chicago Tribune (5/7, 643K) reported, "The trial of reputed mob boss Joey 'the Clown' Lombardo and 11 others accused of Outfit-related murders and extortion will not begin for more than a year, a federal judge said Friday. U.S. District Judge James Zagel pushed the trial back six months, to May 15, 2007, to accommodate defense lawyers who were committed to other cases, including the March 2007 trial of former Hollinger chief executive Conrad Black. The new trial date is 'essentially unmovable,' Zagel told lawyers at a status hearing Friday."

Judge To Hear Mafia Cop's Complaints About Defense Attorney. The New York Post (5/6, Singer, 624K) reported, "Mob cop Louis Eppolito will be allowed to air his gripes about his flashy former lawyer Bruce Cutler -- who he says defended him poorly at his murder trial. At the convicted killer's request, Brooklyn federal Judge Jack Weinstein ordered lawyers back into court June 29 to hash out the matter, including Cutler." The Post notes, "The hearing is unlikely to have an impact on whether Weinstein will throw out the conviction, because the judge has already hinted strongly that he would let an appeals court decide the matter."

New York Lawmakers Seek DOJ Action On Fake Police Badge Sales. Long Island Newsday (5/8, Virasami) reports, "Fake police badges continue to be available for sale with just a few clicks on the Internet, months after a federal ban took effect, Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-Forest Hills) said Sunday." Newsday continues, "Joined by Rep. Jerrold Nadler(D-Manhattan), the lawmakers called on the Justice Department to do more to crack down on retailers that sell police badges they fear could be used by criminals. … 'Criminals in Brooklyn and across New York City continue to use fake badges because the Department of Justice has dropped the ball,' Weiner said. 'With a few dollars and the click of a mouse, anyone can still impersonate a New York City police officer.' … They sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting that the ban be enforced."

Politicians Go Silent On Maryland Sniper Trial. The Washington Times (5/8, Ward) reports, "The trial for convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad has been under way for a week in Montgomery County, but the politicians who held numerous press conferences during his three-week rampage in 2002 are silent." Observers attribute the silence of County Executive Douglas Duncan and State's Attorney Douglas Gansler to their desire to protect their ambitions for "statewide office." Duncan is running for governor; Gansler will run for attorney general if incumbent Joseph Curran retires.

Nonprofit Group Official's Bank Records Under Scrutiny In HUD Probe. The Washington Times (5/8, McElhatton) reports, "A probe into the use of federal housing money in the District has led investigators to examine the personal bank records of the chief executive of a prominent nonprofit group, court records show. Bessie E. Swann, executive director for the District-based Wheeler Creek Estates Community Development Corp., tried last year to stop investigators from obtaining her bank records, but a judge recently granted them access on the grounds that the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) was conducting a 'legitimate and reasonable' law-enforcement inquiry, court records show. Wheeler Creek is a 314-unit housing development in Southeast, and Miss Swann has won praise for the nonprofit group's work transforming old public housing into a mix of rental properties and resident-owned homes." The Times notes, "The group, which also oversees job training and senior-citizen services, has received funding through HUD and the D.C. Housing Authority. Wheeler Creek receives most of its $3 million in annual revenue through government grants, tax records show. The financial records also show Miss Swann's compensation has nearly tripled in recent years."

Professor Decries Administration "Threats" To Prosecute Newspapers. Geoffrey R. Stone, a law professor at the University of Chicago, writes in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M) that presidential administrations "have never been inclined to criminally prosecute the news media for publishing information they would rather keep secret. In recent weeks, however, the Bush administration and its advocates, including Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, have spoken of prosecuting," under the Espionage Act, "The Washington Post and The New York Times for publishing Pulitzer Prize-winning exposés of the administration's secret prisons in Eastern Europe and secret National Security Agency surveillance of Americans." Stone adds, "Although the threats of the White House are largely bluster, they must nonetheless be taken seriously. Not because newspapers are really in danger of being prosecuted, but because such intimidation is the latest step in this administration's relentless campaign to control the press and keep the American people in the dark."

CIVIL LAW:

Tobacco Case Features Allegations Of Conflicting Claims. The Nationial Law Journal (5/8, Geier) reports, "An Ohio state court judge is allowing lawyers for Lorillard Tobacco Co. to depose counsel in two asbestos plaintiffs' firms concerning allegedly inconsistent claims they filed relating to the same client's mesothelioma." The Journal continues, "The case of mesothelioma victim Harry Kananian's estate against Lorillard got hung up in Cuyahoga County Court of Common Pleas when the defense told the court that there were conflicting claims in other litigation filed on his behalf. Kananian v. Lorillard Tobacco Co., No. 442750 (Cuyahoga Co., Ohio, Ct. C. P.)." The Journal adds, "James F. Early, a principal of Early, Ludwick, Sweeney & Strauss of New Haven, Conn., one of the firms Lorillard will take discovery from, said his firm amended Kananian's claims when later testimony indicated the original filings were inaccurate or incomplete. The firm also volunteered to return to the trusts any parts of awards that they determined to have been unearned. 'You do the best you can with the information you have, especially when your clients are dying of mesothelioma,' Early said. … Both Early Ludwick and Brayton Purcell filed claims on behalf of Kananian and his family based on his military and occupational exposure to asbestos."

DOJ_NMG_0028490

CIVIL RIGHTS:

"Unconscious Bias" Expert In Demand For Employment Bias Lawsuits. Business Week (5/15, Orey) reports that in the forum of employment law, "sociologist William T. Bielby is the leading courtroom proponent of a simple but powerful theory: 'unconscious bias.' He contends that white men will inevitably slight women and minorities because they just can't help themselves. So he tries to convince judges that no evidence of overt discrimination -- no smoking gun memo, for instance -- is needed to prove a case. As Allen G. King, an employment defense attorney at the Dallas office of Littler Mendelson, puts it: 'I just have to leave you to your own devices, and because you are a white male,' you will discriminate." Bielby has served "as an expert witness in dozens of major cases, including those currently pending against Wal-Mart (WMT), FedEx (FDX), Johnson & Johnson (JNJ), and Cargill. For plaintiffs, Bielby's fees -- now $450 an hour, and totaling $30,000 or more per case -- are often worth it. Numerous lawsuits in which he has been involved have ended in big dollar settlements, including suits against Merrill Lynch (MER), Morgan Stanley (MS), and Home Depot (HD). In 2004 a federal judge in San Francisco cited Bielby's testimony when he agreed to let the largest-ever employment class action go forward against Wal-Mart Stores Inc. The company is appealing but could face gender bias claims on behalf of more than 1 million women."

New Sorority Is Based On Islamic Principles. The Washington Post (5/8, B1, Kinzie, 744K) reports on a new sorority at the University of Maryland Baltimore County. The sorority, for Islamic women, "started with Althia Collins, an educational consultant in Alexandria, and her daughter Imani Abdul-Haqq, who wanted to pledge a sorority in North Carolina. When Abdul-Haqq walked in with her hijab , Collins said, 'everyone looked at her like she had three heads.' Collins and her daughter, who became Muslim several years ago, thought sororities' emphasis on volunteering and leadership would make Muslim women more visible and help dispel stereotypes."

ANTITRUST:

Wachovia Buys Golden West For $26 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Berman, Mollenkamp, Bauerlein) reports, "Wachovia Corp. struck a roughly $26 billion stock-and-cash deal to buy Golden West Financial Corp., making a big gamble on the volatile mortgage business as it extends its ambition to become a true national bank." It observes, "Wachovia agreed to pay 1.051 shares of its stock, valued at $62.42 based on Friday's closing prices, plus $18.65 in cash for each share of Golden West. The price represents a roughly 15% premium to Golden West's current market value." The Journal characterizes Wachovia as "the most voracious of all [banking consolidators], forging about 140 takeovers and mergers -- large and small." The Journal writes, "The deal is expected to close in this year's fourth quarter." USA Today (5/8, Woodyard) reports the deal will extend Wachovia's "reach in high-growth Sun Belt markets." The New York Times (5/8, Sorkin, Creswell) reports, "While the deal will give Wachovia a strong foothold in the mortgage-lending space, there are growing concerns among investors and Wall Street analysts that growth in that business may have peaked as interest rates creep higher."

Fisher And Thermo Are Near Deal. The New York Times (5/8, Sorkin, Pollack) reports, "Fisher Scientific International, a supplier of medical laboratory equipment, was near a deal last night to merge with Thermo Electron Corporation, a rival, in a deal valued at about $11 billion." The merger would "create a new giant in the laboratory instrument business, an industry that has already been marked by some degree of consolidation." The Times writes, "An announcement of the deal is expected today, though people involved in the talks warned that the talks could collapse. The transaction is unusual in that Thermo Electron, which has only about half the revenues of Fisher, is technically the acquirer in the deal." The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Berman) reports, "Under the terms approved by both boards last night, Fisher shareholders will receive two shares of Thermo, which closed Friday at $39.45 each on the New York Stock Exchange. At a combined $78.90, Thermo's offer represents a premium of 7% to Fisher shareholders based on where the two stocks closed trading on Friday."

ENVIRONMENT:

BP Texas Refinery Called Nation's Biggest Polluter. The AP (5/8) reports, "The nation's worst polluting plant is the BP PLC oil refinery where 15 workers died in an explosion last year, raising questions about whether the company has been underreporting toxic emissions." The AP continues, "BP's Texas City refinery released three times as much pollution in 2004 as it did in 2003, according to the most recent data from the Environmental Protection Agency. … The increase at BP was so large that it accounted for the bulk of a 15 percent increase in refinery emissions nationwide in 2004, the highest level since 2000." The AP adds, "The company is investigating whether it has been accurately documenting pollution, the Houston Chronicle reported on Sunday. There could be more federal fines levied against the energy giant if mistakes are found. … BP already faces a record $21.3 million fine from the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration for 300 safety and health violations found at the Texas City refinery after the deadly explosion in March 2005 that also injured 170 workers. … BP still faces criticism for management lapses that may have contributed to last year's explosion. The company faces a possible Justice Department investigation and is dealing with victims' lawsuits."

Former USDA Secretaries Call For Farm Policy Overhaul. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, A2, Roberts, 2.11M) reports, "US farm policy is outdated and needs to be overhauled in light of emerging global markets and tighter federal budgets," according to the American Farmland Trust that has the endorsement of two former agriculture secretaries. In a report to be released today, the Washington-based farmers group will "call on Congress to revamp the nation's agriculture programs rather than extend the 2002 Farm Bill before it expires next year." The plan, which will propose a new "safety net" for commodity-crop programs to replace certain subsidy programs, has been endorsed by former agriculture secretaries Dan Glickman and Clayton Yeutter.

Bond Said To Be Blocking Shift To Lower Emission Lawnmowers. The CBS Evening News (5/7, story 8, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported lawnmowers are "loud" and they "fill the air with surprising amounts of pollutants, but efforts to reduce more emissions are being stymied." CBS (Bowen) added, "It may not look like a pollution monster, but California officials say the old family lawnmower is a smog machine -- taken all together, little engines that foul the state's air with 22 tons of pollutants a day, the equivalent of 800,000 cars a day." Adding catalytic converters "to lawnmower engines, the same device used on cars to cut smog. But Briggs & Stratton, America's largest mower engine manufacturer is strongly resisting, and with two plants in Missouri the company is getting some extraordinary help from Missouri Senator Christopher Bond." The Senator "has been able to delay new regulations in California by requiring EPA studies of the standards and when the EPA approved the new standards, Bond's office complained the EPA study was flawed."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Official Calls Bald Resignation "Slap" At Mueller. Under the headline "FBI Counterterror Chief Bald Bolts For Exit," CQ (5/8, Stein) reports that "after just eight months on the job," NSS Director Gary Bald "abruptly submitted his resignation to agency director Robert S. Mueller III. … FBI sources dismiss the idea that Bald, never a popular figure around the J. Edgar Hoover Building, was leaving for anything but a chance to retire comfortably," but "the hasty exit 'seems like a slap at the director,' one of Bald's predecessors said in an e-mail. 'It looks bad externally. Internally some are happy.'" CQ notes the "sharp questioning" Mueller received last week before the Senate Judiciary Committee about turnover, and adds that although "no replacement has been named," a "dark horse is Art Cummings, a Mueller favorite who…now runs the National Security Branch for the Washington Field Office. Whoever the choice, Mueller has to be hoping the seventh time is the charm."

Federal Law Limits Sale Of Some Medications. The Long Island Newsday (5/6, Ochs) reports that on April 8, federal law "began limiting the sale of over-the-counter cough and sinus products such as Sudafed and Claritin D with pseudoephedrine, ephedrine or phenylpropanolamine. … The law says that a person can buy no more than 3.6 grams per day of products with pseudoephedrine, ephedrine or phenylpropanolamine. That translates to 73 60-mg tablets, said Rusty Payne, spokesman for the federal Drug Enforcement Agency."

North Dakota Seeks To Allow Farmers To Grow Industrial Hemp. The AP (5/8) reports North Dakota "is pushing ahead with plans to license state farmers to grow industrial hemp even as it tries to allay law enforcement fears about marijuana's biological cousin. State Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson and his department are crafting hemp rules after meeting in February with Drug Enforcement Agency officials in Washington. A public hearing on the proposed rules is slated for June 15." More than 20 news outlets published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sites the AP story, including The Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, and Miami Herald.

New Source Of Heroin Said To Be Increasing Demand In St. Louis Area. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (5/7) reports an incident that "kicked off a series of heroin seizures" also was an "early sign of a troubling, yet largely unnoticed, trend in the St. Louis area: the rise of a new source of heroin that is increasing the overall supply and expanding demand." The Post-Dispatch adds that the volume of Afghan heroin, which the United Nations "says now accounts for 87 percent of the world supply" means that even a small share "making its way to the United States constitutes large quantities of the drug. Afghan heroin now represents up to 20 percent of all heroin in the United States, Drug Enforcement Administration officials say."

Alaska House Passes Marijuana, Meth Bill. The AP (5/6, Volz) reports the Alaska House "passed legislation Friday night that would restore criminal penalties for marijuana possession and make it tougher to buy the ingredients to manufacture methamphetamine. The bill was approved by the Senate last month and now goes to Gov. Frank Murkowski to sign into law. … The bill says marijuana is a more potent and dangerous drug than it was 30 years ago."

The Juneau Empire (5/7) reports the vote "came up a day after Gov. Frank Murkowski called a news conference and put the 'methijuana' bill on his must pass list for the remainder of the session, which ends Tuesday night. … According to the bill, those possessing more than 4 ounces would be charged with a Class C felony, which would carry a maximum prison sentence of five years."

The Juneau Empire (5/5) also reported Murkowski "said the drug legislation, House Bill 149, is significant for children who are at risk from domestic abuse from meth addicts or want a future career in Alaska. Too many military recruits and other job applicants in Alaska fail their drug urine tests, the governor and his labor commissioner, Greg O'Claray, said."

Local TV Coverage. KCAL-TV, Los Angeles (5/6, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Alaska has the most liberal laws on marijuana possession in the country, but that could soon change. The Alaska House passed legislation yesterday that would restore criminal penalties for marijuana possession. The bill has already been approved by the Alaska Senate and now goes to Governor Frank Murkowski whose backed it from the beginning. A…decision by the Alaska Supreme Court legalized the use of small amounts of pot."

Nigerian Report On Drug Testing Accuses Pfizer Of Violating International Law. The Washington Post (5/7, A1, Stephens, 744K) reports, "A panel of Nigerian medical experts has concluded that Pfizer Inc. violated international law during a 1996 epidemic by testing an unapproved drug on children with brain infections at a field hospital. That finding is detailed in a lengthy Nigerian government report that has remained unreleased for five years, despite inquiries from the children's attorneys and from the media." According to the Post, "The report concludes that Pfizer never obtained authorization from the Nigerian government to give the unproven drug to nearly 100 children and infants. ... Pfizer's experiment was 'an illegal trial of an unregistered drug,' the Nigerian panel concluded, and a 'clear case of exploitation of the ignorant.'"

Network TV Coverage. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 5, 0:30, Harris) reported, "There are allegations reported today that Pfizer tested an experimental drug on children and infants in Nigeria without informing parents or getting permission. 'The Washington Post' says the Nigerian government says about 100 patients received a drug called Trovan during a meningitis outbreak in 1996. For its part, Pfizer insists it acted ethically and that the drug saved lives."

Faulty Arson Probe In Texas Could Have National Implications. The AP (5/8, Tanner) reports, "We hear it after a smoky blaze that destroys a house, or an all-night warehouse inferno: The cause of the fire is under investigation. … Now those investigations themselves are getting a hard look, including the case of a Texas man executed two years ago for a house fire that killed his three little girls. Fire experts say he was wrongfully convicted because junk science was accepted as expert testimony." The AP continues, "The implications go far beyond Texas. More than 5,000 people are imprisoned nationwide for arson, and at least some are likely to have been wrongfully convicted, said five experts who analyzed testimony in the Texas case. The experts included veteran arson investigators and people with backgrounds in science and engineering who have taught other investigators." The AP notes that experts "concluded bad science was at the heart of the testimony that led to Cameron Todd Willingham's conviction for a 1991 fire in Corsicana, Texas. Willingham maintained his innocence up to his execution in 2004. … The expert panel, along with The Innocence Project, a New York-based group that seeks to uncover wrongful convictions, presented their study on Tuesday to a special Texas commission set up to examine forensic misconduct. … The problems with arson convictions could be huge. The Innocence Project commissioned the panel to study Willingham's case, but said its network of state projects around the country has already begun to review other arson convictions."

IMMIGRATION:

Specter Says Senate Will Vote On Immigration Bill Next Week. Sen. Arlen Specter, appearing on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace), said he expects the McCain-Kennedy immigration reform bill to be brought to the floor for a vote "a week from tomorrow." He added, "I've talked to the majority leader, Senator Frist, and I expect to be on the conference committee. … The speaker has said he's for a guest worker program. That's what the president wants."

Implementing Immigration Reforms Seen As Likely "Nightmare." CQ (5/8, Crowley) reports, "Whatever Congress agrees on — some sort of legalization plan, a guest-worker program, mass deportation or a combination of the three — would have to be implemented by the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, and the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency. That, people on both sides of the debate agree, is likely to be a nightmare." The "big worry is that the immigration agencies are hard-pressed to handle their current responsibilities without having to administer a complicated new program such as the one envisioned by a Senate proposal that is most likely to form the basis for a congressional compromise. It would create a guest-worker program and provide different treatment for illegal immigrants depending on how long they have been in the United States. Some could stay; others would have to leave; and some could apply for re-entry." Complaints "about the agencies are widespread. The Government Accountability Office has issued 12 reports in the past year critical of the way the three agencies operate."

Report Finds Most Lawmakers Don't Know Words To National Anthem. Roll Call (5/8, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that tonight's episode of Nightline features a report by Claire Shipman in which she and a camera crew "came to Capitol Hill on Thursday and caught 16 House Members and four Senators off guard, asking each to sing the national anthem. … As Shipman will report tonight, the unscientific survey found that most lawmakers belong to the majority of Americans — 61 percent, to be exact — who don't know all the words to the national anthem, according to one recent poll."

Latin American Prosperity May Fuel Immigration To US. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Millman, 2.11M) reports that economists and politicians have long "said the solution to surging emigration is prosperity at home. If Mexico and other Latin American nations that send millions of migrants to the U.S. could grow fast enough, the theory goes, their residents wouldn't head north for work." Last month, Mexican President Vicente Fox, "looking to influence the U.S. Congress's latest efforts at an immigration overhaul, pledged his country would do its part, creating good manufacturing jobs for Mexican workers on their home soil." But "now the theory looks wrong -- or at least simplistic. Emigration often surges along with economic development. In an expanding economy, would-be migrants gain the skills at home that pay better abroad. They also are better able to save the relatively modest sums -- $200 for a cut-rate airline ticket; $1,000 or so for a reliable border-crossing guide -- that workers looking to enter a better labor market need to take their skills north."

King Appears With 9/11 Family Members To Promote Immigration Crackdown. The New York Post (5/8, 624K) reports Rep. Peter King on Sunday "appeared with relatives of 9/11 victims at Ground Zero to urge the passage of harsher immigration laws to help thwart terrorism." King, who appeared with members of 9/11 Families for a Secure America, said, "Immigration control and border security are absolutely essential to homeland security."

Terms Of Immigration Debate Little Changed Since Turn Of 20th Century. The Washington Post (5/8, A1, Powell, 744K) reports in a front page story that the "bitter arguments of the past" about immigration "echo loudly these days as Congress debates toughening the nation's immigration laws and immigrants from Latin America and Asia swell the streets of U.S. cities in protest. Most of the concerns voiced today -- that too many immigrants seek economic advantage and fail to understand democracy, that they refuse to learn English, overcrowd homes and overwhelm public services -- were heard a century ago. And there was a nub of truth to some complaints, not least that the vast influx of immigrants drove down working-class wages. Yet historians and demographers are clear about the bottom line: In the long run, New York City -- and the United States -- owes much of its economic resilience to replenishing waves of immigrants."

European Governments Restricting Immigration To Highly Skilled. The Washington Times (5/8, Bryant, 90K) reports European governments, "facing an immigration debate much like that in the United States, are pulling in the welcome mat, especially for low-skilled, illegal aliens from Africa and other developing regions." The European governments are "introducing immigration tests and other devices to screen out all but the brightest and most qualified in the face of rising anti-immigration sentiments -- despite having an aging population that leaves many European countries in need of new workers to bankroll their welfare states."

refusing people bank loans based on their address -- has long been outlawed in the U.S. as discriminatory. But in Europe, although many countries are facing increasingly tense relations with their minority populations, there has been little debate about how financial discrimination -- ranging from redlining to setting higher insurance rates -- affects immigrants seeking to better integrate. Critics say that unless this changes, Europe will struggle to assimilate its already alienated immigrant population."

Many Salvadoran Villages Rely On Wages From Workers In US. The Washington Post (5/8, A1, Aizenman, 744K) reports in a front page story that "like villages across El Salvador, Piedras Blancas has been nearly emptied of its working-age inhabitants. Left behind are children and grandparents who live on money that relatives send from such previously unheard of places as 'Manassas, Virginia,' 'Houston, Texas,' and simply 'Maryland' -- the catchall term by which people here refer to a host of Washington area suburbs." Although "exact figures are difficult to determine, the director of the village school, who has tracked the student population for two decades, estimates that more than 3,500 Piedras Blancas natives, or about 40 percent of the population, live in the United States."

TAX:

Republicans, Democrats Disagree On Tax Bill's Beneficiaries. The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Havemann, 958K) reports, "Would the rich make out like bandits from the tax-cut bill that is the object of intense behind-the-scenes debate in Congress? Or would low-income taxpayers not only hold their own but come away with more than their share of tax breaks?" Republicans are "inclined to argue that the bill, notably its provision to extend beyond 2008 today's low tax rates on investment income, would particularly benefit the poor. Nonsense, say most Democrats; the bill is tilted sharply to the rich." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley "ratcheted up the fairness debate last week by contending that taxpayers in the lower brackets — particularly the elderly — would actually do better than those earning $200,000 and up." Democrats, "not surprisingly, scoff at this argument." Senate and House "tax writers have agreed on the central elements of the main tax bill — namely, relief in the 2006 tax year from the alternative minimum tax and extension for two more years, through 2009 and 2010, of the tax breaks for investment income." What has "delayed negotiations, which began late last year, are the contents of a second bill, potentially including extensions of the research and development tax credit and of the deduction for some college tuition costs, and more careful scrutiny of the tax-exempt status of charitable organizations."

More Investors Expecting Low Capital Gains Rates Caught In AMT Trap. Business Week (5/15, Gleckman) reports the alternative minimum tax "has been a problem since capital- gains rates were trimmed in '03, but it's about to get worse as millions more taxpayers fall under the AMT. In 2006, as many as 4 million investors may find themselves caught in this AMT trap, according to congressional estimates. That's twice as many as last year. And while many may not know it, they have been stuck in the middle of a battle on Capitol Hill over whether to extend the low rates on capital gains and dividends or overhaul the poorly understood AMT." The Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center "estimates that nearly 64% of those making $100,000 to $200,000 could face the AMT in 2006." For months, Congress has "been trying to figure out which tax issue to address first. Short of both time and money, lawmakers have been arguing over whether to limit the AMT or extend the 15% rate on capital gains and dividends, which is due to expire at the end of 2008. President George W. Bush and many Hill Republicans say they are closing in on a deal that would extend the low cap-gains rates until 2010 but curb the AMT's reach for only this year." Ask investors "which problem they would rather see Congress address, and most would probably vote for capital-gains relief. But for many under the shadow of the AMT, that would be a bad choice."

Author Says Tax Cuts Correlated With Spending Increases. In his Washington Post column (5/8, A19), Sebastian Mallaby says tax cutters believe "that tax cuts will force matching cuts in spending by the government. It's a faith that" author Jonathan Rauch "traces to the presidential debates of 1980." The "starve the beast" argument "has been a favorite of Republicans. It's an expedient argument, of course, since it justifies the tax cuts that voters are assumed to love. But even the most nakedly cynical politicians need policy fig leaves. 'Starve the beast' has allowed tax cutters to feel decent." But the argument "has been discredited. Rauch cites William Niskanen, an economist who worked in the Reagan White House and now chairs the Cato Institute." Niskanen's "result punctures his own party's dogma. Tax cuts are associated with increases in government spending. The best strategy for forcing cuts in government is actually to raise taxes."

NYTimes Criticizes Use Of Supplementals To Finance Iraq War. An editorial in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M) says, "President Bush is trying to score unearned points for fiscal rectitude by railing against the Senate's outsize $109 billion supplemental spending package, which includes money for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as well as hurricane relief. But the real scandal is Mr. Bush's own preference for financing much of the cost of the Iraq war outside the normal budget process. … Congress would gladly vote the Pentagon every cent it needs to fight in Iraq and Afghanistan and rebuild its ground forces so that they are available for other military emergencies. But with so much of the war off budget, as it were, Congress is instead being asked to approve one of the biggest military budgets in American history for projects having little to do with current fighting."

NYTimes Calls For Modest Social Security Benefit Cuts, Tax Increases. Another editorial in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M), "Buried in the newly released 2006 annual report on Social Security, there is good news on the program's long-term health. … Projected 'cost rates' in this year's report show smaller annual deficits in Social Security than had previously been assumed, starting around mid-century." The Times adds, "What the big impact of small adjustments shows is that Social Security is a dynamic system, adaptable to the 21st century. … To that end, phasing in a modest package of benefit cuts and tax increases over the next several decades is the best way to ensure that the system won't come up short a generation from now.'

WPost Says Bush Leaving "Terrible Fiscal Predicament." In an editorial (5/8, A18), the Washington Post says, "Sheer coincidence: Last Monday, the Social Security and Medicare trustees released their annual depressing report. On Tuesday, congressional negotiators handed President Bush a 'victory' -- his assessment -- in agreeing to extend his capital gains and dividend tax cuts. Mr. Bush and his fellow tax-cuts-above-all proponents would like you to believe that the two events are unrelated. But taken together they underscore the terrible fiscal predicament that Mr. Bush has chosen to bequeath to his successor."

Novak Says Grassley Using "Phantom Bill" To Hold Up Pressing Tax Legislation. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (5/8) writes this morning that Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley (R), who "last Tuesday cavalierly rejected a summons to meet in the Oval Office with" President Bush, "is playing his own game on tax legislation without interference from anybody, even the president." Grassley "has blocked the tax bill extending dividend and capital gains tax cuts that is essential to the economy. Until now, he has held it hostage for a 'second bill' on taxes containing unknown private deals cut by Grassley with other senators. In short, high-priority tax legislation is delayed by a phantom bill." Novak notes, "The 'second bill' is described in the news media as containing routine extenders of tax benefits, but it is surely more than that. The assumption on Capitol Hill is that Grassley has made specially tailored promises to individual senators to get enough votes for the tax reconciliation bill. If so, these tax goodies will have to be compensated for in the same bill by revenue raisers." Grassley's "critics among reform-minded Republicans refer to tax pork in the second bill, but they cannot be sure about something that is hidden. It is impossible to conduct a meaningful debate on a phantom bill, and that is precisely the way Grassley has constructed the situation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheney Says Retirement Not An Option. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 4, 2:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M) interviewed Vice President Cheney. Asked if there was a benefit "if you were to retire, to allow the President to choose someone else who might then have an advantage in 2008," Vice President Cheney said, "Well, I'm not sure it would be an advantage, but that's not my concern. I, in effect, took on the obligation when I put my name on the ballot to serve out my term. I've got a contract, if you will, with the American people. My term ends in January of 2009 and barring some unforeseen disaster, that's what I'll do." O'Donnell: "What role do you think you play for 2008?" Vice President Cheney: "We've got a lot of good candidates out there. At the appropriate time, I'll be happy to campaign for the ticket in 2008, if they want me do, they may not want me to. That'll be their call."

Rumsfeld Says He Has No Plans To Retire. Fox News (5/7, Baier) ran an hour-long special report on Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld last night. The special examined Rumsfeld's tenure in the Bush Administration, including his high poll numbers and status as a "media star" following the 9/11 attacks and President Bush's response in Afghanistan, as well as his decline in the polls since then. The Fox report noted that former thee star Marine Corps General Paul Van Ryper "is the 8th retired general to say Rumsfeld must go," but the special also included an interview with Rumsfeld in which he said he has no plans to retire. The Secretary also said he does not think about his legacy, noting, "I think about doing what I am doing and I live full days I get up early, I stay up late. I feel fortunate to be doing what I am doing. To be able to be involved in something as important as this at this moment in our country's history I think is something that I feel fortunate to be involved in."

Rumsfeld Dismisses Journalist Criticism Of Iraq War. On Fox News (5/7, Baier), the Secretary also criticized journalists and their coverage of the Iraq war, saying that there is "a whole cluster of people in our country, a lot of them in the journalism business who had much of their lives formed by the Vietnam war, so it's understandable they would try to relate everything that happens in the 21st century to what they experienced in the 20th century. That doesn't make it accurate or apt."

Rumsfeld Says Success In War On Terror Is Hard To Measure. Asked how he measures success in the war on terror, Rumsfeld said on Fox News (5/7, Baier), "First of all, it's very hard to do. It's going to be a long war it will take years

I am afraid like the Cold War. We are putting a lot of pressure on terrorists and life is more difficult for them. It's harder for them to raise money and harder for them to move around and harder for them to communicate with each other. More difficult to recruit people. But it's a difficult thing to measure."

Rumsfeld Says World Was Simpler When He Served Under Ford. Rumsfeld, who also served as Defense Secretary under President Gerald Ford, was also asked on Fox News (5/7, Baier) what is different between the job now and the job as it was under Ford. Rumsfeld said, "It was a simpler world. We had one major problem, the Soviet Union was expanding and it was active in this hemisphere. We had the advantage we could look at it month after month, year after year get good at understanding it and keep an eye on it."

Rumsfeld Critic's Anti-Israeli Views Noted. The Weekly Standard (5/15) reports in its "Scrapbook" column that, "The story line was compelling: A face-off between a beleaguered secretary of defense and a brave former intelligence professional. 'Rumsfeld Heckled by Former CIA Analyst' blared the headline on the ABC News website. The AP reported that a 'former CIA analyst, Ray McGovern, asked [Donald Rumsfeld], 'Why did you lie to get us into a war that caused these kind of casualties and was not necessary?'" But almost all of the reports "failed to report was the relevant fact that McGovern is not simply a veteran of the CIA but a hard-left conspiracy theorist who blames the Iraq war on 'O.I.L.' As McGovern that night told MSNBC's Tucker Carlson, the only member of the mainstream media with the elementary curiosity to broach the subject, O stands 'for oil; I for Israel; and L for logistics, logistics being the permanent . . . military bases that the U.S. wants to keep in Iraq.'"

Biden Is "Unalterably Opposed" To Boyle's Nomination. Sen. Joseph Biden was asked on Fox News Sunday (5/7, Wallace) if he expects federal judge nominees Brett Kavanaugh or Terrence Boyle will be filibustered, Biden said, "I have no line in the sand with Kavanaugh. I want to know more. I haven't made my judgment whether I'm for or against him, and I don't think we'd be part of a filibuster there. With regard to Boyle. … I am unalterably opposed to Boyle…and I think Boyle will not go forward, and I would consider joining an effort to prevent his vote."

Snow Expected To Improve White House Relationship With Press Corps. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 9, 2:35, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that starting today, "It will be Tony Snow's turn to step up to the podium to face the Washington press corps." NBC (Alter) added, "Snow is the latest to go on the firing line. The Fox News anchor replaces Scott McClellan, who had problems handling the White House press corps. Snow is expected to do better." Benjamin Bradlee, former Washington Post editor: "He seems outspoken, confident."

In the National Review (5/15), Byron York says outgoing White House press secretary Scott McClellan "wasn't really right for the job, and two, he sometimes wasn't clued in on what was really going on. Add to that all the difficulties the Bush White House has experienced in the last year, and you've got the need for a new start. That's where Tony Snow comes in." When Snow's appointment was "announced, it was met with pretty much universal praise, at least from Republicans. Even the way it was announced was an encouraging sign, as some in the GOP saw it." Snow is "certainly expected to be more deft and understanding in dealing with the press," and as "far as being in the loop is concerned, Snow is said to have received assurances that he will be included in the policy-making process so that he can better explain it to the world." York concludes Snow will "undoubtedly have a honeymoon, and then, when the first big bad thing happens — or maybe when there's one of those tempests in a teapot that periodically consume the White House press corps — he'll be tested under fire. No one can say what will happen, but White House officials are looking for better days in the briefing room."

50% View Bush Decision To Hire Snow Favorably. The Washington Times (5/8, Harper, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Americans give a favorable initial assessment of Tony Snow, the newest White House press secretary, according to a new Zogby poll. The decision to bring the former Fox News TV and radio host on board is seen as 'an excellent or good' decision by 50 percent of the respondents and viewed negatively by 40 percent. … The online survey was conducted April 28 through May 1 and included 5,578 likely voters. The poll carries a margin of error of 1 percentage point."

Democratic Report Says Bush Team Less Diverse Than Clinton's. The Washington Post (5/8, A17, Lee, 744K) reports, "President Bush's crop of political appointees includes fewer women and minorities than did President Bill Clinton's at comparable points in their presidencies, according to a new report by House Democrats. Women made up about 37 percent of the 2,786 political appointees in the Bush administration in 2005, compared with about 47 percent in the Clinton administration in 1997, according to the report and supplemental data released last week by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee. Similarly, about 13 percent of Bush administration appointees last year were racial minorities, compared with 24 percent in the fifth year of Clinton's presidency, the report found." The Post adds, "The 13-page report, compiled using data from the Office of Personnel Management, says the number of women and minority appointees increased during the first five years after Clinton took office and has declined during Bush's tenure." However, the report "does not mention…that Bush has established a record of diversity in his Cabinet. Bush's Cabinet, which includes the vice president and the heads of 15 executive departments, currently has two Hispanics, two African Americans and two Asian Americans. Three departments -- State, Education and Labor -- are headed by women, and a fourth, Interior, has an acting secretary who is a woman. Before Bush took office, no minority had occupied any of the four highest-profile Cabinet positions -- attorney general and the secretaries of the Defense, State and Treasury departments."

Invitation For NIH Official's Party May Violate Ethics Rules. The Washington Post (5/8, A17, Weiss, 744K) reports there is a "cloud hanging over a going-away party for National Cancer Institute Director Andrew C. von Eschenbach, who in March was nominated by President Bush to head the Food and Drug Administration." An invitation "recently circulated to National Institutes of Health employees for a 'farewell reception and roast' to be held on the NIH campus in Bethesda in honor of von Eschenbach" asks for a "$25 entrance fee for the May 17 event" and "solicits additional 'contributions' for a gift for the outgoing boss. Problem is, that's a violation of federal ethics rules, according to legal eagles inside and outside the Beltway."

House, Senate Ethics Bills Would Identify Earmark Sponsors. Roll Call (5/8, Ackley) reports the House and Senate ethics bills "mirror one another when it comes to one earmark measure, with both calling for Members who sponsor the narrowly targeted pots of funding to attach their name." Vincent Versage, "a lobbyist with the National Group who has worked for appropriations clients for decades," said, "I don't know of any Member who would not want to have his or her name attached. A lot of these Members are proud of bringing projects back." Roll Call adds another appropriations lobbyist "said that forcing Members to disclose which earmarks they push for will have a chilling effect on Members' support for projects outside of their home states, even if the project is relevant to the committees they sit on."

Contractors Who Benefited From Earmarks Paid For Mollohan Travel. Roll Call (5/8, Bresnahan) reports Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), "his wife and two top aides took a five-day trip to Spain in June 2004 that was paid for by a group of government contractors for whom Mollohan steered tens of millions of dollars in earmarked funds, according to travel records and other documents." The trip sponsor "listed on travel disclosure forms is the 'West Virginia (WV)-01 Trade Delegation,' which Mollohan's office described as an 'ad hoc group' of 19 government contractors and West Virginia-based nonprofits that came together to pay for the trip. The total cost of the trip for Mollohan, his wife and aides was $7,874."

Former Aide Benefited From Stevens Earmark. CQ (5/8, Zeller) reports Sen. Ted Stevens "may someday be able to boast paternity of an Office Building That Made a Former Aide Rich. The aide in question is Trevor McCabe, who spent his first eight years out of Harvard in the 1990s rising from legislative correspondent to legislative director in Stevens' office. Now a lawyer and real estate developer in Anchorage, last fall he made a bit of a killing on the $558,000 sale of a bedraggled quarter-acre plot in downtown Seward to the nonprofit Alaska SeaLife Center — which had suddenly found itself with money to spend last summer thanks to some earmarking legerdemain by Stevens." McCabe has "a knack for owning property in the right place at the right time. He's also an investor in waterfront property in tiny Mat-Su, which should appreciate nicely once the hamlet is linked to Anchorage with the construction of Don Young's Way — one of the two Alaska bridges that drew such ridicule last summer when they received generous earmarks in the new highway and mass transit law." The Seward deal "was announced last October, two months after Stevens, the longest-serving Republican on the Senate Appropriations Committee, used the fiscal 2006 Interior spending law to take $1.6 million away from the National Park Service and give it to the SeaLife Center, an aquarium started eight years ago mainly with proceeds from the Exxon Valdez oil spill settlement."

Dean Distinguishes Democrats' Scandals From GOP's "Culture Of Corruption." DNC Chair Howard Dean was asked on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) if he thought recent controversies surrounding Democratic members of congress could blunt his party's contention that the GOP is characterized by a "culture of corruption." Dean said, "There are individual Congressmen that have made mistakes. Unlike the Republicans, our leader, Nancy Pelosi, particularly asked for an ethics investigation of Congressman Jefferson. … This is a culture of corruption the Republicans have brought to Washington…that goes from the White House to the vice president's office to the leadership of the United States Senate to the leadership of the United States House of Representatives. And in the agencies, corruption has become a way of life, and it has to change."

WPost Says White House Should Release Records Of Abramoff Visits. The Washington Post (5/8, A18, 744K) says in an editorial, "It's taken a Freedom of Information Act request, a lawsuit and a court order, but the White House will soon release Secret Service records detailing lobbyist Jack Abramoff's visits there. This is long overdue, and the delay has been due to -- there's no other word for it -- stonewalling by the Bush administration. The administration says the lobbyist attended a Hanukkah party or two and 'a few staff-level meetings.' With whom? About what? We don't know, and it's not clear the Secret Service records will reveal that. But certainly, at this point, the White House does know, and leaving these questions unanswered, as it has tried to do, remains unacceptable." The Post's "challenge to -- and advice for -- the incoming press secretary, Tony Snow: Rather than a steady drip, drip, drip of Abramoff news, get it all out, quickly and with enough details to make clear what, exactly, transpired between the corrupt lobbyist and the president's aides."

Rhode Island Democrats Expected To Back Kennedy. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 6, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Rhode Island, Democrats are expected to unanimously endorse Congressman Patrick Kennedy for reelection at their convention tomorrow. This comes days after Kennedy's public statement that he is struggling with drug addiction, and the congressman's claim that the sleep aid, Ambien, may have in part caused him to drive his car into a security barrier on Capitol Hill last week. … He's not the only person to claim a link between that pill and some unusual actions." NBC (Ellis) added, "Patrick Kennedy insists Ambien, the popular sleeping pill, is partly to blame. Kennedy is just the latest person involved in bizarre behavior to say, in effect, the Ambien made me do it."

USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) also reports Kennedy's "decision Friday to return to drug-abuse rehabilitation after a traffic accident appears unlikely to have an impact on his political fortunes, political analysts say." Rhode Island Democratic Chairman Bill Lynch "said he expects Kennedy will be unanimously endorsed for re-election at tonight's state party convention." State GOP Chairman Patricia Morgan "issued a statement calling on Kennedy to vacate his House seat while he deals with the problems. No Republican has emerged as a potential challenger to the sixth-term lawmaker."

Kennedy Enters Rehab At Mayo Clinic. Time (5/15, Tumulty) reports in its "Periscope" column that Rep. Patrick Kennedy "once seemed the great hope of his generation of America's most storied political dynasty. … But Patrick's story turned stereotypically Kennedy in other ways. … The car crash last Thursday at about 2:45 a.m. was the most bizarre incident yet. … Strangest of all, Kennedy claimed, 'I simply do not remember' the incident. He blamed the sleeping pill Ambien and the gastrointestinal drug Phenergan and checked himself into the Mayo Clinic, where he had been treated in December for addiction to prescription painkillers."

Kennedy's April Car Accident In Rhode Island Not Widely Reported. The Weekly Standard (5/15) reports in its "Scrapbook" column that, "In last week's issue, The Scrapbook brought you the woefully under-reported tale of how Rhode Island Democratic congressman Patrick Kennedy had last month wrecked his car pulling into a CVS parking lot in his home state. His own handwritten account of the accident (in a police report supplied to us by Boston Herald columnist Howie Carr) looked like it had been scrawled with his teeth so that he could keep his cocktail-shaker hands free." Kennedy, "who usually takes a year or two off between career-debilitating incidents such as trashing yachts and pushing around female airport security guards, this time decided a quick follow-up was in order. Early last Thursday morning, at 2:45 a.m., he was involved in a single-car accident near the Capitol building."

Kurtz Says Kennedy Has Gotten "Easy Ride." Howard Kurtz writes in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (5/8, C1, 744K) , Kurtz) reports in its "Media Notes" that given the journalistic obsession with the Kennedy family and its tragicomic soap opera," Rep. Patrick Kennedy "seem to have gotten an easy ride -- except in the New England press, which has chronicled his every misstep." Kurtz adds, "While Kennedy, the 38-year-old son of Ted Kennedy, was widely reported to have held a news conference Friday, it was nothing of the sort. He read a statement designed to elicit sympathy, saying he was going into rehab, and took no questions. This amounted to an age-old damage-control technique: changing the subject."

Capitol Police Upset Over Kennedy Fiasco, McKinney "Attack." Roll Call (5/8, McArdle) reports, "As an internal investigation conducted by the acting chief of the Capitol Police found that two police management officials improperly handled the department's investigation into a car crash involving Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.) last Thursday, national Fraternal Order of Police called the incident a symptom of a broader problem of 'political policing' being encouraged by agency brass." Chuck Canterbury, president of the National FOP, said in a release Friday evening, "First, we had [Rep. Cynthia] McKinney (D-Ga.) attack a police officer, and now we allegedly have Rep. Kennedy narrowly miss striking a police cruiser before crashing into a security barrier. … In both cases, Capitol Police management favored politics over protocol." Union "officials are particularly upset that the officer who responded to Kennedy's accident was not allowed to complete his investigation at the scene but was instead ordered to leave the scene while Kennedy was given a ride home by department officials."

Protesters Rally Against Drug Benefit Plan Outside Leavitt's Home. Hundreds of demonstrators gathered outside HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt to protest the Medicare drug benefit. The Washington Post (5/8, B3, Thompson, 744K) reports, "The unannounced visit to Leavitt's home in Arlington County was made by members of the Chicago-based National People's Action, a coalition of neighborhood advocacy groups that is more than 30 years old." The group "demanded that the HHS chief extend until Dec. 31 the deadline that millions of seniors who lack prescription drug coverage have to select a plan." HHS spokesman Bill Hall said "Leavitt is out of town this week and will not meet with the group. 'He has said before that he opposes extending the May 15 deadline' for enrolling in Medicare Part D, which provides prescription drug coverage for people who qualify for Medicare."

Intelligence Employees Have Higher Job Satisfaction Rate Than Overall Government. The Washington Post (5/8, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "A survey of intelligence community employees shows they are dedicated to their work, with job satisfaction rates higher than for the overall government. The survey also shows that intelligence agencies have room to improve on some personnel practices, particularly in the areas of leadership and performance. Only 44 percent of the survey respondents said they were satisfied with the policies and practices of their senior leaders, and only 29 percent said their agencies take steps to deal with sub-par colleagues who cannot or will not improve their job performance." Seventy-seven percent "of IC employees said they have 'a real opportunity' to improve their skills at their agencies, compared with 63 percent of all federal employees."

Lawmakers' Use Of Acronyms To Name Bills Noted. The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Simon, 958K) reports that to "haiku, the limerick and the cameo brooch, Washington has added its own contribution to the diminutive arts. Remember Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, the deficit-fighting bill? Or Sarbanes-Oxley, the corporate reform law? Bills named for lawmakers are pretty much passe. These days, an attention-getting acronym — the political equivalent of a vanity license plate — is in." Though some bills "in the past did have acronyms, they rarely grabbed the public's attention. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1993, or OBRA, for example, is remembered by few people other than Washington's most die-hard number-crunchers. Now, acronyms help explain what the bill is all about. They are proof that even bill names have become part of Washington's all-consuming political spin."

FDA To Examine Infections In Women Who Took Abortion Pill. The FDA has released the agenda for meeting that will focus on infections in women who took a drug to induce abortion. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Mathews, McKay, 2.11M) reports, "The meeting, to be held jointly with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases at the CDC's Atlanta campus on Thursday, will focus on scientific questions about the origins, cause and need for future research about infections due to the bacterium Clostridium sordellii, as well as another type of pathogen that has no tie to the drug. … Panels of scientists are expected to discuss the infections, but possible regulatory actions won't be debated."

Former Official Decries FDA Budget Cuts. William Hubbard, who retired last year after more than 25 years at the Food and Drug Administration, writes in the Washington Post (5/8, A19, 744K), "For most of the FDA's 100-year history, presidents and congresses have recognized its importance to public health by giving it the resources and authority to respond to the rapid evolution in risks from the thousands of products it regulates. But for some years now, the agency's budget has remained essentially flat while major new responsibilities have been piled on. … How much does Congress appropriate for the agency that has responsibility for the safety of the whole country's supply of food, drugs, vaccines, medical devices, cosmetics, animal foods and drugs, dietary supplements, and more? The same amount as Fairfax County, Va., provides for its schools."

Pentagon Has Backlog Of Private Sector Security Clearance Applications. Since the Pentagon stopped processing applications for security clearances from the private sector, a backlog of thousands of applications has developed, according to the Washington Times (5/8, Waterman, 90K). The Times says "some are fretting that the moratorium is starting to threaten American security. The decision by the Defense Security Service "was announced late last month, but has attracted surprisingly little notice, perhaps because the Armed Services committees of both chambers of Congress were busy last week marking up the Pentagon budget authorization bill. In a statement e-mailed to contractors April 28, the agency, blaming 'funding constraints' said they had 'discontinued accepting industry requests for new personnel security clearances and periodic reinvestigations effective immediately and until further notice.'"

OTHER NEWS:

GOP Said Not To Be Benefiting From Positive Economic News. Roll Call (5/8, Pershing) reports that Friday morning, "the White House and Congressional Republican leaders sent out a flurry of press releases bragging about the latest economic news: 138,000 jobs were created in April, productivity is high, unemployment is low and consumer spending is on the rise." Meanwhile, the Associated Press "was reporting details about its latest national poll results: The job approval ratings of both Congress and President Bush were the lowest they'd ever been in the survey, while the percentage of Americans who believed the country is on the wrong track had climbed to 73 percent." The "question for Republicans — who are increasingly worried by the disconnect between those two sets of numbers — is whether voters can be convinced before they go to the polls in November that a) the economy is doing well; and b) that their Member of Congress deserves to be re-elected because of it." Republican "strategists and pollsters believe that high gas prices are definitely helping to prevent Americans from viewing the economy in rosy terms."

The AP (5/8, Raum) reports, "America's economy is strong. Or it's in trouble. It just depends on who's talking. Trying to retool his message and right his listing presidency, President Bush is speaking out more frequently and forcefully on the economy. It's in good shape right now, his advisers say, and they want him to take more credit for it." The latest reports "show healthy increases in economic growth, job creation, home ownership, retail sales and consumer spending. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is at a six-year high." But "Democrats are peddling a different message: Soaring gasoline and health care costs are burdening ordinary people; mortgage costs and credit card rates are on the rise; jobs are threatened by outsourcing. As for those tax cuts treasured by Bush, Democrats argue they have benefited mainly the wealthy." Friday's unemployment report, "showing the jobless rate holding steady at 4.7 percent with a lower-than-expected job-creation rate of 138,000 in April, was seized by both sides to buttress their great-economy/troubled-economy arguments. Each party accuses the other of 'cherry picking' statistics to bolster its case."

Dow Nears All-Time Record High. USA Today (5/8, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "A rousing rally Friday — sparked by a weaker-than-expected jobs report that renewed hope that the Federal Reserve might soon stop raising interest rates -- lifted the Dow 139 points to 11,578 -- its highest close since its Jan. 14, 2000, peak. As a result, the venerable index, home to blue-chip names such as Caterpillar, McDonald's, IBM, Boeing and Home Depot, is just 145 points shy of topping its 11,722.98 record close. … If the Dow can set a record, despite a dizzying array of roadblocks ranging from $70-a-barrel oil to rising interest rates to ongoing instability in the Middle East, it's likely to provide a huge psychological boost to Wall Street."

Bush Aides Tout Job Market. Edward P. Lazear, chairman, and Katherine Baicker, a member, of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, write in the Wall Street Journal (5/8, Lazear, Baicker, 2.11M), "There is no question that the US is experiencing strong economic gains, with GDP growing at an impressive annual rate of 4.8% in the last quarter. The economy created about two million jobs last year, and Friday's jobs report for April showed that we are on track to add more than two million new jobs this year." This "job growth is undeniable." The labor market is "strong. Job growth has been impressive, and unemployment is at a very low 4.7%. Productivity is increasing at more than 3% per year. This strong economy means that we can look forward to even higher wages and living standards in the future. We should continue to strive to ensure that all Americans are able to obtain the skills that will enable them to share in this prosperity."

Small Business Employment Seen As "Mixed." USA Today (5/8, Hopkins, 2.31M) reports, "Small employers are sending contradictory signals about hiring, a new survey shows, as the broader economy produced unexpectedly slim job gains last month. Filling jobs continues to be tough: 31% of 1,094 small employers in a just-released April survey reported at least one hard-to-fill job opening, says the National Federation of Independent Business trade group. That's the highest share in six years. Plus, 16% of those surveyed said they plan to add jobs in the next three months, up from 9% in March. … The report offered a mixed view of US employment and suggested the economy is heading for more moderate growth that's less likely to trigger inflation woes."

Ranks Of "Near Poor" Said To Be Rising. The New York Times (5/8, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports, "Americans on the lower rungs of the economic ladder have always been exposed to sudden ruin. But in recent years, with the soaring costs of housing and medical care and a decline in low-end wages and benefits, tens of millions are living on even shakier ground than before, according to studies of what some scholars call the 'near poor.'" In "a rare study of vulnerability to poverty," Mark R. Rank, a sociologist at Washington University in St. Louis, has "found that the risk of a plummet of at least a year below the official poverty line rose sharply in the 1990's, compared with the two previous decades. By all signs, he said, such insecurity has continued to worsen."

Fed Widely Expected To Boost Rates This Week. USA Today (5/8, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "There is little doubt Federal Reserve policymakers will raise interest rates for the 16th time in nearly two years when they meet Wednesday." But "when it comes to predicting what they will do after that, the picture is unusually cloudy." Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues "are widely expected to raise their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs economywide, a quarter-percentage point to 5% this week. That would bring rates to the highest level in more than five years."

Gas Prices Rise To Average $2.95 Nationally.

The CBS Evening News (5/7, story 7, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Gas prices are still climbing, only not as fast. According to the Lundberg Survey, prices at the pump rose just four cents over the past two weeks to a national average of $2.95 for self-service regular."

Despite Record Profits, Oil Industry Faces Uncertain Future. Business Week (5/15, Reed) reports, "Big Oil, that clutch of oil and gas giants in the U.S. and Europe, has big problems. Yes, we know it sounds ridiculous. Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM) has been reporting the lushest earnings in the history of the business, notching up $8.4 billion in its latest quarterly report. Combine the forecasted 2006 earnings of BP, Royal Dutch Shell (RD), Chevron (CVX), Total (TOT), ConocoPhillips (COP), and ExxonMobil, and you get roughly $135 billion, a sum greater than the gross domestic product of the Czech Republic or Israel. These companies, moreover, enjoy huge political clout in their home countries, have spotty environmental records, and staunchly defend outrageous prices at the gasoline pump." But one does not "have to love the big oil companies to worry about their ability to provide us with the energy we need. That job is getting difficult, thanks to huge technical challenges, competition from national oil companies, and demanding, even hostile foreign governments. Just look at events in Bolivia on May 1, when the government abruptly nationalized the nation's gas fields."

Daschle, Khosla Call For Setting Fuel Standards To Increase Ethanol Consumption. In a New York Times op-ed (5/8), former Sen. Tom Daschle and venture capitalist Vinod Khosla say, "Our national leadership must promote a market-based shift away from petroleum-based fuels toward renewable fuels produced in America with American technology. The CAFE standard does nothing to encourage that change. It requires American automakers to build cars and trucks that meet a minimum standard of average mileage traveled per gallon of gasoline." The US instead needs to "to upgrade to a new CAFE: Carbon Alternative Fuel Equivalent. This new CAFE will measure 'petroleum mileage' and give automakers incentives and credits for increasing ethanol consumption as a percentage of fuel use of their vehicles, not least by promoting flex-fuel vehicles, which can run on either gasoline or E85 fuel, a blend of 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline. This approach promises several significant benefits."

Convergence Of Factors Puts Focus On Raising CAFE Standards. The Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Knickerbocker, 61K) reports the "confluence of skyrocketing gasoline prices, new reports on climate change, and the never-ending debate over US energy policy sharpens efforts to encourage - if not mandate - better gas mileage in the cars Americans drive." New legislation "is being introduced, and President Bush has asked Congress to give him the authority to increase passenger-car fuel economy standards." In Washington Friday, "a bipartisan group of five senators introduced legislation that would offer government loan guarantees and grants to automakers and parts manufacturers. The bill would speed up development of vehicle technology designed to conserve fuel. This includes using lightweight materials, being able to plug in and recharge batteries of gas-electric hybrids, and making alternative fuels more available around the country. Another bipartisan bill would raise the CAFE standard for cars and light trucks to 33 m.p.g."

Higher Fuel Costs Contributing To Increases In Airline Fares. ABC World News Tonight (5/7, story 6, 1:45, Harris, 8.78M) reported airlines "recently raised ticket prices to their highest level since September 11th. Airlines are doing everything they can to save money. But airfares will not be descending anytime soon." ABC (Jamieson) added, "Quietly, airlines, even low-cost carriers, have been raising fares since January." Analysts say "recent fare increases are only the beginning as the skyrocketing fuel prices threaten the airlines' already shaky balance sheets. For the nation's biggest airline, American, every penny increase in the price of jet fuel adds another $28 million a year in costs."

Higher Gas Prices Not Deterring Vacation Travel. NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 7, 2:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "According to a new AP poll, 70% of Americans say they expect high gas prices will cause them financial hardship. 66% admit they are already cutting back on driving. How will that affect travel plans as the summer vacation season revs up?" NBC (Hattori) added, "With regular gas close to $3 a gallon nationwide and even higher in many western states, you'd think sticker shock would deter vacationers. Last Memorial Day weekend, an estimated 30 million Americans took a road trip. Believe it or not this year, even $3 a gallon gasoline isn't likely to put a huge dent in those plans." Travel experts "say vacationers are planning shorter trips or staying closer to home, but they're still going."

WSJournal Says Raising CAFE Standards Will Lead To More Dangerous Cars. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "John Kerry, take a bow. You may have lost the last election, but at least one of your policy ideas has seen its ship come in anyway. We refer to the Bush administration's recent embrace of higher auto-mileage standards." The White House "has now completed its surrender by inviting a similar change for cars as a 'proven way to conserve gasoline.' This is where President Bush's new 'addicted to oil' rhetoric is taking him and us -- namely, to the government further dictating the kind of cars Americans will be able to drive, even if those cars aren't as safe on the road. It is undeniable that higher CAFE standards kill people: Larger, heavier cars have lower death rates in crashes."

WSJournal Praises Shadegg Proposal To Lift Tariffs On Imported Ethanol. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) praises Rep. John Shadegg, the "the first politician of note to propose that the government suspend the outrageously high tariffs on imported ethanol. The idea here is to offset some of the gas price hikes that Congress has caused via the ethanol mandate it passed last year. That requirement -- that drivers use 7.5 billion gallons of ethanol annually by 2012 -- is currently helping to increase the cost of gas, since ethanol is in short supply. Gas refiners and transporters are struggling to move ethanol from its Midwest production base to places like the East and Gulf Coasts, contributing to the shortages."

Rove Using Threat Of Democratic Control As Way To Turn Out Base. The New York Times (5/8, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports the "prospect of the administration spending its last two years being grilled by angry Democrats under the heat of partisan spotlights has added urgency to the efforts by Karl Rove and Mr. Bush's political team to hang on to the Republican majorities in Congress." Rove is "facing an increasingly difficult climate for Republicans, and an increasingly assertive Democratic Party." But the "prospect of Democrats capturing either, however, may be one of the best weapons Mr. Rove has as he turns to what he has traditionally done best: motivating his party's conservative base to turn out on Election Day."

GOP Also Sees Battle Over Judicial Nominees As Way To Motivate Base. The New York Times (5/8, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports it has "been a year since a bipartisan group of 14 senators, the Gang of 14, reached a compromise that smoothed the way for confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees, including two Supreme Court justices. Conservatives, eager to stir some enthusiasm among their base in an otherwise gloomy election year, have spent months prodding the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, to take up candidates left out of that deal." Frist "is doing just that. On Tuesday, the Senate Judiciary Committee will hold a hearing on the confirmation of Brett M. Kavanaugh, a White House aide, whose nomination to a federal appeals court has been stalled for three years. Mr. Frist has promised a vote on Mr. Kavanaugh this month. Conservatives are also pushing for a vote on an even more contentious nominee, Judge Terrence W. Boyle, a longtime federal district judge in North Carolina." With Democrats "promising to question Mr. Kavanaugh extensively and threatening to block Judge Boyle by filibuster, Republicans say they could not be happier." Sen. John Thune said, "A good fight on judges does nothing but energize our base."

Democrats Vow Probes Of Administration If They Win Congress. USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) reports Democrats will "launch investigations of the Bush administration if they take control of Congress in November but are not out to impeach the president, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said Sunday." On NBC's Meet the Press, Pelosi said Democrats "would hold hearings on the use of intelligence in the lead-up to the Iraq war and investigate the high price of energy and prescription drugs if they win the extra 15 seats they need for a House majority in the midterm elections." But she added "investigation does not equate to impeachment."

GOP Campaign Officials Tell Candidates To Focus On Local Issues. The Washington Times (5/8, Lambro, 90K) reports Republican campaign officials "are urging their candidates to focus on local issues to blunt what they think is a sour national mood that could cut deeply into House and Senate majorities in the November elections." In a "strategic shift in response to generic congressional polls that show the Democrats lead the Republicans by 15 points among registered voters, the Republican campaign committees are falling back on an old election axiom: All politics is local. And they point to numerous races where their candidates have begun addressing more local issues -- from sales-tax increases to overcrowded suburbs -- issues that can spark more voter anger than some of the national issues Democrats would like the election to be about."

Republicans Benefit From More Even Distribution Across Country. The Washington Post (5/8, A3, Edsall, Goldfarb, 744K) reports that with Democrats "locked out of the White House and in the minority in Congress, it might seem that there just aren't enough Democratic voters to win elections. But political scientist Gary Jacobson says the problem is actually more complicated: The distribution of Republican voters is more politically effective across the nation." Jacobson's research "shows a little more than half of all the nation's 435 congressional districts over recent decades consistently favored Republican presidential candidates. A little less than 40 percent went for Democrats." Jacobson "said this is due to an 'inefficient' distribution of Democratic voters, with many concentrations of 60 percent or more in urban areas and places with large numbers of minorities. Republicans, he found, are distributed more evenly, yielding more districts in which GOP voters have a slimmer but sturdy majority."

The Los Angeles Times (5/8, Brownstein, Hook, 958K) reports control of Congress "may turn on whether the public's clear desire for change is powerful enough to overcome the resistance to change built into the political system." Discontent "with the nation's direction and the federal government's performance is virtually screaming from public opinion surveys, which show approval ratings for President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress falling to their lowest levels." But "today's wave of dissatisfaction is crashing into a political structure that is much more stable than in 1994. It now is tougher to beat House incumbents or to win Senate seats in states that usually back the other party in presidential elections."

DeLay Admits GOP Has "Problems With Our Base." In an appearance on ABC's This Week (5/7, Stephanopoulos) former Rep. Tom DeLay was asked if the GOP should be concerned by diminished support from conservatives, DeLay answered, "We do have wind in our face. We do have problems with our base. We've also got six months to turn that around. … They may have problems with what's happening on a national basis, but they support their incumbent."

Local GOP Leaders Seek DeLay Replacement. The AP (5/8) reports, "Environmental lawyer Tom Campbell, who finished a distant second to Rep. Tom DeLay in the March primary, was among seven hopefuls who interviewed this weekend for the outgoing Republican's place on the November ballot." The potential candidates "met with GOP leaders from Harris County in a closed session on Saturday. Each handed in a questionnaire and gave presentations to about 50 local GOP officials. … A committee of party precinct chairmen from the four counties in DeLay's congressional district will pick a nominee to face Democrat Nick Lampson." Others who interviewed were Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs; state Rep. Robert Talton of Pasadena; state Rep. Charlie Howard of Sugar Land; state Sen. Mike Jackson of La Porte; businessman Timothy Turner and Precinct 3 Fort Bend County Commissioner Andy Meyers.

Gore May Run For President In 2008 After All. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Calmes, 2.11M) reports, "For former Vice President Al Gore, a rash of favorable publicity surrounding this month's opening of his movie 'An Inconvenient Truth,' and the growing political resonance of its subject -- global warming -- are stoking the most serious speculation about a Gore political comeback since his loss in the 2000 US presidential election." In 2008, "that could mean a once-unimaginable battle for Democrats' nomination between Bill Clinton's former vice president and his wife, Hillary Clinton. To some pro-Gore Democrats, worried about Mrs. Clinton's electability, that is part of the appeal."

Democrats Believe Webb Can Hobble Allen As Presidential Candidate. Time (5/15) reports in its "Periscope" column that with their US Senate candidate in Virginia, Jim Webb, Democrats "think they can score a trifecta by beating a Republican incumbent in the South, hobbling him as a possible presidential candidate and boosting the fortunes of one of their White House wannabes." Webb "still has to get through the June 13 Democratic primary, but pragmatists in his party are already tipping him as the man to win in November against the folksy Allen, who is also mulling a run for President in 2008. … University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato says both score about 40% in polls. 'Jim Webb is George Allen's worst nightmare: a war hero and a Reagan appointee who holds moderate positions,' says Sabato. 'Allen tries to project a Reagan aura, but Webb already has it.'"

Allen's Support Of Confederate Flag Said To Be More Extensive Than Previously Known. In the New Republic (5/15), Ryan Lizza says in his first statewide TV ad in his 1993 gubernatorial campaign, Republican Sen. George Allen "You can see the red field. You can make out the diagonal blue bar. And you can see what looks like a white star. It is the Confederate flag." Then-Allen media consultant Greg Stevens "denies that the flag was purposefully added to the scene, which lasts for ten seconds of the 60-second commercial, to appeal to pro-Confederate voters." But "as revealed by the 1993 campaign ad -- as well as the accounts of Allen associates now stepping forward -- his embrace of the Confederate flag is even more extensive than TNR previously reported. According to his colleagues, classmates, and published reports, Allen has either displayed the flag--on himself, his car, inside his home -- or expressed his enthusiastic approval of the emblem from approximately 1967 to 2000."

Mary Cheney Memoir To Be Released Tuesday. USA Today (5/8, Memmott, 2.31M) reports that "Now It's My Turn," a memoir by Mary Cheney, daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, will be published on Tuesday. Cheney, "who ran her father's 2004 vice presidential campaign," said, "My job was to do whatever I could to help my dad. It wasn't to be making policy statements of my own." But now, she is "ready to share her feelings and opinions. … She says the vice president is 'a wonderful father and a wonderful grandfather, but he's also a very private person in terms of family life.'"

Elizabeth Birch, former executive director of the Human Rights Campaign, and Hilary Rosen, a partner in Berman Rosen Global Strategies, write in the Washington Post (5/8, A19, 744K) that in her book, Mary Cheney "says publicly for the first time that she disagrees with the positions President Bush has taken with respect to gay and lesbian issues. We had presumed that was the case but are certainly glad to hear it." They add, "Until now, in the calculus of choosing between her father and the realities of her own life, Cheney has apparently opted to be a loyal daughter. … Mary is leading the Cheney family to bring new understanding to dinner-table discussions across the land. We look forward to the Cheney family embracing this teachable moment, not just on the book tour but in election halls, state legislatures and Congress."

Huffington Post Has Become Online Force. USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) reports that Ariana Huffington's web log, The Huffington Post marks its one year anniversary this week. USA notes, "It's open to debate whether the Greek-born, Cambridge-educated Huffington, who famously went from conservative to liberal in the mid-1990s, is as influential a blogger as she says. But with what she says is 2 million visitors to her website each month, Huffpost has definitely emerged as an online force."

Herbert Says Hillary Clinton Should Show More Leadership On Iraq. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M) writes that labor organizer Jonathan

Tasini "is trying to piece together a primary challenge to the re-election bid of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, primarily because of her stance on the Iraq war. Mr. Tasini is against the war and wants American troops pulled out of Iraq forthwith." Herbert adds, "It's not at all clear what Senator Clinton's position is. And for a Democratic Party that has suffered a succession of brutal defeats with excessively cautious candidates, Mrs. Clinton's indecisiveness on the war may be a hint of yet another disaster in the making." Herbert notes that in terms of overall policy, Clinton "seems to be right there with Bush, Cheney, Condi et al," and adds that as the early front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, she "has a special obligation to Democratic voters. They deserve much better leadership than they've been getting from their party on President Bush's mindless trillion-dollar tragedy in Iraq."

Krugman Says Bush Supporters Have Taken Refuge In Conspiracy Theory. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (5/8, 1.19M), "Some people say that bizarre conspiracy theories play a disturbingly large role in current American political discourse. … For the last few years, the term 'conspiracy theory' has been used primarily to belittle critics of the Bush administration -- in particular, anyone suggesting that the Bush administration used 9/11 as an excuse to fight an unrelated war in Iraq." Krugman adds Administration supporters "won't admit that they built a personality cult around a man who has proved almost pathetically unequal to the job. Nor will they admit that opponents of the Iraq war, whom they called traitors for warning that invading Iraq was a mistake, have been proved right. So they have taken refuge in the belief that a vast conspiracy of America-haters in the media is hiding the good news from the public."

Newsweek Examines AIDS At 25. Newsweek dedicates most of its issue this week to a special report on AIDS at 25. Newsweek (5/15, Jefferson) notes that the disease has killed "more Americans than every conflict from World War II through Iraq," leaving "an indelible mark on our history and culture. … The death toll to date: 25 million and counting. Through the crucible of AIDS, America was forced to face its fears and prejudices." Other stories in the Special Report include examinations of AIDS' impact on black America and the challenges it poses for the black community, a profile of Dr. Peter Pilot, director of UNAIDS, the United Nations' Joint Program on HIV/AIDS, the story of Margaret Mukacyaka, a Rwandan women who learned she had contracted the disease after being raped, as well as an op-ed from former President Bill Clinton on the global fight against the disease and another from Melinda Gates about the disease's impact on women.

Turmoil In Puerto Rico Stems From Close 2004 Election. The New York Times (5/8, Lyman, 1.19M) reports on political turmoil in Puerto Rico, noting that it has its roots in the "razor-close 2004 election. The government has been unable to pass a new budget for two years, meaning that Puerto Rico continues to operate under the old one, even though costs have risen and the size of the government and the population have continued to grow. The result was that last week, Governor Acevedo-Vilá said the federal government had run out of money, almost two months before the end of the fiscal year on June 30. He ordered a partial government shutdown, furloughing 95,000 civil servants — more than half of them teachers — and closing some 43 agencies, including the largest, the Department of Education, which tossed thousands of students out of school and ended daily school-lunch programs that many of the island's poor families depend upon to feed their children."

Pastor Says Liberals, Conservatives Must Find Common Ground. Henry G. Brinton, pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church, writes in USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) that "conservatives and liberals tend to retreat to their respective corners and gird themselves for battle." Brinton says it is instructive to see these conflicts as an "ongoing struggle between 'obligation-keepers' and 'liberation-seekers.' … One group focuses on the obligations of religious life and seeks moral clarity, while the other tends to see religion as a liberation movement and stresses God's love for the oppressed." Brinton adds that "we need to find ways to combine respect for obligation with an understanding of the need for liberation. Because conservatives and liberals tend to have stakes in both categories, our nation's political polarization might actually shrink as people work together to reconcile the competing demands of these two spiritual truths."

Cheney Maintains Criticism Of Putin. The AP (5/8, Espo) reports that Vice President Cheney "defended his criticism of Russian President Vladimir Putin as measured in tone," rejecting claims that his remarks had been "strident." Cheney emphasized the need for "open, honest, frank discussions." On NBC Nightly News (5/7, story 4, 2:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M), Vice President Cheney was shown saying, "We have no desire to alienate Russia, but you also need to speak truth to your friends." The Wall Street Journal (5/8, McKinnon, 2.11M) says that Cheney endorsed equally critical remarks by former Putin advisor Andrei Illarionov, who said, "The story of destruction of freedom in my own country, Russia, is sad." The Journal says Cheney's "mention of the economist's views represents another ratcheting up of U.S. pressure on Russia, as the two countries' relations continue to fray, particularly over what administration officials describe as Russia's use of its oil and gas resources as a political club against other nations. Mr. Cheney also has criticized Russia's internal repression."

Putin's Popularity Allows Him To Brush Off Critics In The West. Time (5/15, Gumbel) reports, "With oil prices now more than $70 per bbl., Russia is awash in cash -- and more of it is trickling down to ordinary people in ordinary places. … President Vladimir Putin is reaping the benefit of the soaring economy. His approval rating is a rock-solid 70%. That support has allowed Putin to brush off his critics in the West, where the Russian President is often painted as a throwback to autocracy." The Bush Administration "has grown uneasy about Russian assertiveness beyond its borders," and "issued an unusually harsh indictment last week when Vice President Dick Cheney said Russia has 'unfairly and improperly restricted the rights of her people' and warned Moscow against trying to meddle in the affairs of neighboring countries."

Russian Energy Minister Strikes Back At Cheney. The Financial Times (5/8, Buckley) reports Russian Energy Minister Viktor Khristenko "has hit back at accusations by" Vice President Cheney "of [Russia] using its energy resources as 'tools of intimidation and blackmail.'" Khristenko's op-ed in today's Financial Times (5/8) says Russia is "deeply puzzled by recent commentary in the west that distorts Russian energy policies."

McCain Backs Cheney's Remarks. On CBS' Face the Nation (5/7, Schieffer) Sen. John McCain said, "I was very pleased with [Cheney's] comments. … There has been a steady retrogression and a sort of an effort to restore the old Soviet empire, intimidation -- Russian Empire. There's intimidation of its neighbors, using the oil card, throwing people in jail, centralization of power in the Kremlin."

Cheney's Remarks In Russia Were "Carefully Vetted." The New York Daily News (5/8, DeFrank, 729K) reports that as a "quintessential realist" Vice President Dick Cheney "understands full well that his negative public image -- his approval numbers are far worse than Bush's -- has contributed to his boss' decline." Cheney "remains the vice leader of the free world, and his muscular message at a regional conference in Lithuania resonated in many newly independent democracies struggling to reverse decades of Soviet domination." The News adds, "Cheney's remarks overseas had been carefully vetted - he knew precisely what he was saying." The Daly News adds, "The furor over Cheney's prose cleverly served another calculated purpose - deflecting media attention away from his lovefest with [Kazakhstan President Nursultan] Nazarbayev. The dictatorial leader sits on enormous oil reserves coveted by the U.S., but he's hardly a model of democratic reform."

Former Soviet Republics Strive To Conserve Energy. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, Champion, 2.11M) reports, "Russia's price shock … is also having an unexpected benefit: It's starting to force fundamental change on some of the most energy-wasteful economies in the world, those of former Soviet republics." Ukraine, Georgia, and Armenia are all investigating means of conserving energy, since Gazprom's pricing strategy has given them a sense of "great urgency."

Cheney Endorses NATO Hopes Of Three Nations. The AP (5/8, Espo) reports that Vice President Cheney "endorsed the NATO membership aspirations of Croatia, Albania and Macedonia." He praised the countries for their ability to "help rejuvenate [the EU and NATO] and rededicate ourselves to the basic and fundamental values of freedom and democracy." However, he "made no mention of any of the controversies on the path toward full membership by later this decade." The New York Times (5/8, Wood, 1.19M) reports that by visiting Dubrovnik, Cheney doled out a "reward for Croatia," which he praised for "substantial progress" such as delivering war crime suspect Gen. Ante Gotovina to an international tribunal. Croatia is now the "favorite" among ex-Yugoslav states "to be accepted into the [EU] and NATO," but it still "has resisted American pressure to sign an agreement that would shield American soldiers from prosecution at the International Criminal Court" and has lost US military aid as a result.

Merkel Invites Bush To Visit Former East Germany. The AP (5/8) reports, "Chancellor Angela Merkel has invited [President Bush] to see the old East Germany where she grew up." Speaking to the German newspaper Bild, Bush said, ""We're all products of how we are raised and, in many ways, where we were raised." He stated that Merkel would plan the itinerary for his July visit.

Iran Threatens To Withdraw From Nuclear Pact. With the UN Security Council expected to debate a draft resolution on Iran this week, the Washington Post/AP (5/8, A13, Dareini) reports, "Iran's parliament on Sunday threatened to pass legislation that would force the government to withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. ... In a letter to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan read on state-run radio, Iranian lawmakers said they would have 'no option' but to ask the government to withdraw from the treaty if the UN chief and the Security Council 'fail in their crucial responsibility to resolve differences peacefully.'" The USA Today (5/8, 2.31M) reports that US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton said the Iranians were "desperate" to conceal the military intent of their nuclear program.

US Pushing "De Facto Financial Sanctions." The Financial Times (5/8, Alden, Daniel) reports, "The US is attempting to persuade European governments, banks and companies to isolate the Iranian government by engaging in de facto financial sanctions, according to US government officials and advisers. The tactics are modeled on those used for the first time last year against North Korea." According to the Times, "John Snow, the US Treasury secretary, last week hinted strongly at the new effort against Iran, saying: 'When the US is confronted with a threat that is unreceptive to diplomatic outreach and when military action is not an option, [financial] tools are often the best authorities available to exert pressure and to wield a tangible impact.'" The Times goes on to quote a senior US official as saying, "I think these financial institutions are very responsible for the most part, and they're trying to figure out what kind of corporate citizens they want to be. They're starting to look at whether they really want to do business with the government of Iran."

Bush Says He's Taking Ahmadinejad's Threats "Very Seriously." The AP (5/8) reports President Bush "says he's paying close attention to threats made against Israel by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. 'I think that it's very important for us to take his words very seriously. When people speak, it is important that we listen carefully to what they say and take them seriously.'"

Former Clinton Advisor Berger Says "Talk to Tehran." In a Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) op-ed column headlined "Talk To Tehran," former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger writes that "another course is possible, one that is more likely to prevent a military confrontation or, if it nonetheless becomes unavoidable, less likely to produce such dangerous aftershocks. The US should sit down with those who should share a sense of danger -- including, first and foremost, the European Union, Russia and China -- and explain that we are prepared for a bold diplomatic move toward Tehran if our allies are ready in exchange to impose tough sanctions on Iran should it reject a reasonable offer." Although "the Bush administration is quick to acknowledge that military confrontation is neither its only option, nor its first one...its ideological inflexibility may be the surest way of getting us there and getting us there in the worst possible posture: without strong international support and facing a united Iranian population. The president has stated that all options are on the table and that is as it should be. But all options include the diplomatic one. The least we ought to do is to try it robustly."

Israeli Police Evict Jewish Settlers In Hebron. In an incident seen as a test for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's newly minted government, the New York Times (5/8, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "The Israeli police on Sunday evicted about 40 Jewish settlers from a Palestinian house in the volatile West Bank town of Hebron. A large police contingent cut through a barricaded door and persuaded some settlers to leave voluntarily, but others were dragged out." The AP (5/8, Plushnick-Masti) adds, "Olmert waited just minutes after the Hebron operation ended before telling his Cabinet that he would also remove unauthorized West Bank outposts" and quotes Olmert saying, "In the next few years, we will change Israel's character to ensure it will be a state with a solid Jewish majority living in defensible borders that can provide security to the residents of Israel." The Washington Times/AP (5/8, Plushnick-Masti) reports that Olmert has angered both settlers and Palestinians by (i) planning "to pull out from most of the West Bank and draw Israel's borders by 2010" and (ii) by vowing to "proceed even without a peace deal."

Jerusalem Barrier Has Unintended Consequences. The Washington Times (5/8, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "An unanticipated consequence of Israel's West Bank security barrier has been an influx of Israeli Arabs into Jewish neighborhoods in East Jerusalem who hope to remain on the Israeli side of the barrier." Palestinians fear "that they may be stripped of residency rights that give them access to Israeli government social services" and therefore "are willing to pay higher prices for small dwellings on the Israeli side of the barrier."

Public Health Declines In Cash-Strapped Gaza. The New York Times (5/8, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "Gaza's once impressive public health system is running down fast under the dual pressure of aid cutoffs and the closing of the Karni crossing point with Israel." Drugs and treatments are in short supply. A report by Physicians for Human Rights/Israel predicts, ""Lack of funding for this system will lead to the deaths of thousands of people in the short term and extensive morbidity in the long term."

Darfur Refugees See Little Change From Peace Pact. The New York Times (5/8, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports that the Darfur peace treaty has brought little tangible benefit so far. UN official Jan Egeland described "a 'scorched earth onslaught' that has driven 250,000 people from their homes in just the past three months, deepening despair even as hopes for peace began to rise." The Times writes that the treaty is threatened by "the failure of negotiators to persuade two [smaller] rebel factions to sign it." However, the Christian Science Monitor (5/8, Houreld, Soares, 61K) reports more optimistically, "Observers say that the most important result of the deal is that it could pave the way for a UN peacekeeping force to enter Sudan. In the past few days different spokesmen for the Sudanese government have confirmed that the government would now at least consider allowing UN peacekeeping troops on the ground, something Khartoum had flatly rejected before Friday's deal." The Monitor adds, "Crucially, this pact seeks to contain and disarm janjaweed fighters before the rebels are asked to withdraw from their positions."

Egeland Is Allowed To Visit Darfur. USA Today (5/8, Slavin, 2.31M) reports, "Sudan allowed a top United Nations relief official to visit the war-torn Darfur region Sunday, the first tangible result of a peace agreement reached Friday with the largest Darfur rebel group." Jan Egeland had "previously been blocked" by Sudan from visiting. US Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said expecting a quick end to the bloodshed would be "unrealistic" but expressed hope that the pact would be "an important step" toward peace.

Blair Faces Growing Labour Party Revolt. After reshuffling his cabinet late last week, the Washington Post (5/8, A11, Sullivan, Jordan, 744K) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair, battered over his Iraq policy and a series of scandals in his cabinet, is facing a growing revolt within his Labour Party as scores of Labour members of Parliament demand that he set a date to step aside." The future of "the Bush administration's closest European ally suddenly appears more shaky and uncertain. Blair, who was already suffering low approval ratings and rebellion among some factions of his party after nine years in office, is facing sharp, new attacks." The AP (5/8, Gardiner) says Labor lawmakers "are circulating a draft of a letter calling on the prime minister to set a date for his departure, a legislator told The Associated Press Sunday." The letter "addressed to Labour's executive committee was widely reported in the British media on Sunday, two days after Blair's major overhaul of his government."

USA Today (5/8, Stinson, Soriano, 2.31M) notes Blair "reshuffled his government Friday after Labor lost 319 seats on local governing boards, mostly to Conservative Party candidates, in Thursday's local elections." It was "the Labor Party's worst election defeat since it rose to national power under Blair in 1997."

AFP (5/8) reports Blair's cabinet reshuffle "failed to silence calls for him to quit. Urging renewal, finance minister Gordon Brown -- widely expected to be his successor -- said a 'stable and orderly transition' of power was required, and put the onus on Blair to name the day for his departure." Meanwhile, according to the Financial Times (5/8, Eaglesham), "The defiant prime minister will on Monday use a press conference and a speech to Labour MPs to stress the risks of not driving through reform. His emissaries were sent out to 'spell out, in stark terms, the risks [of a rebellion] before anything crystallizes that danger', a senior Labour official told the Financial Times, adding that 'he is not going to have a timetable for his leaving dictated to him.'" According to the Times, "Tensions within the party over the succession risked escalating out of control yesterday. Relations between the prime minister and the chancellor appeared to have deteriorated to the point where a smooth handover will be extremely hard to engineer."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M) editorializes, "After the worst electoral loss of his career, Tony Blair has carried out the bloodiest purge ever of his cabinet. A last gasp from the British leader, or a big step toward a political rebirth?" Friday's reshuffle "can't substitute for a governing vision or the will to implement it. Mr. Blair and New Labour have been short on both counts of late and paid for it with a pasting in Thursday's local council elections."

Albright Says US Must Keep Pushing Mideast Democracy. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (5/8, A19, 744K), former Secretary Albright writes, "While "it is customary for politicians and commentators to distance themselves from those responsible for foreign policy setbacks...my fear is that, in the process, a new conventional wisdom will emerge that promoting democracy in the Middle East is a mistake. It is not." Although "we should remember that the alternative to support for democracy is complicity in backing governments that lack the blessing of their own people...at the same time, we should keep a rein on our expectations. [President] Bush has said that America 'has a calling from beyond the stars' to proclaim liberty throughout the world." Secretary Rice "argues that the democratic transformation of the Middle East is the only way to guarantee that men do not fly airplanes into buildings. Such rhetoric is overblown. Just because the denial of political freedom is bad, that doesn't mean that the exercise of freedom will always be to our liking. … A successful foreign policy must begin with the world as it is but also work for what we would like it to be. ... If all America stands for is stability, no one will follow us for the simple reason that we aren't going anywhere."

Trial Of Egyptian Dissident Ayman Nour Decried. In the Wall Street Journal (5/8, 2.11M), American Enterprise Institute fellow Joshua Muravchik writes, "None of the setbacks [to democracy in the Mideast] echoes more loudly than President Hosni Mubarak's decision to take the one truly independent candidate who had the temerity to run against him and clap him in jail." Muravchik writes that Mubarak has done his utmost to silence Nour and Nour's wife with court proceedings; however, "a majority of Egypt's judges are in rebellion against the regime, demanding full judicial independence. Although less widely noted outside the country, this may prove to be a more important landmark on the road to democracy than last year's elections." Muravchik concludes that official Egyptian claims that US pressure is "inappropriate and pointless" are belied by the judiciary's "rebellion" and by the sense of insecurity that led to Nour's arrest.

Congress Urged To Ratify Nuclear Deal With India. In the Washington Times (5/8, 90K), security expert Stanley Weiss says that, even though the US-Indian nuclear deal may be imperfect, Washington should ratify it. He warns that rejection could cause Prime Minister Manmohan Singth to "suffer a fatal political blow for aligning India so closely with Washington" and could give "a fresh dose of oxygen [to] the rapidly dying Moscow-New Delhi-Beijing triangle." Weiss concludes, "You go to the altar with the dowry you have, not the dowry you might want. Trying to renegotiate this nuclear deal could poison the U.S.-Indian relationship for years to come."

China Ordains Two Bishops Without Vatican Approval. Time (5/15, Elegant) reports on the "latest episode in the stormy relationship" between the Chinese government and the Catholic church. Last week, the state-controlled Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association "ordained two new bishops without the Vatican's permission. Considering that Rome has claimed absolute authority over clerical appointments for almost two millenniums, its reaction to the news was predictably swift." Time adds, "To some, China's decision to ordain the two bishops was a deliberate bid to reassert its authority over the country's Catholics. … The question is whether Beijing's moves have wrecked the possibility of détente with Rome."

OPERATOR

Quadrennial Meeting, Federal Judges Association (FJA) on Mon 5/8/2006 - EVENT DETAILS

1. Please provide a detailed program/sequence of events from the time the Attorney General is scheduled to arrive at the event until he departs. If the AG will be in more than one room, please note the room name or number for each room he will be in.

Location of the event will be the Ritz-Carlton Hotel at Pentagon City.

Time of arrival should be 1:50 pm.

General Gonzales and his party will be met at the door by Judge Edward Prado.

General Gonzales will be escorted immediately to the 2d floor ballroom of the Ritz-Carlton Hotel. A conference/information desk is on the second floor, outside the ballroom.

At 2:00 pm General Gonzales and his party will be escorted by Judge Prado into the ballroom. General Gonzales will be introduced with brief introduction relying upon the Standard Introduction by Judge Alan Johnson.

Between 2:00 pm and 2:15 pm General Gonzales will speak from a rostrum provided by the hotel. General Gonzales will be thanked at the conclusion of his presentation and a memento of his appearance presented by FJA President Irene Keeley.

At 2:20 pm General Gonzales will be escorted to the entrance of the hotel for his departure. (We were made aware that the General has an earlier luncheon engagement, but should his schedule accommodate an earlier arrival, the FJA would be honored to host the General and his party at the luncheon beginning at 12:45 pm at the same location. Sen. Trent Lott will be the speaker, followed by General Gonzales)

2. If you are requesting a photo op for a small group of individuals prior to the AG's participation in the event (that request would need to be approved by the Attorney General's office in advance) please provide a list of the names of individuals for whom you are requesting a photo.

A photo op is not anticipated, although the editor of the FJA publication will undoubtably take photographs of the proceedings, including the appearance of General Gonzales. In the past photographs, have been taken by Judge Sarah Evans Barker of the Southern District of Indiana. No special time or location for a photo op is planned.

3. Please send us an updated list of other Speakers/Program Participants.

An up to date agenda of conference events is attached.

4. Please send us an updated list of government officials, other dignitaries invited or expected to be in attendance.

In addition to the speakers listed on the agenda, FJA has invited approximately 20 members of Congress (Judiciary and Appropriation Committees) or their selected staff members to attend the luncheon on May 8. Most have reported that they will be returning to Washington that day, will be unavailable, and have turned the matter over to their staff person. Sen. Thad Cochran from Mississippi is planning to attend.

5. We understand that the portion of the event at which the Attorney General is speaking will be open to the press/media. Is this correct?

The last Quadrennial Conference of the FJA drew some coverage by Cspan. Cspan is aware of this conference. We have requested information from Cspan as to their intention to attend, but we have not received a reply.

6. Who will introduce the Attorney General before he speaks? Please include full name and title and send brief biographical information.

Alan B. Johnson, a District Judge from the District of Wyoming, will briefly introduce General Gonzales. Judge Johnson is stationed at Cheyenne. He has served the District of Wyoming for 20 years, following his nomination by President Reagan. He is the Vice President of the FJA for Programs. He is married to [redacted] and has two grown daughters. He served as an Air Force Officer on active duty and as a reserve officer. In addition he served as a trial judge in the State of Wyoming for 11 years.

7. Who will be the MC for the event (if different from the individual who introduces the AG)?

FJA President Irene Keeley will preside over the conference. She is a District Judge in the District of West Virginia.

8. Will there be a podium from which the Attorney General can deliver remarks?

A podium will be provided for General Gonzales.

9. We understand that the Attorney General is expected to speak for approximately 10-15 minutes without any Q&A. Is this correct?

We hope that the General will speak for 15 minutes. No question and answer period is scheduled. The Conference will take a 15 minute break immediately following General Gonzales? presentation and will resume with a panel discussion on topics related to judicial independence.

10. The Attorney General's FBI Security Detail will come to survey the venue/room(s) sometime on the day of the event (or, in some cases, the day before). Please provide an on-site contact person for the security detail, and include all contact phone numbers for that person.

Chris Lighthall will be available on and after May 5, 2006 at the Ritz-Carlton. She is the conference arranger for the FJA, having retired from a career with the Circuit Executive?s office for the 10th Circuit. Ms. Lighthall?s contact number is: You may also wish the numbers for Judge Wiley Daniel which are:

11. Will there be a Speaker's Hold room? If so, what is the name or room number of the Speaker's Hold room?

No speaker?s hold room will be used. Security from the U.S. Marshal will be present. The General should expect to be escorted promptly into the Main Ballroom.

12. Where will the Attorney General be seated immediately before he speaks? With whom will he be seated?

Should the General need to be seated before speaking, he will be at the head table with President Keeley.

13. As an fyi...our Chief of Staff, Kyle Sampson and the AG's personal asst. Grant Nichols will be accompanying the Attorney General to the event.

The number for the on site contact persons and the registration desk are [redacted] and [redacted]. The number(s) are:

14. Please provide an on-site/day of event contact person's name, title, and telephone contact numbers, including cell phone and pager numbers.
15. If there is an on-site office or registration desk for the event, please provide the phone number for that desk.
16. Please include any additional information that may be helpful to the Attorney General as he prepares for this event.

I hope that this information is helpful. The FJA greatly appreciates General Gonzales? participation in the Quadrennial Conference and we look forward to his presentation.

In addition, Chris gave me these numbers:

Telephone Number: Office: [redacted]; Cell: [redacted]; Home: [redacted]

Email Address: [redacted]

As of today (March 22, 2006) there is no Corporate Sponsor for this event.

1. The audience is comprised of survivors of law enforcement officers killed in the line of duty, law enforcement professionals and law enforcement supporters.

2. We expect approximately 18,000 people to attend the event.

3. Program participants:
   Craig Floyd, NLEOMF Chairman
   Shirley Gibson, National President of the Concerns of Police Survivors
   The Honorable Mario Biaggi (retired US House of Representatives) NLEOMF Founder Chaplain (To Be Determined)
   Police Officer Laura Zambron, Fairfax County (VA) Police Department (singer)
   Police Officer Elsie Mendoza-Thongvichith, Jersey City (NJ) Police Department (singer)
   Daniel Clark, Massachusetts State Police (ret), singer.
   Marie Connelly Conroy '89 Survivor (Interpreter for the Hearing Impaired)

4. We have not received our RSVP's as of this date. In the past those in attendance include a good number of Police Chiefs, as well as some federal agency directors, although they do not participate in the event. Members of the NLEOMF Board of Directors will be onsite, as well as representatives from law enforcement agencies from across the country. A list of the Board of Directors is attached.

5. Yes, there will be press on site. Their activities and credentialing are handled by Bruce Mendelsohn, NLEOMF Communications Director [redacted] (cell).

6. We are requesting that the Attorney General deliver the keynote speech at the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial's 18th Annual Candlelight Vigil. The Attorney General will be introduced by Craig Floyd, NLEOMF Chairman and MC for the event. Mr. Floyd's bio is attached.

7. The remarks should be approximately 10 minutes in length. There is a podium from which the Attorney General will speak

8. The theme/purpose of the event is to honor the service and sacrifice of America's law enforcement professionals who have given their lives in the line of duty. The names of 467 fallen officers will be added to the Memorial this year and dedicated that evening. Attached is a listing of the 155 officers were killed in 2005.

9. Business attire is most appropriate.

10. The Attorney General is welcomed to bring guests.

11. This is not a fundraising event.

12. No tickets are sold for this event.

13. We would like to confirm as soon as possible that the Attorney General is available, so that we might print our programs.

14. We are requesting that the Attorney General arrive on F Street, between 4th & 5th Streets, no later than 7:50 pm where he will be met by Mrs. Lyons-Wynne and Craig Floyd. Since it is an outdoor event, there is no holding "room" rather we will have a penned in area in which the AG will be staged. This area is in the back of the stage area on F Street, between 4th & 5th Streets. While in the penned area, the Attorney General might be requested to have his photo taken with members of our board of directors.

15. The NLEOMF Board of Directors, host a reception prior to the Candlelight Vigil. The reception is held from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m. at the Casa Italiana located at 595 Third Street, NW, at the intersection of F & Third Streets. The Attorney General and his guests are welcomed to attend.

16. The contact for the security detail is Lynn Lyons-Wynne ([redacted]; [redacted]) or Margaret Roberts ([redacted]; [redacted]). The United States Park Police will sweep the site prior to the arrival of the Attorney General.

17. Historically, the person delivering the keynote address is introduced, along with the NLEOMF Chairman, after the dais has been seated. The Attorney General & the Chairman of the NLEOMF will be announced and seated just prior to the beginning of the ceremony.

19. Attached is a copy of the proposed "Minute by Minute" for the event. Contact person is:

    Lynn Lyons-Wynne
    Office: [redacted]
    Cell: [redacted]
    Home: [redacted]

1. Detailed sequence of events. Minute by Minute is attached.

2. There are approximately 60 people who will be seated on the dais with the Attorney General; this list is attached. When the Attorney General arrives, he will be escorted into a penned-in area behind the stage, along with these individuals. In the past some members of our Board of Directors (list attached) have requested to have their photo taken with the Attorney General at this time.

3. Attached is an updated Program of the Evening.

Attorney General Scheduling Request

TO: Andrew Beach
Assistant to the Attorney General for Scheduling

FAX: 7-2825

THROUGH: Office of the Deputy Attorney General (Mark Grider)

FROM: McGregor Scott, U.S. Attorney, Eastern District of CA, Sacramento

REQUEST: National Methamphetamine & Chemicals Initiative (NMCI) Strategy Conference

PURPOSE: This is an ONDCP/HIDTA Program national methamphetmine initiative. Yearly, the NMCI hosts meetings of federal, state, and local representatives from law enforcement, intelligence, prosecution, and agency chemist communities from throughout the United States. The purpose is for participants to report on current trends and create strategy in regards to methamphetamine issues, especially domestic and foreign illicit manufacturing affecting the United States. NMCI meetings are also attended by DEA Agents stationed in Mexico and Canada as well as Canadian law enforcement.

For the first time, as a result of the flood of methamphetamine coming from Mexico, the DEA Mexico City Country office has received permission from NMCI members to invite Mexican government counterparts. The purpose is to create a better mutual understanding of the problem and promote a bi-national anti-methamphetamine strategy and "team effort" with Mexico.

WHAT IS THE REQUESTED ROLE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL:

It is requested that the Attorney General invite the Mexican Attorney General to attend the two day NMCI conference. Actual participation would be on the second day.

The first day of the conference (5/17) will address domestic issues and the second day (5/18) will focus in on issues related to effects of Mexican methamphetamine drug trafficking organizations operating in the United States and Mexico.

At the close of the first day, from 6pm to 9pm, a networking reception will be held for all attendees at the hotel site. Both AGs are invited to attend if only for a short time following their arrival in Dallas. A private VIP board room will be available all day throughout the conference should it be needed for any private meetings.

As part of the opening of the second day of the conference, both AGs are requested to address attendees who are dealing with methamphetamine law enforcement and related issues as part of their everyday responsibilities. The AG is requested to speak first as to the U.S. situation and importance of addressing the problem and in particular as to the importance of a bi-national approach (approx. 20 to 30 minutes). The Mexican AG can then follow and give a general overview of Mexican government efforts, accomplishments, and goals as related to methamphetamine production and chemical precursor controls (approx. 20 to 30 minutes).

If the Mexican AG cannot attend, it is very important to the success of the conference that the U.S. AG continues with his participation. Mexican law enforcement counterparts will be in attendance.

BACKGROUND: This is the NMCI's twelfth methamphetamine strategy conference since its inception in 1999. It has been successful in promoting communication, cooperation, and coordination of anti-methamphetamine efforts on a national and international basis (initially Canada and now Mexico).

DATE & TIME: Wednesday, May 17 & Thursday, May 18, 2006 - 8:30 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.
Reception: May 17 - 6 p.m. to 9 p.m.

LOCATION: Adams Mark Hotel - Dallas
400 North Olive Street
Dallas, Texas 75201

DURATION: AG participation at Reception (5/17) and remarks at opening of 2nd day (5/18)

PRESS COVERAGE: Press can be allowed into conference to cover AG and Mexican AG remarks, if desired.
Press conference room will be available following remarks, if desired.

POSSIBLE PARTICIPANTS AND APPROXIMATE NUMBER:
Federal, State and Locals from all U.S. (as stated above). Majority are State & Locals.
275 - 300 attendees
Possible attendance by Karen Tandy, DEA Administrator (has attended in the past)
Attendance by U.S. Attorneys, DEA & ICE SACS

REMARKS REQUIRED: As stated above.

RECOMMENDED BY: McGregor Scott, United States Attorney, Eastern District of CA, Sacramento

Please include any additional information that may be helpful to Mr. Gonzales as he considers this invitation.

Mr. Gonzales is a Houstonian and is familiar with The Houston Forum 's reputation as one of the nation's premier speaking platforms. With his appearance, through our educational outreach efforts, we would include in the audience (underwritten by a grant from Houston Endowment), students from the High School for Criminal Justice, as well as university-level students enrolled in pre-law and students in the law colleges. In addition, we would reach out to other Houston community groups including the Houston Hispanic Chamber of Commerce and the Houston Bar Association, to share with them the opportunity to hear Attorney General Gonzales.

The Houston Forum has many ties to the Administration, and on February 1, 2006, will have the honor to present to President and Mrs. George H.W. Bush "The Woodson Medal" for outstanding community leadership. The Woodson Medal is named for Benjamin N. Woodson, the founding chairman of The Houston Forum.

The motto of The Houston Forum is taken from the words of General Sam Houston, the city's namesake: "…in the diversity of opinion Democracy may rest securely."

Our speakers are leaders and newsmakers from all walks of life with a diverse mix of experiences and viewpoints. Previous speakers exemplify our mission: Condoleezza Rice, The Dalai Lama, Yitzhak Rabin, General Colin L. Powell, Ted Turner, General Tommy R. Franks, President Jose Maria Aznar, and Roberto Goizueta.

Recent speakers (within the past twelve months) include: Bob Schieffer, Jack Welch, David McCullough, James A. Baker, III, General John Abizaid, and Dr. Mae Jemison.

On the current schedule are Kinky Friedman, General Leon LaPorte, Dr. Doris Kearns Goodwin, Kurt Eichenwald, Richard W. Fisher (present of the Federal Reserve Bank, Dallas), and Admiral Richard Carmona, U.S. Surgeon General.

At 3 a.m on Sunday, May 22, 2005, Milagro Cunningham of Lake Worth, Florida, dialed 911 and stated to the dispatcher that five unknown white men had entered an apartment belonging to Lisa Taylor and snatched Lachele Nance, Taylor's 8-year-old god-daughter, while she was sleeping. Cunningham, a 17-year-old high school dropout living at the Taylor residence, related that he had run after the suspects, caught up with them as they tried to enter a brown station wagon, and struggled with the men. Finally, according to Cunningham, the men had escaped and Cunningham returned to the residence to report the incident.

Upon receiving the call, the dispatcher summoned patrol officers to the location and a manhunt for the five suspects ensued. Before sunrise, a command post was set up one block away from the apartment where Nance was last seen. Officers were called to the scene and at 4:45 a.m., a statewide AMBER Alert was issued. Intent on finding Nance, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement's Child Abduction Response Team helped coordinate efforts, and at 8:30 a.m., the Palm Beach, Florida Sheriff's Office positioned a helicopter and marine unit. Less than an hour later, bloodhounds canvassed the scene.

Eager to help with the search, Sergeant Michael Hall of the Lake Worth, Florida Police Department arrived at the scene on his day off, and began assisting task force officers.

Armed with no new leads and having found holes in Cunningham's story, officers zeroed in on him, and a search grid was established around the perimeter of the apartment complex. Assigned to examine a large secluded landfill behind the command post, Sgt. Hall meticulously sifted through rubbish around the area. To his horror, after having opened a recycling bin at 10:28 a.m., Sgt. Hall saw a hand and foot emerging from under a pile of concrete blocks. Certain that Nance had been murdered, Sgt. Hall radioed into the station and summoned a superior.

Although she had been stuffed head first inside a large bright yellow recycling bin with rocks and crushed concrete covering her, Nance suddenly and miraculously moved her finger. Reacting to what he had just seen, Sgt. Hall and others quickly and carefully unearthed Nance. Following her recovery, Nance stated to police that Cunningham had choked her, thrown her into the dumpster, and tried to kill her. Nance was transported to a nearby medical facility for examination.

Cunningham was arrested and taken into custody. Having confessed to his involvement in the incident, Cunningham faces charges of attempted murder, sexual battery and false imprisonment. He is currently awaiting trial.

Nance was rescued in the nick of time and has since been referred to as the "Miracle Child of Lake Worth." It is unlikely that she could have survived much longer. Aside from the brutal assault she experienced and its psychological impact, Nance emerged from the seven-hour ordeal largely unscathed.

Sgt. Hall's commitment to find the missing child, along with his painstaking attention to detail, resulted in the recovery of a courageous little girl. Because of his efforts Sgt. Hall has been nominated to receive the 2006 National Missing Children's Award.

U.S. Officials Respond to Torture Queries

By Sam Cage

May 8, 2006

GENEVA — U.S. officials responded Monday to a U.N. panel's questions on its compliance with international human rights law, saying that all U.S. government employees are prohibited from engaging in torture.

The U.S. delegation, in its first appearance before the U.N. Committee Against Torture in six years, was addressing a series of issues ranging from Washington's interpretation of the absolute ban on torture to its interrogation methods in prisons such as Abu Ghraib, Iraq, and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"U.S. officials from all government agencies are prohibited from engaging in torture at all times and in all places," said State Department legal adviser John B. Bellinger III, heading the U.S. delegation. "This is the case even in situations where the law of armed conflict applies."

In the first session of the review last week, members of the U.N. Committee Against Torture told the United States that it has to set a better example in combating torture and cannot hide behind intelligence activities in refusing to discuss violations of the global ban on prisoner abuse in the war on terror.

The delegation told the U.N. watchdog for a 22-year-old treaty forbidding prisoner abuse that mistakes had occurred in the U.S. treatment of detainees in the war against terror, and that 29 detainees in U.S. facilities in Iraq and Afghanistan had died of what appeared to be abuse or other violations of U.S. law.

Andreas Mavrommatis, who chaired the session, said the U.S. investigations would be more convincing if they were conducted by an independent judge or lawyer rather than by staff of the Defense Department.

Bellinger said the 25-member delegation _ including officials from the Defense, Justice and Homeland Security departments _ was committed to answering the committee's questions, but would be unable to discuss "alleged intelligence activities."

Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch said the delegation had not fully answered all of the committee's questions and hopefully would give more detailed replies later Monday. But she said the presence of such a large delegation indicated that the United States was taking the hearing seriously.

"I think that what's important is that they're here," Daskal told The Associated Press. "I do think that they're taking this process very seriously."

But Jamil Dakwar, staff attorney of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the U.S. government needed to go further and take "vigorous and sincere measures" that will "end secret imprisonment and detainee abuse and hold officials accountable."

The ACLU presented the committee with a book with more than 200 pages of U.S. documents that "clearly prove that the abuse of detainees was systemic and widespread," Dakwar said.

The United States is taking its turn as one of the 141 signatories to the Convention Against Torture in submitting to a periodic review by the 10 independent members of the committee.

Intelligence matters such as alleged secret CIA prisons and flights transferring suspects for possible torture in other countries were key items on a list of questions submitted to the U.S. government by the committee in advance.

Criticism by the U.N. panel brings no penalties beyond international scrutiny, but Daskal said it could influence U.S. public opinion and hence the government. The committee is expected to issue conclusions at the end of its session on May 19.

Chinese Muslims sent from Guantanamo to Albania

By Charlie Savage

May 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The US military said yesterday that it had transferred five Chinese Muslims from its Guantanamo Bay prison to Albania, apparently ending a long legal fight over their fate on the eve of arguments before a federal appeals court.

The five men, who all belong to an ethnic group known as "Uighurs," had been imprisoned at the base for more than four years. More than a year ago, a military tribunal had determined that none of them had been enemies of the United States after all, and cleared them for release.

However, the US could not send them back to their homeland because the Chinese government has a history of persecuting Uighurs, who have been seeking greater autonomy from the central government. No other country would take them in, either, and they remained stuck in the American prison.

Last December, a federal district judge ruled that it was illegal for the Bush administration to continue to incarcerate the men because it had no basis for holding them.

But the judge ruled that he did not have the power to order the government to release them, saying he could not ask the administration to bring them into the United States for national security reasons. Meanwhile, the State Department kept looking for a third country willing to take them.

Sabin Willett, a Boston-based attorney who represents two of the Uighurs, said the Justice Department abruptly informed him late yesterday that the search was over, and that his clients were no longer at Guantanamo.

Willett had been preparing to argue his clients' case before a federal appeals court on Monday morning. Upon learning the news, he suddenly began making plans to fly to Albania.

"An hour ago I was told by the government that the men have been sent to Albania and are there," Willett said yesterday evening in a telephone interview. "I have not been able to reach them or anybody who could confirm this in Albania. I hope to [reach them] tomorrow morning, and I'll get on a plane tomorrow night and be there on Sunday."

Albania has a majority-Muslim population. It is in southeastern Europe -- thousands of miles from the Uighurs' native China -- but Willett said he was cautiously optimistic that the five men would be comfortable there.

Willett said he was told by the US government that his clients were being held at the "national accomodations center for asylum seekers" in Tirana, the Albanian capital. The center is operated by the Albanian interior ministry in conjunction with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, he said.

Beyond that, he knew nothing more.

"It's all very unclear," Willett said. "They didn't give us any warning. Until we can be sure that the men are safe, I'm worried, but I'm going to be cautiously optimistic about this."

For its part, the Bush administration signaled that it was relieved to have at least found a home for the Uighurs and resolved a case which has generated negative publicity for Guantanamo Bay prison, since the military itself acknowledged that it had held people for nearly five years who were not enemies of the United States.

"The United States has done the utmost to ensure that the Uighurs will be treated humanely upon release," a Pentagon statement said. "Our key objective has been to resettle the Uighurs in an environment that will permit them to rebuild their lives. Albania will provide this opportunity."

Google 'profits from child porn', lawsuit claims

By Anne Broache

Monday 8 May 2006

Google has made child pornography an "obscenely profitable and integral part" of its business and must be stopped, a new lawsuit claims.

Jeffrey Toback, a Democratic representative in New York's Nassau County Legislature, charged in a complaint filed on Thursday that Google has been taking in billions of dollars by allowing child pornography and "other obscene content" operators to advertise their sites through sponsored links, which are tailored to a user's search terms and automatically accompany search results. The suit was filed in the New York Supreme Court.

Among other allegations, the complaint evoked the politically volatile topic of the search engine's dealings in China.

The complaint states: "[The] defendant is willing to accede to the demands of the Chinese autocrats to block the search term 'democracy' but when it comes to the protection and well-being of our nation's innocent children, [the] defendant refuses to spend a dime's worth of resources to block child pornography from reaching children."

A Google representative said on Friday that the company prohibits child pornography in its products and removes all such content whenever it finds or is made aware of it. A spokesman said in an email: "We also report it to the appropriate law enforcement officials and fully co-operate with the law enforcement community to combat child pornography."

The spokesman pointed to the content policy for Google's AdWords sponsored links service, which broadly prohibits "promotion of child pornography or other non-consensual material". He also noted Google offers a filtering tool called SafeSearch that aims to block offensive content in search results. The availability of such tools could mean the suit may not go far. Section 230 of the federal Communications Decency Act protects providers and users of an "interactive computer service" from liability if it can be shown they took good-faith measures to restrict access to obscene material. It also provides that "no provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider".

The suit, which claims Google acted negligently and intentionally inflicted emotional distress on the public, requests monetary damages to be determined at trial. It also accuses Google of violating federal statutes relating to child pornography and calls for the court to order that Google cease "advertising, promoting, or distributing" child pornography through its site or otherwise providing any links to such content.

The suit was filed by Meiselman, Denlea, Packman, Carton & Eberz. Other recent lawsuits filed by the firm have sought at least $10m for alleged sex discrimination against casino cocktail waitresses, and $600m from the maker of an ephedra-based dietary supplement claimed to cause the death of a Baltimore Orioles pitcher.

Toback, the politician backing the action, describes himself in his biography on Nassau County's website as a "quality of life guy" who has focused on legislation promoting open space and recreational areas. He has also co-sponsored a law designed to protect teenagers from tanning beds and has planned this year to pursue a ban of toy guns in the area.

The legal action against Google comes as Congress and the Bush administration have been attempting to step up their crackdown on online sexual exploitation of children. The Justice Department has proposed a mandatory labelling system for sites bearing sexually explicit content and higher penalties for ISPs that don't report child pornography on their networks to the appropriate authorities.

In These Times

Undercover Cover-Up

May 8, 2006

Thomas Nelson knew someone had been going through his northeast Portland law office. He didn't know who, or why, but several times—from January to July 2005—he noticed that papers on his desk had been moved and his computer rebooted. Yet, he says, "as far as I [could] tell, nothing was taken."

Then he got an e-mail from Jon Norling, another lawyer in the same suite, alerting him that twice on a previous night someone posing as a member of the cleaning crew had tried to enter the office. "I know the cleaning crew," Norling says. "For a while they were all Hispanic, and women. … [This was] a middle-aged white guy speaking perfect English." A few weeks later, on July 5, it happened again.

Nelson met with the building manger, but was offered no explanations or solutions. Nelson started to feel nervous. "I didn't know what they were doing, what they were looking for … so I moved all my files," he says. He took them to his home in the mountain town of Zigzag, because "It's more inconvenient to get there. The home has a burglar alarm, and there's a gate getting into the subdivision."

Still, within a few weeks he noticed more disturbing signs. Mulitple times, he came home to find that the electricity had been out and the alarm deactivated. The alarm company failed to follow protocol and notify him of the lapse in service. When he called to inquire, they were uncharacteristically circumspect.

At that point, Nelson started to suspect federal involvement. "When the FBI wants to go to a place, they put out what's called a 'National Security Letter,'" he explains. "That letter tells, for example, the landlord, or another person who might have to facilitate the entry, that it is illegal to ever say anything about the assistance that is provided. My guess is that those letters went out to the building management, including the security company, and to the alarm company."

In December, when the New York Times revealed the existence of a National Security Agency (NSA) domestic eavesdropping program, the pieces started coming together. The NSA was listening in on international calls to or from the United States, and Nelson was representing an Islamic charity, Al-Haramain, that had been accused of funding Chechen terrorists. The charges were eventually dropped, but the organization's director, Soliman Al-Buthe, is still wanted for illegally taking money out of the country. Al-Buthe now lives in Saudi Arabia, communicating with his attorneys largely by phone and e-mail.

Nelson won't say how, but he had received a document showing, he says, that these confidential attorney-client conversations had been intercepted. He knew right away that the document was important, but didn't realize just how important it was. When he learned of the NSA program, it seemed what he had was not just evidence of the government overstepping its bounds in one particular case, but evidence suggesting an entire program of government misconduct.

The break-ins suddenly made a lot more sense: "Keep in mind that these break-ins occurred after the illegal wiretaps and before the illegal wiretaps were public knowledge. It's more than a neat coincidence," Nelson says. "Overall, I think they were fishing for a document that they thought perhaps could forestall the entire NSA investigation that's going on now."

In other words, the break-ins were part of an attempted cover-up. "It's worrisome," Nelson says, "that they went to that kind of effort to hide what we allege is an illegal program—not just 'kind of' illegal, but a fundamental violation of basic constitutional principles."

On Feb. 28, Nelson became the first attorney to file a suit alleging specific damages from the NSA spy program. The complaint—Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation v. Bush—accuses the NSA of monitoring communications between Al-Buthe and two of Al-Haramain's lawyers, Wendell Belew and Asim Ghafoor. It also alleges that the NSA then shared its information with the Treasury Department, who used it to freeze Al-Haramain's assets.

The NSA has refused to acknowledge or deny involvement. But Nelson's theory is plausible. The sort of surveillance the lawsuit alleges—focusing on international calls to supposed terror suspects—fits within the scope of the NSA's activities.
But it is impossible to verify Nelson's specific claims without seeing the evidence. And the crucial document has not only been sealed by the court, but transferred to Seattle and placed in a sensitive compartmented information facility (SCIF)—a specialized vault designed to hold classified documents. Steve Borgen, the security expert for the U.S. Attorney who determined that the document should be stored in the SCIF, declined to say why it required such protection, saying only that "it just had to do with the content of the document itself." Nelson won't discuss its contents either, except to say "the document supports the allegation that's in [our] complaint."

However, Nelson suggests that the document is being so closely guarded, not because of the information it reports, but because of how that information was collected. "I think the interesting thing about the document isn't what's in it, but rather … that it supports our complaint of warrantless wiretapping." If he's right, then the government is protecting a secret that is already public knowledge.

Nelson expects that the document will eventually be declassified. The Oregonian has petitioned the court to make it public. While the Justice Department opposes the newspaper's motion altogether, Nelson asks only that the attorney-client correspondence be deleted.

In the meantime, Nelson is focused on the larger issue: "I don't mind the spying. I don't mind the eavesdropping. [But] do it through a judge," he says. "If you take out the judges, which the NSA program does, you run a real serious possibility of tyranny."

Court Skeptical of FCC's Internet Wiretap Rules

May 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — A U.S. appeals court panel sharply challenged the Bush administration Friday over new rules making it easier for police and the FBI to wiretap Internet phone calls. A judge said the government's courtroom arguments were "gobbledygook."

The skepticism expressed so openly toward the administration's case encouraged civil liberties and education groups that argued that the U.S. was improperly applying telephone-era rules to a new generation of Internet services.

"Your argument makes no sense," U.S. Circuit Judge Harry T. Edwards told Jacob Lewis, the lawyer for the Federal Communications Commission.

"When you go back to the office, have a big chuckle. I'm not missing this. This is ridiculous. Counsel!"

At another point in the hearing, Edwards told the FCC lawyer that his arguments were "gobbledygook" and "nonsense."

The court's decision is expected within several months.

In an unrelated case last year affecting digital television, two of the same three judges found that the FCC had significantly exceeded its authority and threw out new government rules requiring anti-piracy devices in new video devices. Lewis was also the losing lawyer in that case, and Edwards also was impassioned then in his criticisms of the FCC.

In the current case, Edwards appeared especially skeptical over the FCC's decision to require that providers of Internet phone service and broadband services must ensure their equipment can accommodate police wiretaps under the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act.

The new rules go into effect in May 2007.

The 1994 law was originally aimed at ensuring court-ordered wiretaps could be placed on wireless phones.

The Justice Department, which has lobbied aggressively on the subject, warned in court papers that failure to expand the wiretap requirements to the fast-growing Internet phone industry "could effectively provide a surveillance safe haven for criminals and terrorists who make use of new communications services."

Critics argued that the new FCC rules were too broad and inconsistent with the intent of Congress when it passed the law, which excluded categories of companies described as information services.

The FCC asserted that providers of high-speed Internet services should be covered under the law because their voice-transmission services can be considered separately from information services.

"Congress intended to cover services that were functionally equivalent" to traditional telephones, Lewis said during the hearing in U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Edwards replied, "There's nothing to suggest that in the statute. Stating that doesn't make it so."

The panel appeared more inclined to support the FCC's argument that Internet phone services that allow users to dial and receive calls from traditional phone numbers may be covered under the 1994 law and required to accommodate court-ordered wiretaps.

The technology, popularized by Holmdel, N.J.-based Vonage Holdings Corp., is known as voice over Internet protocol, or VOIP.

"Voice-over is a very different thing," U.S. Circuit Judge David B. Sentelle said.

He said it offered "precisely the same" functions as traditional telephone lines.

B. THIS WEEK

- Federal Circuit Orders Argument on Mandamus Petition in Case Challenging Third Circuit's Denial of Reappointment to Bankruptcy Judge
  In re United States, Misc. 2006-806 [United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit; United States Court of Federal Claims]. On April 21, the Federal Circuit ordered oral argument to be held May 10 on a mandamus petition filed by the United States, challenging the district court's refusal to dismiss a challenge brought by a bankruptcy judge denied reappointment and its order to the government to turn over privileged and confidential judicial documents for in camera review.

C. LAST WEEK

- Fifth Circuit Holds that Attorney General Has Discretion to Deem Arriving Aliens in Removal Proceedings Ineligible for Adjustment of Status
  Momin v. Gonzales [5th Cir.]. On April 24, the Fifth Circuit upheld 8 C.F.R.§ 245.1, the regulation that deems arriving aliens in removal proceedings ineligible for adjustment of status. The Court joined the Eighth Circuit in upholding the regulation. The First, Third, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have found the regulation invalid.

- The Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit Dismissed Cotton Importers Constitutional Challenge to the Cotton Act
  Cricket Hosiery, Inc. v. United States and F.T.B. Farms, et al., No. 03-0553 [Court of International Trade]. On April 24, the Court of International Trade granted the United States' and defendant-intervenors' motions to dismiss, upholding the constitutionality of the Cotton Research and Promotion Act ("Cotton Act"). Plaintiffs specifically alleged the Cotton Act violated their rights of Freedom of Speech and Free Association, and alleged an "as-applied" challenge that the message resulting from the Cotton Act was attributable to plaintiffs, an exception to the government speech defense, as well as a due process violation. The court held that the Supreme Court's decision in Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Ass'n, 125 S. Ct. 2055 (2005), involving the same constitutional issues in the nearly identical Beef Research and Promotion Act, controlled, and that the speech created by the Cotton Act was government speech. Further, the court dismissed plaintiffs' as-applied challenge because the existence of the contractor, Cotton, Inc., and the use of the Seal of Cotton did not attribute messages of the Cotton Act to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs' Freedom of Association claim was also dismissed because the court found that the Cotton Act does not force plaintiffs to associate with their competitors. Finally, plaintiffs' due process claim was determined to be time barred under 28 U.S.C. § 1581(I).

- Fifth Circuit Affirms Conviction for Illegal Possession of a Firearm by an Alien Unlawfully in the United States
  United States v. Elrawy [5th Cir.]. On April 26, the Fifth Circuit affirmed a conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm by an alien illegally in the United States, reversed a second conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm by an alien who has been admitted into the United States as a non-immigrant, and remanded to the district court for re-sentencing. The alien had entered the United States on a non-immigrant visa but failed to depart when the visa expired. The Court observed that "a formerly illegal alien who applies for adjustment of status is not in lawful status merely because he is allowed to remain in the United States while his application is pending."

- District Court Vacates Injunction on Removal to Somalia and Decertifies a Nationwide

Class
Ali Ali, et al. v. Ashcroft, et al. [Western District of Washington]. On remand from the Ninth Circuit, on April 27, the district court vacated an injunction on the removal of aliens to Somalia and de-certified a nationwide class of aliens whose removal to Somalia was barred under the injunction. The Ninth Circuit's remand stemmed from the government's motion to vacate the injunction after the Supreme Court, in Jama v. ICE, affirmed the Eighth Circuit's decision that ICE could remove an alien to his country of birth under 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(2), without prior acceptance of his repatriation from a government in his country of removal.

- Ninth Circuit, in Light of* Thomas*, Grants Stay of Mandate and Reconsideration of Government's Panel Rehearing Petition Asking the Court to Remand under* Ventura *for Determinations on Credibility, Past Persecution, and Rebuttal of Presumption of Well-founded Fear Kheiro v. Gonzales [9th Cir.]. On April 28, the Ninth Circuit: (1) granted the government's motion, in light of Gonzales v. Thomas, seeking stay of the mandate and reconsideration of the Court's April 14 denial of the government's panel petition; and (2) ordered the alien to respond to the rehearing petition within 14 days, taking Thomas into consideration. On February 10, in an unpublished decision, the Court reversed a finding of adverse credibility, found past persecution, and stated that it would not allow the government to raise new arguments intended to rebut the presumption of well-founded fear "four years after Kheiro's original asylum hearing." The Court remanded for the Attorney General to exercise his discretion with regard to asylum and with instructions that the alien be granted withholding of removal. The government then filed a rehearing petition seeking a Ventura remand for determinations on credibility, past persecution, and rebuttal of the presumption of well-founded fear.

- United States Moves for Summary Judgment in Challenge to Appropriations Law Barring Discrimination Against Health Care Providers Opposed to Performing Abortion California ex rel. Lockyer v. United States [Northern District of California]. On April 28, the United States moved for summary judgment, in which the State of California challenges the constitutionality of the Weldon Amendment, which provides that federal funding for labor, health, and education programs may not be made available to State or local governments that discriminate against health care providers who refuse to perform, pay for, or make referrals for, abortions. California, which requires health care facilities to perform abortions when necessary in a medical emergency, contends that the Weldon Amendment exceeds Congress's authority under the Spending Clause, violates the Tenth Amendment, and infringes on women's rights of access to abortion. The United States argues in support of its motion (and in opposition to plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, filed April 14): (1) that California lacks standing because it has never had to enforce its own laws regarding emergency abortion services at the risk of violating the Weldon Amendment, (2) that the Weldon Amendment is a valid exercise of Congress's spending power to discourage various forms of discrimination by federal funds recipients, (3) that the Weldon Amendment does not infringe on state sovereignty through impermissible "coercion," and (4) that merely protecting the free exercise of conscience by health care providers who are unwilling to perform abortions in the first place does not violate a constitutionally protected right of access to abortion.

· Court of International Trade Affirms Commerce's Scope Ruling
Sango Int'l v. United States, No. 05-0145 [Court of International Trade]. On May 1, the Court of International Trade denied plaintiff's motion for judgment upon the agency record and granted judgment for the United States. Plaintiff challenged the Department of Commerce's determination that gas meter swivels and gas meter nuts unambiguously fall within the scope of the antidumping duty order Certain Malleable Iron Pipe Fittings, Cast, Other Than Grooved, from the People's Republic of China, 68 Fed. Reg. 69,376 (Dec. 12, 2003). The court held that Commerce's determination is supported by substantial evidence and is in accordance with law.

· Federal Circuit Affirms in Part, Vacates in Part, and Remands Dismissal of Challenge to U.S. Trustee's Determination Not to Modify Retaliation List
Gilda Indus. Inc. v. United States, Consol. No. 05-0324 [Fed. Cir.] On May 1, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed in part, and reversed in part, the decision of the Court of International Trade dismissing a challenge to the imposition of 100 percent ad valorem duties upon toasted breads in retaliation for the European Communities' exclusion of hormone-treated beef from the United States. The appellate court rejected plaintiff-appellant's contention that Congress had only authorized retaliation against beef imported from the European Communities and held that the United States Trade Representative possesses broad discretion to target products other than those in dispute to induce U.S. trading partners to comply with their international obligations. The court remanded the case, however, for further record development of the government's explanation that it was not required to rotate products on the retaliation list in this instance because a resolution of the trade dispute is "imminent." The court limited any remedy that might be imposed on remand to a directive requiring the Trade Representative to comply with statutory requirements and specified that the plaintiff is not entitled to any refund of duties or removal of its product from the retaliation list. Finally, the court affirmed the denial of the plaintiff-appellant's petition for class certification.

· Motion for Preliminary Injunction to Continue Katrina Assistance Denied as Moot
Armstead v. Nagin [E.D. La.]. On May 2, Magistrate Judge Joseph C. Wilkinson, Jr. denied as moot the plaintiffs' motion for preliminary injunction. Plaintiffs, a husband and wife residing in a Houston apartment funded by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), allege that FEMA has not given them the financial assistance to which they are entitled, that the President failed to provide sufficient notice of the need to evacuate New Orleans and to "render prompt and necessary aid" after Hurricane Katrina, and that FEMA discriminates among Katrina victims by giving more support to some applicants than to others. Plaintiffs filed a motion for preliminary injunction seeking to require FEMA to provide continuing rental assistance, but the motion was mooted when FEMA reversed its initial denial of rental assistance. Plaintiffs' counsel did not respond to the offer to stipulate that the motion had become moot, and the motion was opposed on grounds of mootness. The federal defendants must respond to the complaint by May 30.

- Nationwide Class Certified in Challenge to Tobacco Transition Program
Neese v. Johanns [Western District of Virginia]. On May 2, Magistrate Judge Pamela Sargent issued a Report and Recommendation to the district court recommending certification of a nation-wide class action. This case is an Administrative Procedure Act challenge to regulations promulgated by the Department of Agriculture (USDA) implementing the Fair and Equitable Tobacco Reform Act of 2004. The Tobacco Reform Act terminates the 70-year-old program of tobacco price supports and marketing quotas, and provides for transition payments to be made to tobacco farmers over a ten-year period, in accordance with a formula for calculating payments set out in the statute. The transition payments are funded by special assessments laid on manufacturers of tobacco products. The plaintiffs, producers of burley and flue-cured tobacco, contend that the formula for calculating payments adopted in USDA's regulations is inconsistent with the statutory formula, and that, as a result, they received less in transition payments than required by the statute. The case was brought as a putative class action, and on plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the Magistrate Judge recommended that a class consisting of all burley and flue-cured tobacco producers who received less money under the agency regulations than they would have received under the statutory formula (as interpreted by the plaintiffs) be certified pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(2). In addition, the Magistrate Judge granted the motion by Philip Morris USA, Inc., to intervene in the case as a defendant. On the same day, May 2, the plaintiffs moved for summary judgment, contending that USDA's regulations are contrary to the plain language of the Tobacco Reform Act. Defendants' opposition is currently due on May 17, although we anticipate negotiating a schedule for submission of an opposition and cross-motion for summary judgment at a later time.

- Israeli Court dismisses Law Suit Claiming Damages for Denial of Visa Dimitri Aronov v. United States [Magistrate's Court - Tel Aviv]. On May 2, we were notified that the Israeli Magistrate's Court of Tel Aviv had dismissed on the grounds of sovereign immunity, a claim brought against the United States for the denial of a visa under the Diversity Immigrant Visa Program for Permanent Residents. The plaintiff claimed that his visa application was improperly denied after having received assurances from the Consular Section of the U.S. Embassy that his application would be granted. The plaintiff claimed 200,000 NIS ($45,000) in damages were sustained when, in reliance upon the preliminary and erroneous assurances of the Embassy, he sold his apartment and took other affirmative steps to move to the United States. In dismissing this case, the court found that the courts of Israel have no jurisdiction over litigation arising out of the internal immigration policies of a foreign state, and therefore the United States was entitled to sovereign immunity.

- Tenth Circuit Rejects Challenge to Restriction on Compensation for Work-Related Publications
Wolf v. Barnhart [United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit; United States District Court for the Northern District of Oklahoma]. On May 3, the Tenth Circuit rejected a challenge by an Administrative Law Judge in the Social Security Administration asserting a right to receive compensation for a book entitled Social Security and the Legal Professional, notwithstanding ethics regulations that prohibit receipt of compensation for writing relating to an employee's current duties. The panel rejected various Administrative Procedure Act challenges and distinguished the regulation at issue from the general ban on honoraria held invalid on First Amendment grounds by the Supreme Court.

- Ninth Circuit Affirms Ruling Dismissing Claims Under the Feres Doctrine
  Flowers v. Department of the Army [United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Hawaii]. On May 3, the Ninth Circuit issued an unpublished per curiam decision affirming the dismissal of claims under the Feres doctrine, which bars suits for injuries arising out of military service. The plaintiff, a former Sergeant Major in the Army, alleged that the Army had violated the Right to Financial Privacy Act in issuing subpoenas for his bank records in connection with its larceny investigation. The district court dismissed the claims on Feres grounds, and the panel agreed that the claims implicate concerns at the heart of the Feres doctrine.

- Motion to Stay Tort Litigation Filed in NASA Space Shuttle Property Loss Claim
  SPACEHAB, Inc. v. United States [Southern District of Texas]. On May 4, a motion was filed seeking a stay of this Federal Tort Claims Act action for damages arising out of the destruction of a private research module that was in the cargo bay of the ill-fated Space Shuttle Columbia. The Columbia was destroyed on reentry into the earth's atmosphere on February 1, 2003, causing the deaths of the astronauts and the loss of the shuttle and its cargo. NASA had provided $8 million in property loss coverage under its contract with SPACEHAB, and believed this was the limit of the government's liability. SPACEHAB disagrees and is suing to recover an additional $79 million in damages. SPACEHAB is concurrently pursuing a breach of contract claim before the Board of Contract Appeals. It now seeks identical relief in this action, characterizing the same loss as a tort (negligent destruction of property). The United States has moved to stay the tort action pending resolution of the Board proceedings.

- Federal Circuit Holds Contract Claims Against TRICARE Contractor Are Not Claims Against The United States
  Board of Trustees of Bay Medical Center v. Humana Military Healthcare [Fed. Cir.]. On May 4, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed the refusal by the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida to "transfer" to the Court of Federal Claims a contract action brought against a former TRICARE managed care provider by hospitals in its contracted network. Humana Military Healthcare argued that the government is the real party in interest because damages paid to the hospitals would allegedly be reimbursable under Humana's TRICARE contract (which has expired during the lawsuit). The court held that the complaint properly pleaded breaches of private contracts, and that Humana's stated intent to seek compensation from the government if held liable is irrelevant to jurisdiction.

- First Circuit Denies Stay/Injunction Sought by Army Reserve Captain Ordered to Active Duty After Army Refused to Accept Resignation
  O'Reilly v. Rumsfeld [United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts]. On May 5, Jonathan O'Reilly, a Captain in the Army Reserve, submitted multiple requests to resign his commission after completing more than eight years of service, but those requests were denied by the Army, and Captain O'Reilly has been ordered to active duty for service in Iraq. The district court denied his request for an injunction and dismissed his habeas claim, which challenged his mobilization orders and the denials of his resignation requests, ruling that such a claim must be brought where a soldier's custodian (commanding officer) is located. The First Circuit denied a stay or injunction pending appeal, and set the case for expedited briefing, ruling that Captain O'Reilly's alleged harms are outweighed by the harm to the military if he does not report for duty as ordered.

- Motion to Enjoin Guantanamo Military Commission Proceeding Filed
  Al Sharbi v. Bush [District Court for the District of Columbia]. On May 8, counsel purporting to represent Guantanamo Bay detainee Ghassan Abdulla Al Sharbi filed a motion seeking to enjoin military commission proceedings with respect to Al Sharbi pending a decision of the Supreme Court. Al Sharbi previously told the military commission that he did not want representation before the commission. Proceedings before the commission to decide whether Al Sharbi should go without counsel are scheduled for May 17. The motion to enjoin the commission proceedings was filed by counsel purporting to represent Al Sharbi in a separate habeas action brought through a family next friend. The government's response is currently due May 18.

Federal Court Holds 'Anti-Prostitution Pledge Requirement' Violates First Amendment

NEW YORK, May 9 (AScribe Newswire) -- A federal judge ruled today that a sweeping restriction on the privately funded speech of groups participating in the federal government's international HIV/AIDS program violates the First Amendment.

At issue in the case is a requirement that public health groups receiving U.S. funds pledge their "opposition to prostitution" in order to continue their life-saving HIV prevention work. Under this "pledge requirement," recipients of U.S. funds are forced to censor even their privately funded speech regarding the most effective ways to engage high-risk groups in HIV prevention.

In his opinion issued today, Judge Victor Marrero of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York ruled that the pledge requirement violated the First Amendment rights of two plaintiff organizations, Alliance for Open Society International (AOSI) and Pathfinder International, by restricting their privately funded speech and by forcing them to adopt the government's viewpoint in order to remain eligible for funds. "The Supreme Court has repeatedly found that speech, or an agreement not to speak, cannot be compelled or coerced as a condition of participation in a government program," wrote Judge Marrero. The plaintiffs are represented by the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law.

While none of the relief organizations receiving funds "supports prostitution," it is essential that they maintain their ability to engage in proven, effective HIV prevention methods with at-risk populations. "Today's ruling by Judge Marrero enables Pathfinder to continue serving the most vulnerable women in many of the world's poorest nations without impediment," said Daniel Pellegrom, Executive Director of Pathfinder International, one of the plaintiffs in the case.

"We're delighted that the court recognized the pledge requirement as unconstitutional and overreaching," said Ricardo Castro, a board member of Alliance for Open Society ("AOSI") International, one of the plaintiffs. "The provision not only violates the First Amendment, but also hampers organizations on the front lines of the AIDS epidemic working to save lives through proven prevention methods. We believe that public health policy should be based on science--not ideology."

Rebekah Diller, Associate Counsel at the Brennan Center, attorney for the plaintiffs, explained. "It's wrong for the government to force public health organizations to make ideological pledges on unrelated issues in order to do their work of preventing HIV/AIDS. This decision has wider implications. As nonprofit organizations partner with government to address social problems, it should be clear that what counts is whether they do the work, not whether they are willing to espouse ideological positions."

The plaintiffs are among a chorus of voices that have objected to a requirement that interferes with proven HIV prevention approaches. In July 2005, Brazil declined tens of millions of dollars in U.S. funds for its anti-AIDS work. In February 2005, 13 charitable organizations, including the International Rescue Committee, Save the Children and CARE, criticized the pledge requirement, saying that it "greatly undermines" AIDS prevention efforts.

The lawsuit, Alliance for Open Society International v. United States Agency for International Development, was brought by Pathfinder International, AOSI, and the Open Society Institute, with which AOSI is affiliated. The Brennan Center for Justice, through its Non-Profit Rights Project which works to protect the freedom of non-profit organizations when they partner with government, is counsel to the plaintiffs. Defendants are the United States Agency for International Development, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, all of which distribute U.S. funds for international HIV/AIDS work.

In his ruling today, Judge Marrero determined that a preliminary injunction against the enforcement of the pledge requirement was necessary to prevent AOSI and Pathfinder from suffering irreparable harm. While the courts decision applies directly only to AOSI and Pathfinder, it could have a broad impact on the many other public health organizations also forced to sacrifice their privately funded speech in order to receive government funds.

Plaintiff AOSI is an independent nongovernmental organization headquartered in the United States that is affiliated with the Open Society Institute (OSI). Plaintiff OSI, a private operating and grantmaking foundation, aims to shape public policy to promote democratic governance, human rights, and economic, legal, and social reform.

Plaintiff Pathfinder International, based in Watertown, Mass., provides reproductive health services and HIV/AIDS prevention to women and families in many of the world's most economically challenged countries.

The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law unites thinkers and advocates in pursuit if a vision of inclusive and effective democracy. Its mission is to develop and implement an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action that promotes equality and human dignity while safeguarding fundamental freedom.

New York judge halts government restrictions on AIDS funding

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_The U.S. government is violating the free-speech rights of key partners in its international fight against AIDS with a policy forcing groups to denounce prostitution as a condition for receiving funding, a federal judge ruled Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Victor Marrero said the U.S. Supreme Court "has repeatedly found that speech, or an agreement not to speak, cannot be compelled or coerced as a condition of participation in a government program."

The judge wrote that the government's "somewhat cavalier take-it-or-leave-it answer to an infringement of speech _ which can more or less be characterized as 'if you don't like it, lump it' _ is simply not in keeping with the expectations our society derives from First Amendment freedoms."

He ruled after hearing arguments three weeks ago from the government and lawyers for three health organizations. The ruling was a preliminary injunction, temporarily blocking the government from continuing the actions while the legal case continues.

Lawyer Rebekah Diller had argued on behalf of the health organizations that the government had created "a First Amendment nightmare" with the rules.

Assistant U.S\l "l". Attorney\l "l" Richard E. Rosberger, arguing for the government, had said no provision of the 2003 law containing the anti-prostitution pledge requirement was meant to discourage the treatment of those with AIDS, including prostitutes.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, Megan Gaffney, said the government had no immediate comment on the decision.

Records will reveal Abramoff's White House visits

BY KENNETH R. BAZINET

New York Daily News

WASHINGTON - Secret Service logs set for release Wednesday should reveal some of convicted ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff's White House connections, according to conservative group Judicial Watch.

As part of a court-sanctioned deal, the Secret Service will hand over to Judicial Watch records expected to show when Abramoff was at the White House, how long he was there, and who signed him in for the visit.

Abramoff is the linchpin in a federal grand jury investigation into corruption and influence-peddling that stretches from Congress to the White House.

So far, a half-dozen current and ex-government employees have been indicted. But while the focus is now on top GOP congressmen, the Secret Service logs could put the heat on the Bush administration.

The records may show which White House offices Abramoff visited, though they probably won't list everyone Abramoff met with while there, said Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton.

"We're not sure what we will get. In terms of how many visits, who knows?" Fitton said. "But there may be something interesting in there."

A Bush loyalist told the Daily News: "There are a bunch of visits, (but) he didn't get into the West Wing very often."

President Bush's outgoing spokesman Scott McClellan cautioned reporters there might be records beyond what the Secret Service maintains, but he has refused to elaborate.

Taking on the administration may seem odd for a right-wing outfit that made a name for itself by dogging President Bill Clinton over the Monica Lewinsky and Paula Jones scandals.

But Judicial Watch is now an odd-couple ally with the left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. The liberal legal watchdog also is suing the Secret Service for related records involving a half dozen of Abramoff's associates.

"We're serious when we say we're anti-corruption," Fitton said, explaining the zeal with which he has taken on the White House over the Abramoff scandal.

Still, Judicial Watch hasn't completely shed its anti-Clinton image. It is now running a project called "Hillary Watch 2006," monitoring the New York Democrat's campaign contributions and government-funded travel.

"We still think (the Clintons) are corrupt politicians and they need to be held accountable," Fitton said.

Attorney for 5 Chinese ex-Guantanamo inmates slams US for dumping them in Albania

By LLAZAR SEMINI

Associated Press Writer

TIRANA, Albania_The attorney for five Chinese Muslims released from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay has criticized the United States for dumping them in Albania, a country where he said it would be virtually impossible for them to assimilate.

Sabin Willett told The Associated Press on Tuesday that the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush "has simply taken advantage of the good relationship with Albania to try to make one of its problems go away and I think that's unfortunate."

U.S. officials in Albania were not immediately available for comment.

China, meanwhile, has demanded the return of the five men and criticized a U.S. decision to allow them to seek asylum in Albania.

The United States allowed the men to go to Albania after concluding they posed no terrorist threat to the United States but might face persecution if they returned to China.

Chinese officials have said the five, members of the Uighur minority, are suspected of being members of a group accused of waging a violent separatist campaign in China's northwestern Muslim region of Xinjiang.

Beijing says the group _ the East Turkistan Islamic Movement _ has links to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terror network and has received arms and training from it. But the government hasn't released evidence to support its claims.

The five men were brought straight from Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, in a U.S. military plane accompanied by some 30 soldiers last week, Willett said.

No one here understands the language of the five men, he said. "I don't see how this is going to work."

The five are being sheltered at a National Center for Refugees in the suburbs of Tirana and they have not been allowed to meet with reporters, the attorney said. He said Albanian authorities were trying to minimize the controversy by "keeping the men out of the public eye."

The men were seen Monday having lunch at a Tirana restaurant and Willett said he had asked special permission, and thanked Albanian authorities for allowing them to get out "as they had not gone to restaurants in five years."

An Albanian Interior Ministry official, speaking on condition on anonymity because of the delicate issue, said "they normally are not allowed to get out of the center until the request for asylum is over and they get the proper documentation."

But Willett criticized the whole idea of keeping them in Albania, especially in a refugee center.

"Doing a refugee settlement, to make it work there should be some kind of family or community or some language similarity, some way to help people integrate into the society, get good jobs and become productive members of the community. And here there is just no point of contact," Willett said.

Beijing blames Uighur separatists for sporadic bombings and other violence in the Xinjiang region. But diplomats and foreign experts are skeptical and say most violence stems from personal disputes.

Xinjiang is a massive desert region in China's far northwest that abuts several Central Asian nations. It is home to about 8 million Uighurs, who are ethnically Turkic _ not Han Chinese _ and who have their own distinct culture and language.

The five men were detained during the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan following the Sept\l "l". 11\l "l" attacks.

In announcing their release last week, the U.S. Defense Department gave scant information about the former detainees\l "l". Their names were not listed and the statement did not say explicitly why they were not returned to China.

Ex-Pfizer VP Peter Rost Takes On Goliath

By Evelyn Pringle

Beginning in 1997, Pharmacia, currently a subsidiary of Pfizer, sought to boost its sales of the drug Genotropin. To that end, the company illegally marketed the drug to spur growth in short children and as an anti-aging drug for adults looking for the fountain of youth.

In a nutshell, the off-label marketing scheme included: (1) direct payments to doctors; (2) all-expense paid junkets for doctors; (3) financial incentives to distributors: and (4) phony consultant contracts to funnel payments for the off-label promotion.

As a result of the scheme‘s success, sales of the Genotropin sky-rocketed and over the years, Medicaid and other public healthcare programs paid millions of dollars for its improper use. The full amount of damage to health care programs is not yet known.

"But this much is certain," former Pfizer Vice President turned whistleblower, Dr Peter Rost, says, "Pharmacia turned Genotropin into a cash cow by illegally peddling a dangerous drug to make short kids tall and their grandparents young."

Genotropin is a man made human growth hormone approved to treat a limited range of hormonal deficiencies. The FDA has never approved the drug to spur growth for children without hormonal deficiencies or to prevent aging.

Genotropin has serious side effects according to the National Institute of Health: “If growth hormone is given to children or adults with normal growth, who do not need growth hormone, serious unwanted effects may occur because levels in the body become too high. These effects include the development of diabetes; abnormal growth of bones and internal organs such as the heart, kidneys, and liver, arteriosclerosis; and hypertension.”

Dr Rost joined Pharmacia in June of 2001 as a VP of Marketing Endocrine Care. One of his primary responsibilities was to oversee the marketing of Genotropin but he did not handle day-to-day marketing activities.

A group of about 70 people reported to Dr Rost, among them a US marketing director with a group of about 22 people under him. The marketing people who sold Genotropin throughout the US reported to the Endocrine Care sales director.

A few days after Dr Rost came on board he received a copy of a letter from his supervisor that discussed the off-label sale of Genotropin and stated that Pharmacia would not promote or encourage the use of the drug outside approved uses.

Dr Rost said he found the letter unusual because "any marketing director would be well aware that it is illegal to promote drugs for off-label indications." When he asked about it he was told that there had been some problems in the past, but that the issue had since been resolved.

In the fall of 2001, Dr Rost became aware that the company was paying for between 600 and 800 doctors and their spouses to attend an annual meeting at a posh Caribbean resort as part of its marketing of Genotropin. When he expressed concerns, he was assured that the company's legal department had approved this type of trip.

In early 2002, Dr Rost conducted a profitability analysis of the Genotropin franchise and became uneasy when the senior director of marketing would not disclose key sales and marketing information related to the audit.

During the analysis, Dr Rost learned that Pharmacia paid cash incentives to sales reps for each new patient who was prescribed Genotropin and that 16 of the top 20 earning territories came from the adult team, in spite of the fact that adult sales accounted for only about 10% of total sales. He also learned that they received incentives regardless of whether treatment was on-label or off-label.

Dr Rost then decided to track every new patient to determine exactly how many new anti-aging patients were signed on each month. Based on high number in his analysis, Pharmacia agreed to change the incentive payment plan and exclude payments for any patients from physicians known to engage in off-labeling prescribing.

Later in February 2002, Dr Rost learned that Pharmacia had numerous contracts to sell Genotropin directly to doctors specializing in the anti-aging field, as well as contracts with wholesalers who specialized in servicing the off-label Genotropin market.

Around this same time, he decided to delve deeper into the marketing practices and it soon became clear that his subordinates knew that off-label marketing was illegal, and they were not forthcoming. For instance, the payments to physicians were not revealed until a manager left the company and doctors started to call and ask about their payments.

Dr Rost first approached Pharmacia management in the fall of 2001, and in February 2002, the company started an internal investigation. In March, the firm's Associate General Counsel informed Dr Rost that she had found that marketing director, Carl Worrell, had engaged in gross misconduct relating to the off-label promotion and that he was not forthcoming during the investigation. Based on their concerns, a decision was made to terminate Worrell's employment in April 2002.

After he left, Dr Rost discovered documents that showed that Pharmacia had been actively engaged in the off-label marketing since at least 2000. In one example, Dr William Abelove, an anti-aging doctor at a longevity center, had sent a letter to Pharmacia CEO, Fred Hassan, in 2000, and wanted to purchase Genotropin at a discount rate. Mr Hassan forwarded the letter to the marketing departments and by May 1, 2000, Worrell had signed a consulting contract with Dr Abelove to assist in the promotion of Genotropin.

In effort to ensure that the off-label promotion was terminated, Dr Rost sent an email to the associate director of marketing and her product managers and explained his concerns about continued payments and consultancy agreements, and instructed them not to approve any additional payments without seeing him first.

In May 2002, Pharmacia cancelled contracts that gave rebates to anti-aging doctors and wholesalers who supplied anti-aging clinics but continued to sell to these doctors and wholesalers.

The same month, Dr Rost received a short debriefing of the internal legal review and was assured that appropriate corrective action had been taken.

In July 2002, Pfizer announced the friendly take-over of Pharmacia. With this merger, it became clear to Mr Rost that he would have to address his concerns with Pfizer's management team. To prepare, Dr Rost started to research the legal statutes related to growth hormones and the False Claims Act, and other laws Pharmacia may have violated.

During the time period of July through September 2002, Dr Rost continued to receive reports about discoveries of kick-backs paid to doctors.

On October 28, 2002, Mr Rost and several marketing directors participated in a meeting with Pfizer that included employees from Pfizer's medical, marketing, regulatory and legal department, as well as Judith Tytel, Pharmacia's Senior Corporate Counsel.

The meeting was intended to be an opportunity for Pharmacia employees to provide information to their Pfizer counterparts. At the meeting Dr Rost and his team disclosed that Pharmacia was sponsoring all-expense paid junkets for physicians and that Pharmacia maintained a data base, known as the Bridge Program, that contained detailed information regarding the 30,000 patients who received Genotropin prescriptions.

They also explained that payments were being made to US doctors and discussed how the Bridge Program supplied new patients with free Genotropin for several months while the company assisted in seeking reimbursement.

Following the meeting, several Pfizer executives asked for more information and on November 8, 2002, Dr Rost and several directors, and Associate General Counsel, met with Pfizer representatives and lawyers and reviewed the Bridge Program.

During this time, Dr Rost continued to discuss his concerns with executives and lawyers at Pharmacia and believed that the company was concerned about the potential legal exposure related to the off-label sale of Genotropin.

In response to continued reports indicating illegal activities, Dr Rost repeatedly tried to implement corrective measures. However, he learned that the corporate culture at Pharmacia made it impossible to eliminate illegal conduct because of the financial incentives that drove sales reps to continue it.

Through further investigation, Dr Rost learned that the illegal activities started long before he arrived, and as far back as 1997. He came to conclude that at times, company officers condoned the activities despite knowing that they were illegal.

On April 16, 2003, the merger between Pfizer and Pharmacia was final. Pharmacia directors and officers realized enormous financial benefits. CEO Fred Hassan, received a $9.9 million severance package, 9 other directors received packages worth, in the aggregate, $31.6 million, and company directors were able to obtain early vesting of approximately 6.7 million in stock options.

Pharmacia's sales were also a shot in the arm to Pfizer. According to Pfizer's 2003 Annual Report: "Revenues increased 40% to $45,188 million in 2003 ... Revenue increases in 2003 were primarily due to the inclusion of Pharmacia products," it said.

The off-label sales paid off extremely well. Between 1997 and 2003, Genotropin generated more than $550 million in sales in the US alone and the company's database shows that about 60% of adult sales, and 25% to 30% of pediatric sales, were for off-label use.

On May 22, 2003, Dr Rost became aware of the pervasive nature of ongoing illegal activity when he met with a manager of the Bridge Program and was shown documents that confirmed that a massive number of patients were listed with an off-label diagnosis.

In fact, 25% to 30% of the pediatric prescriptions were for off-label use. Dr Rost understood that pediatric patients received significant funding from Medicaid and other government programs.

He was alarmed at the extent of pediatric use - a staggering number, he says, not only due to the medial implications to children but also because it demonstrated that a great percentage of the cost was reimbursed by Medicaid or other governmental programs.

Disturbed by these findings, he decided to file a lawsuit and with Attorney Erika Kelton, and another Phillips & Cohen attorney, started drafting a complaint.

On June 3, 2003, Ms Kelton, informed an assistant US Attorney that Dr Rost would be filing a qui tam action alleging fraud relating to the off-label marketing of Genotropin and delivered a copy of the complaint to the US Attorney's Office on June 4, 2003.

In the Complaint, Dr Rost provides details of a complex scheme including the nature of the fraud - where it occurred, how it occurred, when it occurred and the persons responsible for its commission. The following is a summary of the complaint's specific factual allegations:

Approximately 60% of adult sales and 25% of its pediatric sales were for off-label uses.

Pharmacia bribed 16 named distributors to promote off-label usage of Genotropin.

Under the pretext of participating in a "study," Pharmacia paid doctors $200 for every patient they prescribed to, including off-label subscriptions, and paid doctors an additional $200 for every year that such patients continued to use Genotropin.

Pharmacia sponsored junkets for physicians and their spouses and awarded substantial "honoraria" as inducements/kickbacks to promote the off-label usage of Genotropin.

Pharmacia provided discounts to doctors working exclusively in the anti-aging area, knowing that they would sell Genotropin off-label for anti-aging treatment and least 18 named doctors signed contracts for such price discounts.

Through contracts and "retainer" agreements, Pharmacia hired persons and entities, some named in the Complaint, to promote off-label use of Genotropin and such "consultants" provided no other services.

The false claims were submitted from 1997 to June 5, 2003 across the US and included false claims and statements made by dozens of named distributors and doctors, and Pfizer's Bridge Program lists the patients for which the false claims were submitted.

But come to find out, off-label marketing seems to habitual with Pfizer. At the same time that Dr Rost reported the illegal activities, Pfizer was fighting off a whistleblower lawsuit arising out of the off-label marketing of the drug Neurontin, by another company acquired through a merger, in promoting the drug for pain control and Attention Deficit Disorder.

In the end, Pfizer settled the lawsuit and a related criminal case for $430 million.

In a motion filed in attempt to dismiss Dr Rost's lawsuit, Pfizer states: "After investigating for more than two years, the Justice Department recently declined to intervene in this qui tam complaint." The inference being that the DOJ does not consider this to be a serious case.

However, a decision by the DOJ not to intervene means nothing. According to a study by the Government Accounting Office, the DOJ has declined to intervene in 72% of all qui tam actions initiated between 1987 and 2005.

A review of Pfizer regulatory filings reveals an ongoing affair with the DOJ. In its Form 10-K for 2003, filed with the SEC on March 10, 2004, Pfizer disclosed the following:

"The company recently was notified that the US Department of Justice is conducting investigations relating to the marketing and sale of Genotropin and Bextra, as well as certain managed care payments."

In its Form 10-K for 2004, filed with the SEC on February 29, 2005, Pfizer disclosed that: "In late 2003, we received a request for information and documents from the US Department of Justice concerning the marketing of Genotropin as well as certain managed care payments."

Nine months later, in a Form 10-Q filed on November 9, 2005, Pfizer revealed that: "The U.S. Department of Justice has informed us that it is investigating Pharmacia's former contractual relationship with a health care intermediary."

And make no mistake, Pfizer's legal troubles are far from over. According to Dr Rost's attorney, Mark Labaton, "a grand jury in Boston is investigating the illegal promotion and marketing of Genotropin based on an investigation conducted by the US Attorney's office."

In addition according to news reports, the US Attorney in the Eastern District of New York also has an active criminal investigation involving Pfizer's off-label promotion of Lipitor, he says.

Mark Labaton, is a partner at the firm Kreindler & Kreindler, LLP, with offices in New York and LA. The firm handles cases including securities and consumer class actions, and FCA whistleblower, antitrust, and consumer cases.

His resume includes 7 years as an Assistant US Attorney for the Central District of California, where he prosecuted white-collar fraud cases, including whistleblower actions.

Pfizer is the largest pharmaceutical company in the world, and according to Mr Labaton, "Like most large pharmaceutical companies, it is financially and politically powerful."

"Litigating against such companies is not for the faint-hearted," he warns.

"But whistleblower lawyers are inspired by their clients," Mr Labaton says. "Warts and all, these clients are a strong, determined, and courageous lot."

He claims that "off-label promotion of drugs is a form of quackery that victimizes vulnerable individuals who take these drugs with serious and dangerous side effects for purposes never intended and approved by the FDA."

"That's exactly what happened in our case," he notes.

"Pharmacia and its successor company, Pfizer," Mr Labaton says, "generated hundreds of millions in revenue by peddling Genotropin to spurt growth in short children and as an anti-aging drug for adults seeking eternal youth."

"Genotropin was never intended to make short kids tall and their grandparents young," he said.

In some whistleblower cases, he says, there is one victim -- "the taxpayer who foots the bill for the fraud."

It costs law firms a fortune to go up against the giant drug makers. In the Pfizer Neurontin lawsuit, “the civil/whistleblower plaintiffs in that case took more than 20 depositions and obtained thousands of pages of documents in discovery,” Mr Labaton reports.

But he says he‘s not complaining. “The costs to us as lawyers and to our firms can be substantial,” he says, “but these costs pale when compared to what whistleblowers, like Dr. Rost, have to endure.”

“So far,” he points out, “Pfizer has used its muscle to reactively and vigorously oppose Dr. Rost and to make his life tough.”

Dr Rost is indeed being hit from all sides.

On December 30, 2005, he was officially nominated for the "Whiny Whistleblower of the Year" award by a Pharma backed front group and won. In truth, whether he knows it or not, it is a top honor, when considering that he competed against two of the nation's most beloved whistleblowers, Dr David Graham of Vioxx fame from the FDA, and Dr Eric Topol, of the Cleveland Clinic.

Dr Rost's award was announced by Gilbert Ross, MD, who bills himself as a doctor and Executive and Medical Director of the American Council on Science and Health.

That in itself is amazing being that Doctor Ross’ own achievement of ripping off Medicaid to the tune of $8 million was only given the recognition that it deserved last fall.

"Ross actually had to abandon medicine on July 24, 1995, when his license to practice as a physician in New York was revoked by the unanimous vote of a state administrative review board for professional misconduct," according to the November/December issue of Mother Jones Magazine.

"Instead of tending to patients," Jones reports, "Ross spent all of 1996 at a federal prison camp in Schuylkill, Pennsylvania, having being sentenced to 46 months in prison for his participation in a scheme that ultimately defrauded New York's Medicaid program of approximately $8 million.”

For its part, the American Council on Science and Health stopped disclosing its corporate donors in the early 1990s, according to Integrity in Science on its web site at http://www.cspinet.org/integrity/nonprofits/american_council_on_science_and_health.html

However, the companies noted as contributors in ACSH’s 1991 annual report and ACSH’s list of Corporate Donors for 1997 include: Pfizer, Abbott Laboratories, American Cyanamid, Bristol-Myers Squibb, Ciba-Geigy, Eli Lilly, Hoffman-La Roche, Johnson & Johnson, Rhone-Poulenc, Sandoz, Searle, Syntex, Warner-Lambert, Upjohn, and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association.

For too many years, off-label marketing offenses resulted in nothing more than a slap on the wrist to drug makers, if that.

The FDA regulated the industry and when it found "off-label" marketing, the agency sent the company a warning letter. Sometimes companies were required to sign a consent degree, but they did not face fines.

In 1991, all that changed. Pharmaceutical giant Genentech started the False Claims ball rolling when the company was caught selling another growth hormone, Protropin, off-label by influencing doctors to prescribe it to children who did not suffer from hormone deficiency.

Genentech was prosecuted under the FCA and paid $50 million to settle the case.

Since then, the government has used the FCA in 15 cases that were settled out of court, but according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a non-profit advocacy group that assists whistleblowers, 150 more cases are currently pending.

The FCA has become effective in large part due to the reward for whistleblowers who can receive between 15% and 30% of the amount recovered in the lawsuit with the average award being $120,000, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud.

In most cases, off-label marketing is usually not a jailable offense; but it is with Genotropin.

“Growth hormone is different from any other drug,” Dr Rost explains, “distributing the drug for off-label purposes is a crime.”

“Not even a doctor is allowed to prescribe growth hormone for off-label use,” he says.

The Controlled Substances Act states in part: “…whoever knowingly distributes, or possesses with intent to distribute, human growth hormone for any use in humans other than the treatment of a disease or other recognized medical condition, where such use has been authorized by the Secretary of Health and Human Services … and pursuant to the order of a physician, is guilty of an offense punishable by not more than 5 years in prison.

“None of us who became employed by Pharmacia asked to be put into an incriminating situation,” Dr Rost points out.

The criminal penalties were a result of the 1988 and 1990 amendments to the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, that made off-label sale of human growth hormone to treat age-associated illnesses illegal, according to a report in the October 26, 2005 Journal of the American Medical Association.

In the JAMA article, authors Dr Thomas Perls, director of the New England Centenarian Study at Boston Medical Center; Dr Neal Reisman, clinical professor of plastic surgery at Baylor College of Medicine, who is also an attorney; and S. Jay Olshansky, professor of epidemiology at the University of Illinois at Chicago School of Public Health discuss the little known law.

According to the article, human growth hormone can be legally prescribed for only 3 conditions: HGH deficiency-related syndromes that cause short stature in children, adult deficiency due to rare pituitary tumors and their treatment, and muscle-wasting disease associated with HIV/AIDS.

According to Dr Olshansky, "off-label use for many drugs is a normal and accepted practice in medicine, but that is not true for growth hormone. According to laws instituted by Congress more than 10 years ago, HGH can only be distributed for indications specifically authorized by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, and aging and its related disorders are not among them.”

“The use of HGH as an alleged anti-aging intervention is a major public health concern not just because it is illegal,” Dr Olshansky explains, “but also because its provision for anti-aging is not supported by science and it is potentially harmful."

People are spending a fortune on HGH under the belief that it reverses aging. "On the contrary, responsibly conducted and peer-reviewed science indicates that HGH could in fact accelerate aging and shorten lifespan,” according to Dr Perls.

“It is associated with very high rates of serious adverse effects,” he advised, “and long-term use could increase one's risk of cancer."

In 2004, sales of HGH totaled $622 million (nearly 213,000 prescriptions) not including sales on anti-aging Web sites. "These data suggest that a very large proportion of HGH sales are for illegal uses," Dr Perls noted.

Logically, the vast majority of prescriptions should be for children, but according to the study, 74% of prescriptions in 2004 were for people 20 and older, and 44% were for people between the age of 40 and 59.

Bush to nominate Gorsuch to Denver appeals court

M.E. Sprengelmeyer, Rocky Mountain News

President Bush is expected to nominate attorney and legal scholar Neil Gorsuch to take a seat on the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver, Sen. Wayne Allard announced late Tuesday.

Gorsuch, who has a long paper trail of writings against issues such as euthanasia and judicial activism, currently serves in the U.S. Department of Justice as a principal deputy to the associate attorney general.

A Denver native, he comes from a family of well-known Colorado conservatives, including his late mother, Anne Gorsuch Burford, who was former President Reagan's Environmental Protection Agency director until she resigned in 1983 amid a mismanagement scandal.

Allard, a Republican, praised Neil Gorsuch's legal credentials. Gorsuch earned a law degree from Harvard University and later a doctorate in legal philosophy from the University of Oxford. He has been a clerk to two U.S. Supreme Court justices, fellow Coloradan Byron White and current Associate Justice Anthony Kennedy.

"He reflects a deep understanding of the law," Allard said. "One of the most assuring things to me is he does not believe in an activist court. You stick with the intent of the legislation."

His writings include the book The Future of Assisted\l "l" Suicide\l "l" and Euthanasia, which, according to one review, presents arguments on both sides but concludes with "the idea that human life is intrinsically valuable and that intentional killing is always wrong."

In an article titled Liberals 'n' Lawsuits for National Review Online, he quotes Washington Post columnist David von Drehle and skewers Democrats who, he argues, have wrongly pushed for courts to decide issues they can't settle in the legislative arena.

"There's no doubt that constitutional lawsuits have secured critical civil-right victories, with the desegregation cases culminating in Brown v. Board of Education topping the list," Gorsuch writes.

"But rather than use the judiciary for extraordinary cases, von Drehle recognizes that American liberals have become addicted to the courtroom, relying on judges and lawyers rather than elected leaders and the ballot box, as the primary means of effecting their agenda on everything from gay marriage to assisted\l "l" suicide\l "l" to the use of vouchers for private-school education."

Gorsuch would need to go through confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee and to win a confirmation vote in the full Senate, where partisan fighting has slowed or even halted some contentious nominations in the past.

Drew Nannis, spokesman for Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said, "the senator looks forward to the hearings and looks forward to the process that is going to come forth."

Two patent rulings raise issues for biotechs, generics

May 10, 2006

By: Beth Herskovits

Two court decisions in the past two weeks set new bounds in the murky territory of patent infringement.

A jury last week found that Eli Lilly owes $65 million in back royalties to Ariad Pharmaceuticals for infringing on a patent that covers the biological pathway known as NF-Kappa B. Lilly was also ordered to pay a 2.3 percent royalty on future sales of osteoporosis drug Evista and sepsis drug Xigris, which act on the NF-Kappa B pathway.

The suit raised questions about the scope of patents covering naturally-occurring phenomena in the body.

Ariad has argued that its patent -- which it licenses from Harvard University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the Whitehead Institute -- covers all methods of treating diseases through regulating NF-Kappa B.

Lilly has argued that the patent is "unenforceable" and demonstrates "improper coverage of natural processes." The company issued a statement saying that it will appeal the decision.

The US Patent and Trademark Office is currently examining the patent. Neither company could immediately be reached for comment.

Bradford Duft, a partner at law firm Duane Morris, which was not involved in the case, noted that the suit raises common issues in the area of biotech law.

"These cases all depend on individual patents," he said. "Just about everything in biotechnology involves some aspect of nature."

Separately, Teva Pharmaceuticals won its suit against FDA and received 180 days of marketing exclusivity for a generic version of Merck's cholesterol drug Zocor.

Teva had challenged Merck's patent under Paragraph IV of the Hatch-Waxman Act, a provision of which provides marketing exclusivity to generic companies that can successfully prove that a brand's patent is invalid.

But when Merck decided not to fight Teva, FDA determined that the patent was not in dispute and denied marketing exclusivity for Teva?s generic product.

Gregory Glass, principal of the consulting firm Gregory Glass Associates, noted that the case clarifies what happens when a generic company challenges a patent and the brand name company does not fight the challenge.

In the past, FDA has required generic companies to win a lawsuit in order to get marketing exclusivity. "That rule's gone now," Glass said. "[This case] provides more certainty in circumstances where the brand choose not to sue the generic company."

He estimated that brand name companies decline to sue the generic company in about 15% of patent challenges.

Pledge atheist' set to challenge 'In God We Trust'

The California atheist known for his legal challenge against the Pledge of Allegiance is in court arguing the national motto "In God We Trust" is unconstitutional.

Michael Newdow, who filed a 162-page complaint against the president and Congress, will argue his case in federal district court in Sacramento May 19.

The national public-interest Thomas More Law Center has filed a brief supporting the United States government's motion to dismiss the suit.

The Law Center argues, "This nation and its form of government were founded upon an essential idea: Individuals have God-given rights that the government may neither bestow nor deny."

Richard Thompson, the center's chief counsel, says Newdow's "attempt to eliminate the mere acknowledgement of our religious heritage by our National Motto has no basis in constitutional law." "Even the Supreme Court, in past decisions, has understood there is an unbroken history of official invocations of Divine guidance beginning with our founding fathers and continuing to our present day leaders," Thompson said.

Discussing the case last November, Newdow told KWTV in Oklahoma City, "The key principle is that we're supposed to treat everybody equally especially in terms of religious belief."

"Clearly it's not treating atheists equal with people who believe in God when you say 'In God We Trust' or we are a 'nation under God,'" he insisted.

"People say, 'Are you an atheist activist?' And I'm not," he continued. "I couldn't care less what anyone believes. I just care that our government treats everybody equally."

Last September, in Newdow's second challenge against the Pledge of Allegiance, a federal judge in Sacramento ruled the reciting of the pledge in public schools is unconstitutional.

The pledge's reference to one nation "under God" violates school children's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God," said U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton.

Karlton granted legal standing to two families represented by Newdow, who lost his previous battle before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The judge, nominated to his seat by President Carter in 1979, said he was bound by the precedent of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' in 2002, which favored Newdow.

In 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected Newdow's case 8-0 because he did not have legal standing to represent his daughter, who is under sole custody of her mother.

In January 2005, however, Newdow filed a complaint in federal court in Sacramento with eight new co-plaintiffs, seeking to remove "under God" from the Pledge of Allegiance on the grounds it violates the so-called "separation of church and state."

Klein Gives Powerful "No Child" Defense

City Schools Chancellor Joel Klein gave an impassioned defense of the federal No Child Left Behind law yesterday, saying schools need more testing and accountability - not less - to bolster performance and close the achievement gap.

And Klein stressed that the city's own promotion policies and school measures go well beyond what the NCLB requires.

The NCLB - approved by Congress and signed into law by President Bush in 2001 - requires standardized testing in schools and a breakdown in scores of students by race, ethnicity and disability.

"It is incredibly valuable because it recognizes that the achievement gap - the gap that separates our African-American and Latino students from their white and Asian peers - is the chief problem in American schooling," Klein said during a speech before the Aspen Institute's Commission on NCLB in West Hartford, Conn.

Klein testified right after Connecticut officials, who filed suit against the U.S. Education Department, claiming the federal law is too intrusive and requires too many tests. Klein disagreed.

"When they passed NCLB, our national leaders finally took responsibility for the fact that white and Asian students are performing four years ahead of African-American and Latino students in high school. Four years. And this law finally put muscle behind the attempt to close that gap," Klein said.

Klein also flunked his anti-testing critics, who claim NCLB and the Bloomberg administration's policy curbing social promotion have turned schools into testing mills.

He said NCLB - like most laws - is not perfect. But he described as "fundamental" the law's focus on holding educators responsible for teaching all students.

"I've never met a law that couldn't improve. But to criticize the heart of No Child Left Behind is to refuse to take responsibility for the achievement gap - the most serious civil-rights, social and economic crisis facing America today," Klein said.

He added that schools should be testing students "routinely," as long as the exams are based on solid standards.

"The anti-testing advocates would have you believe that people like me want our students to run through daily drills on how to properly fill in bubbles with No. 2 pencils. That couldn't be further from the truth," the chancellor said.

"Our teachers should teach students the skills and ideas they must master in order to pass their tests. That's teaching to the test," he said.

Klein also emphasized the city's program has carrots to go along with the sticks, by giving principals more power over curriculum, budgeting and hiring decisions in exchange for greater accountability.

The chancellor said the city Education Department also will begin using data more precisely than NCLB requires to track student performance over a number of years - called the "value-added" approach.

Press Release: CREW Sues Secret Service Over Abramoff-Related Visitor Records, Secret Service Refuses to Hand Over Docs to Ethics Org

WASHINGTON, May 9 /U.S. Newswire/ — Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) has sued the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) today for its failure to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request on documents detailing Abramoff-related visits to the White House, the executive office buildings and the Vice President's house.

On Feb. 2, CREW sent a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request to the Secret Service, a component of the Department of Homeland Security, asking for records relating to any visit that Jack Abramoff, Michael Scanlon, Neil Volz, Tony Rudy, Shawn Vassell, Kevin Ring, Edwin Buckham and Patrick Pizzella made between Jan. 1, 2001 and Feb. 2, 2006.

CREW has not received any documents from DHS regarding the FOIA request.

"We are trying to discover the extent of the ties between Abramoff and his colleagues and the Bush administration. Unfortunately -- as has become commonplace -- the administration is stonewalling," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of CREW. "The American people deserve to know the truth about Abramoff's influence with the Bush administration, something the administration is clearly trying to hide."

The CREW FOIA and suit against DHS are available at http://www.citizensforethics.org.

Federal Court Holds 'Anti-Prostitution Pledge Requirement' Violates First Amendment

NEW YORK, May 9 (AScribe Newswire) -- A federal judge ruled today that a sweeping restriction on the privately funded speech of groups participating in the federal government's international HIV/AIDS program violates the First Amendment.

At issue in the case is a requirement that public health groups receiving U.S. funds pledge their "opposition to prostitution" in order to continue their life-saving HIV prevention work. Under this "pledge requirement," recipients of U.S. funds are forced to censor even their privately funded speech regarding the most effective ways to engage high-risk groups in HIV prevention.

In his opinion issued today, Judge Victor Marrero of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York ruled that the pledge requirement violated the First Amendment rights of two plaintiff organizations, Alliance for Open Society International (AOSI) and Pathfinder International, by restricting their privately funded speech and by forcing them to adopt the government's viewpoint in order to remain eligible for funds. "The Supreme Court has repeatedly found that speech, or an agreement not to speak, cannot be compelled or coerced as a condition of participation in a government program," wrote Judge Marrero. The plaintiffs are represented by the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law.

While none of the relief organizations receiving funds "supports prostitution," it is essential that they maintain their ability to engage in proven, effective HIV prevention methods with at-risk populations. "Today's ruling by Judge Marrero enables Pathfinder to continue serving the most vulnerable women in many of the world's poorest nations without impediment," said Daniel Pellegrom, Executive Director of Pathfinder International, one of the plaintiffs in the case.

"We're delighted that the court recognized the pledge requirement as unconstitutional and overreaching," said Ricardo Castro, a board member of Alliance for Open Society ("AOSI") International, one of the plaintiffs. "The provision not only violates the First Amendment, but also hampers organizations on the front lines of the AIDS epidemic working to save lives through proven prevention methods. We believe that public health policy should be based on science--not ideology."

Rebekah Diller, Associate Counsel at the Brennan Center, attorney for the plaintiffs, explained. "It's wrong for the government to force public health organizations to make ideological pledges on unrelated issues in order to do their work of preventing HIV/AIDS. This decision has wider implications. As nonprofit organizations partner with government to address social problems, it should be clear that what counts is whether they do the work, not whether they are willing to espouse ideological positions."

The plaintiffs are among a chorus of voices that have objected to a requirement that interferes with proven HIV prevention approaches. In July 2005, Brazil declined tens of millions of dollars in U.S. funds for its anti-AIDS work. In February 2005, 13 charitable organizations, including the International Rescue Committee, Save the Children and CARE, criticized the pledge requirement, saying that it "greatly undermines" AIDS prevention efforts.

The lawsuit, Alliance for Open Society International v. United States Agency for International Development, was brought by Pathfinder International, AOSI, and the Open Society Institute, with which AOSI is affiliated. The Brennan Center for Justice, through its Non-Profit Rights Project which works to protect the freedom of non-profit organizations when they partner with government, is counsel to the plaintiffs. Defendants are the United States Agency for International Development, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, all of which distribute U.S. funds for international HIV/AIDS work.

In his ruling today, Judge Marrero determined that a preliminary injunction against the enforcement of the pledge requirement was necessary to prevent AOSI and Pathfinder from suffering irreparable harm. While the courts decision applies directly only to AOSI and Pathfinder, it could have a broad impact on the many other public health organizations also forced to sacrifice their privately funded speech in order to receive government funds.

Plaintiff AOSI is an independent nongovernmental organization headquartered in the United States that is affiliated with the Open Society Institute (OSI). Plaintiff OSI, a private operating and grantmaking foundation, aims to shape public policy to promote democratic governance, human rights, and economic, legal, and social reform.

Plaintiff Pathfinder International, based in Watertown, Mass., provides reproductive health services and HIV/AIDS prevention to women and families in many of the world's most economically challenged countries.

The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law unites thinkers and advocates in pursuit if a vision of inclusive and effective democracy. Its mission is to develop and implement an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action that promotes equality and human dignity while safeguarding fundamental freedom.

New York judge halts government restrictions on AIDS funding

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_The U.S. government is violating the free-speech rights of key partners in its international fight against AIDS with a policy forcing groups to denounce prostitution as a condition for receiving funding, a federal judge ruled Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Victor Marrero said the U.S. Supreme Court "has repeatedly found that speech, or an agreement not to speak, cannot be compelled or coerced as a condition of participation in a government program."

The judge wrote that the government's "somewhat cavalier take-it-or-leave-it answer to an infringement of speech _ which can more or less be characterized as 'if you don't like it, lump it' _ is simply not in keeping with the expectations our society derives from First Amendment freedoms."

He ruled after hearing arguments three weeks ago from the government and lawyers for three health organizations. The ruling was a preliminary injunction, temporarily blocking the government from continuing the actions while the legal case continues.

Lawyer Rebekah Diller had argued on behalf of the health organizations that the government had created "a First Amendment nightmare" with the rules.

Assistant U.S\l "l". Attorney\l "l" Richard E. Rosberger, arguing for the government, had said no provision of the 2003 law containing the anti-prostitution pledge requirement was meant to discourage the treatment of those with AIDS, including prostitutes.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, Megan Gaffney, said the government had no immediate comment on the decision.

Records will reveal Abramoff's White House visits

BY KENNETH R. BAZINET

New York Daily News

WASHINGTON - Secret Service logs set for release Wednesday should reveal some of convicted ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff's White House connections, according to conservative group Judicial Watch.

As part of a court-sanctioned deal, the Secret Service will hand over to Judicial Watch records expected to show when Abramoff was at the White House, how long he was there, and who signed him in for the visit.

Abramoff is the linchpin in a federal grand jury investigation into corruption and influence-peddling that stretches from Congress to the White House.

So far, a half-dozen current and ex-government employees have been indicted. But while the focus is now on top GOP congressmen, the Secret Service logs could put the heat on the Bush administration.

The records may show which White House offices Abramoff visited, though they probably won't list everyone Abramoff met with while there, said Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton.

"We're not sure what we will get. In terms of how many visits, who knows?" Fitton said. "But there may be something interesting in there."

A Bush loyalist told the Daily News: "There are a bunch of visits, (but) he didn't get into the West Wing very often."

President Bush's outgoing spokesman Scott McClellan cautioned reporters there might be records beyond what the Secret Service maintains, but he has refused to elaborate.

Taking on the administration may seem odd for a right-wing outfit that made a name for itself by dogging President Bill Clinton over the Monica Lewinsky and Paula Jones scandals.

But Judicial Watch is now an odd-couple ally with the left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. The liberal legal watchdog also is suing the Secret Service for related records involving a half dozen of Abramoff's associates.

"We're serious when we say we're anti-corruption," Fitton said, explaining the zeal with which he has taken on the White House over the Abramoff scandal.

Still, Judicial Watch hasn't completely shed its anti-Clinton image. It is now running a project called "Hillary Watch 2006," monitoring the New York Democrat's campaign contributions and government-funded travel.

"We still think (the Clintons) are corrupt politicians and they need to be held accountable," Fitton said.

Attorney for 5 Chinese ex-Guantanamo inmates slams US for dumping them in Albania

By LLAZAR SEMINI

Associated Press Writer

TIRANA, Albania_The attorney for five Chinese Muslims released from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay has criticized the United States for dumping them in Albania, a country where he said it would be virtually impossible for them to assimilate.

Sabin Willett told The Associated Press on Tuesday that the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush "has simply taken advantage of the good relationship with Albania to try to make one of its problems go away and I think that's unfortunate."

U.S. officials in Albania were not immediately available for comment.

China, meanwhile, has demanded the return of the five men and criticized a U.S. decision to allow them to seek asylum in Albania.

The United States allowed the men to go to Albania after concluding they posed no terrorist threat to the United States but might face persecution if they returned to China.

Chinese officials have said the five, members of the Uighur minority, are suspected of being members of a group accused of waging a violent separatist campaign in China's northwestern Muslim region of Xinjiang.

Beijing says the group _ the East Turkistan Islamic Movement _ has links to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terror network and has received arms and training from it. But the government hasn't released evidence to support its claims.

The five men were brought straight from Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, in a U.S. military plane accompanied by some 30 soldiers last week, Willett said.

No one here understands the language of the five men, he said. "I don't see how this is going to work."

The five are being sheltered at a National Center for Refugees in the suburbs of Tirana and they have not been allowed to meet with reporters, the attorney said. He said Albanian authorities were trying to minimize the controversy by "keeping the men out of the public eye."

The men were seen Monday having lunch at a Tirana restaurant and Willett said he had asked special permission, and thanked Albanian authorities for allowing them to get out "as they had not gone to restaurants in five years."

An Albanian Interior Ministry official, speaking on condition on anonymity because of the delicate issue, said "they normally are not allowed to get out of the center until the request for asylum is over and they get the proper documentation."

But Willett criticized the whole idea of keeping them in Albania, especially in a refugee center.

"Doing a refugee settlement, to make it work there should be some kind of family or community or some language similarity, some way to help people integrate into the society, get good jobs and become productive members of the community. And here there is just no point of contact," Willett said.

Beijing blames Uighur separatists for sporadic bombings and other violence in the Xinjiang region. But diplomats and foreign experts are skeptical and say most violence stems from personal disputes.

Xinjiang is a massive desert region in China's far northwest that abuts several Central Asian nations. It is home to about 8 million Uighurs, who are ethnically Turkic _ not Han Chinese _ and who have their own distinct culture and language.

The five men were detained during the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan following the Sept\l "l". 11\l "l" attacks.

In announcing their release last week, the U.S. Defense Department gave scant information about the former detainees\l "l". Their names were not listed and the statement did not say explicitly why they were not returned to China.

Ex-Pfizer VP Peter Rost Takes On Goliath

By Evelyn Pringle

Beginning in 1997, Pharmacia, currently a subsidiary of Pfizer, sought to boost its sales of the drug Genotropin. To that end, the company illegally marketed the drug to spur growth in short children and as an anti-aging drug for adults looking for the fountain of youth.

In a nutshell, the off-label marketing scheme included: (1) direct payments to doctors; (2) all-expense paid junkets for doctors; (3) financial incentives to distributors: and (4) phony consultant contracts to funnel payments for the off-label promotion.

As a result of the scheme‘s success, sales of the Genotropin sky-rocketed and over the years, Medicaid and other public healthcare programs paid millions of dollars for its improper use. The full amount of damage to health care programs is not yet known.

"But this much is certain," former Pfizer Vice President turned whistleblower, Dr Peter Rost, says, "Pharmacia turned Genotropin into a cash cow by illegally peddling a dangerous drug to make short kids tall and their grandparents young."

Genotropin is a man made human growth hormone approved to treat a limited range of hormonal deficiencies. The FDA has never approved the drug to spur growth for children without hormonal deficiencies or to prevent aging.

Genotropin has serious side effects according to the National Institute of Health: “If growth hormone is given to children or adults with normal growth, who do not need growth hormone, serious unwanted effects may occur because levels in the body become too high. These effects include the development of diabetes; abnormal growth of bones and internal organs such as the heart, kidneys, and liver, arteriosclerosis; and hypertension."

Dr Rost joined Pharmacia in June of 2001 as a VP of Marketing Endocrine Care. One of his primary responsibilities was to oversee the marketing of Genotropin but he did not handle day-to-day marketing activities.

A group of about 70 people reported to Dr Rost, among them a US marketing director with a group of about 22 people under him. The marketing people who sold Genotropin throughout the US reported to the Endocrine Care sales director.

A few days after Dr Rost came on board he received a copy of a letter from his supervisor that discussed the off-label sale of Genotropin and stated that Pharmacia would not promote or encourage the use of the drug outside approved uses.

Dr Rost said he found the letter unusual because "any marketing director would be well aware that it is illegal to promote drugs for off-label indications." When he asked about it he was told that there had been some problems in the past, but that the issue had since been resolved.

In the fall of 2001, Dr Rost became aware that the company was paying for between 600 and 800 doctors and their spouses to attend an annual meeting at a posh Caribbean resort as part of its marketing of Genotropin. When he expressed concerns, he was assured that the company's legal department had approved this type of trip.

In early 2002, Dr Rost conducted a profitability analysis of the Genotropin franchise and became uneasy when the senior director of marketing would not disclose key sales and marketing information related to the audit.

During the analysis, Dr Rost learned that Pharmacia paid cash incentives to sales reps for each new patient who was prescribed Genotropin and that 16 of the top 20 earning territories came from the adult team, in spite of the fact that adult sales accounted for only about 10% of total sales. He also learned that they received incentives regardless of whether treatment was on-label or off-label.

Dr Rost then decided to track every new patient to determine exactly how many new anti-aging patients were signed on each month. Based on high number in his analysis, Pharmacia agreed to change the incentive payment plan and exclude payments for any patients from physicians known to engage in off-labeling prescribing.

Later in February 2002, Dr Rost learned that Pharmacia had numerous contracts to sell Genotropin directly to doctors specializing in the anti-aging field, as well as contracts with wholesalers who specialized in servicing the off-label Genotropin market.

Around this same time, he decided to delve deeper into the marketing practices and it soon became clear that his subordinates knew that off-label marketing was illegal, and they were not forthcoming. For instance, the payments to physicians were not revealed until a manager left the company and doctors started to call and ask about their payments.

Dr Rost first approached Pharmacia management in the fall of 2001, and in February 2002, the company started an internal investigation. In March, the firm's Associate General Counsel informed Dr Rost that she had found that marketing director, Carl Worrell, had engaged in gross misconduct relating to the off-label promotion and that he was not forthcoming during the investigation. Based on their concerns, a decision was made to terminate Worrell's employment in April 2002.

After he left, Dr Rost discovered documents that showed that Pharmacia had been actively engaged in the off-label marketing since at least 2000. In one example, Dr William Abelove, an anti-aging doctor at a longevity center, had sent a letter to Pharmacia CEO, Fred Hassan, in 2000, and wanted to purchase Genotropin at a discount rate. Mr Hassan forwarded the letter to the marketing departments and by May 1, 2000, Worrell had signed a consulting contract with Dr Abelove to assist in the promotion of Genotropin.

In effort to ensure that the off-label promotion was terminated, Dr Rost sent an email to the associate director of marketing and her product managers and explained his concerns about continued payments and consultancy agreements, and instructed them not to approve any additional payments without seeing him first.

In May 2002, Pharmacia cancelled contracts that gave rebates to anti-aging doctors and wholesalers who supplied anti-aging clinics but continued to sell to these doctors and wholesalers.

The same month, Dr Rost received a short debriefing of the internal legal review and was assured that appropriate corrective action had been taken.

In July 2002, Pfizer announced the friendly take-over of Pharmacia. With this merger, it became clear to Mr Rost that he would have to address his concerns with Pfizer's management team. To prepare, Dr Rost started to research the legal statutes related to growth hormones and the False Claims Act, and other laws Pharmacia may have violated.

During the time period of July through September 2002, Dr Rost continued to receive reports about discoveries of kick-backs paid to doctors.

On October 28, 2002, Mr Rost and several marketing directors participated in a meeting with Pfizer that included employees from Pfizer's medical, marketing, regulatory and legal department, as well as Judith Tytel, Pharmacia's Senior Corporate Counsel.

The meeting was intended to be an opportunity for Pharmacia employees to provide information to their Pfizer counterparts. At the meeting Dr Rost and his team disclosed that Pharmacia was sponsoring all-expense paid junkets for physicians and that Pharmacia maintained a data base, known as the Bridge Program, that contained detailed information regarding the 30,000 patients who received Genotropin prescriptions.

They also explained that payments were being made to US doctors and discussed how the Bridge Program supplied new patients with free Genotropin for several months while the company assisted in seeking reimbursement.

Following the meeting, several Pfizer executives asked for more information and on November 8, 2002, Dr Rost and several directors, and Associate General Counsel, met with Pfizer representatives and lawyers and reviewed the Bridge Program.

During this time, Dr Rost continued to discuss his concerns with executives and lawyers at Pharmacia and believed that the company was concerned about the potential legal exposure related to the off-label sale of Genotropin.

In response to continued reports indicating illegal activities, Dr Rost repeatedly tried to implement corrective measures. However, he learned that the corporate culture at Pharmacia made it impossible to eliminate illegal conduct because of the financial incentives that drove sales reps to continue it.

Through further investigation, Dr Rost learned that the illegal activities started long before he arrived, and as far back as 1997. He came to conclude that at times, company officers condoned the activities despite knowing that they were illegal.

On April 16, 2003, the merger between Pfizer and Pharmacia was final. Pharmacia directors and officers realized enormous financial benefits. CEO Fred Hassan, received a $9.9 million severance package, 9 other directors received packages worth, in the aggregate, $31.6 million, and company directors were able to obtain early vesting of approximately 6.7 million in stock options.

Pharmacia's sales were also a shot in the arm to Pfizer. According to Pfizer's 2003 Annual Report: "Revenues increased 40% to $45,188 million in 2003 ... Revenue increases in 2003 were primarily due to the inclusion of Pharmacia products," it said.

The off-label sales paid off extremely well. Between 1997 and 2003, Genotropin generated more than $550 million in sales in the US alone and the company's database shows that about 60% of adult sales, and 25% to 30% of pediatric sales, were for off-label use.

On May 22, 2003, Dr Rost became aware of the pervasive nature of ongoing illegal activity when he met with a manager of the Bridge Program and was shown documents that confirmed that a massive number of patients were listed with an off-label diagnosis.

In fact, 25% to 30% of the pediatric prescriptions were for off-label use. Dr Rost understood that pediatric patients received significant funding from Medicaid and other government programs.

He was alarmed at the extent of pediatric use - a staggering number, he says, not only due to the medial implications to children but also because it demonstrated that a great percentage of the cost was reimbursed by Medicaid or other governmental programs.

Disturbed by these findings, he decided to file a lawsuit and with Attorney Erika Kelton, and another Phillips & Cohen attorney, started drafting a complaint.

On June 3, 2003, Ms Kelton, informed an assistant US Attorney that Dr Rost would be filing a qui tam action alleging fraud relating to the off-label marketing of Genotropin and delivered a copy of the complaint to the US Attorney's Office on June 4, 2003.

In the Complaint, Dr Rost provides details of a complex scheme including the nature of the fraud - where it occurred, how it occurred, when it occurred and the persons responsible for its commission. The following is a summary of the complaint's specific factual allegations:

Approximately 60% of adult sales and 25% of its pediatric sales were for off-label uses.

Pharmacia bribed 16 named distributors to promote off-label usage of Genotropin.

Under the pretext of participating in a "study," Pharmacia paid doctors $200 for every patient they prescribed to, including off-label subscriptions, and paid doctors an additional $200 for every year that such patients continued to use Genotropin.

Pharmacia sponsored junkets for physicians and their spouses and awarded substantial "honoraria" as inducements/kickbacks to promote the off-label usage of Genotropin.

Pharmacia provided discounts to doctors working exclusively in the anti-aging area, knowing that they would sell Genotropin off-label for anti-aging treatment and least 18 named doctors signed contracts for such price discounts.

Through contracts and "retainer" agreements, Pharmacia hired persons and entities, some named in the Complaint, to promote off-label use of Genotropin and such "consultants" provided no other services.

The false claims were submitted from 1997 to June 5, 2003 across the US and included false claims and statements made by dozens of named distributors and doctors, and Pfizer's Bridge Program lists the patients for which the false claims were submitted.

But come to find out, off-label marketing seems to habitual with Pfizer. At the same time that Dr Rost reported the illegal activities, Pfizer was fighting off a whistleblower lawsuit arising out of the off-label marketing of the drug Neurontin, by another company acquired through a merger, in promoting the drug for pain control and Attention Deficit Disorder.

In the end, Pfizer settled the lawsuit and a related criminal case for $430 million.

In a motion filed in attempt to dismiss Dr Rost's lawsuit, Pfizer states: "After investigating for more than two years, the Justice Department recently declined to intervene in this qui tam complaint." The inference being that the DOJ does not consider this to be a serious case.

However, a decision by the DOJ not to intervene means nothing. According to a study by the Government Accounting Office, the DOJ has declined to intervene in 72% of all qui tam actions initiated between 1987 and 2005.

A review of Pfizer regulatory filings reveals an ongoing affair with the DOJ. In its Form 10-K for 2003, filed with the SEC on March 10, 2004, Pfizer disclosed the following:

"The company recently was notified that the US Department of Justice is conducting investigations relating to the marketing and sale of Genotropin and Bextra, as well as certain managed care payments."

In its Form 10-K for 2004, filed with the SEC on February 29, 2005, Pfizer disclosed that: "In late 2003, we received a request for information and documents from the US Department of Justice concerning the marketing of Genotropin as well as certain managed care payments."

Nine months later, in a Form 10-Q filed on November 9, 2005, Pfizer revealed that: "The U.S. Department of Justice has informed us that it is investigating Pharmacia's former contractual relationship with a health care intermediary."

And make no mistake, Pfizer's legal troubles are far from over. According to Dr Rost's attorney, Mark Labaton, "a grand jury in Boston is investigating the illegal promotion and marketing of Genotropin based on an investigation conducted by the US Attorney's office."

In addition according to news reports, the US Attorney in the Eastern District of New York also has an active criminal investigation involving Pfizer's off-label promotion of Lipitor, he says.

Mark Labaton, is a partner at the firm Kreindler & Kreindler, LLP, with offices in New York and LA. The firm handles cases including securities and consumer class actions, and FCA whistleblower, antitrust, and consumer cases.

His resume includes 7 years as an Assistant US Attorney for the Central District of California, where he prosecuted white-collar fraud cases, including whistleblower actions.

Pfizer is the largest pharmaceutical company in the world, and according to Mr Labaton, "Like most large pharmaceutical companies, it is financially and politically powerful."

"Litigating against such companies is not for the faint-hearted," he warns.

"But whistleblower lawyers are inspired by their clients," Mr Labaton says. "Warts and all, these clients are a strong, determined, and courageous lot."

He claims that "off-label promotion of drugs is a form of quackery that victimizes vulnerable individuals who take these drugs with serious and dangerous side effects for purposes never intended and approved by the FDA."

"That's exactly what happened in our case," he notes.

“Pharmacia and its successor company, Pfizer,” Mr Labaton says, “generated hundreds of millions in revenue by peddling Genotropin to spurt growth in short children and as an anti-aging drug for adults seeking eternal youth.”

“Genotropin was never intended to make short kids tall and their grandparents young,” he said.

In some whistleblower cases, he says, there is one victim -- “the taxpayer who foots the bill for the fraud.”

It costs law firms a fortune to go up against the giant drug makers. In the Pfizer Neurontin lawsuit, “the civil/whistleblower plaintiffs in that case took more than 20 depositions and obtained thousands of pages of documents in discovery,” Mr Labaton reports.

But he says he‘s not complaining. “The costs to us as lawyers and to our firms can be substantial,” he says, “but these costs pale when compared to what whistleblowers, like Dr. Rost, have to endure.”

“So far,” he points out, “Pfizer has used its muscle to reactively and vigorously oppose Dr. Rost and to make his life tough.”

Dr Rost is indeed being hit from all sides.

On December 30, 2005, he was officially nominated for the "Whiny Whistleblower of the Year" award by a Pharma backed front group and won. In truth, whether he knows it or not, it is a top honor, when considering that he competed against two of the nation's most beloved whistleblowers, Dr David Graham of Vioxx fame from the FDA, and Dr Eric Topol, of the Cleveland Clinic.

Dr Rost's award was announced by Gilbert Ross, MD, who bills himself as a doctor and Executive and Medical Director of the American Council on Science and Health.

That in itself is amazing being that Doctor Ross’ own achievement of ripping off Medicaid to the tune of $8 million was only given the recognition that it deserved last fall.

"Ross actually had to abandon medicine on July 24, 1995, when his license to practice as a physician in New York was revoked by the unanimous vote of a state administrative review board for professional misconduct," according to the November/December issue of Mother Jones Magazine.

"Instead of tending to patients," Jones reports, "Ross spent all of 1996 at a federal prison camp in Schuylkill, Pennsylvania, having being sentenced to 46 months in prison for his participation in a scheme that ultimately defrauded New York's Medicaid program of approximately $8 million.”

For its part, the American Council on Science and Health stopped disclosing its corporate donors in the early 1990s, according to Integrity in Science on its web site at http://www.cspinet.org/integrity/nonprofits/american_council_on_science_and_health.html

However, the companies noted as contributors in ACSH’s 1991 annual report and ACSH’s list of Corporate Donors for 1997 include: Pfizer, Abbott Laboratories, American Cyanamid, Bristol-Myers Squibb, Ciba-Geigy, Eli Lilly, Hoffman-La Roche, Johnson & Johnson, Rhone-Poulenc, Sandoz, Searle, Syntex, Warner-Lambert, Upjohn, and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association.

For too many years, off-label marketing offenses resulted in nothing more than a slap on the wrist to drug makers, if that.

The FDA regulated the industry and when it found "off-label" marketing, the agency sent the company a warning letter. Sometimes companies were required to sign a consent degree, but they did not face fines.

In 1991, all that changed. Pharmaceutical giant Genentech started the False Claims ball rolling when the company was caught selling another growth hormone, Protropin, off-label by influencing doctors to prescribe it to children who did not suffer from hormone deficiency.

Genentech was prosecuted under the FCA and paid $50 million to settle the case.

Since then, the government has used the FCA in 15 cases that were settled out of court, but according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a non-profit advocacy group that assists whistleblowers, 150 more cases are currently pending.

The FCA has become effective in large part due to the reward for whistleblowers who can receive between 15% and 30% of the amount recovered in the lawsuit with the average award being $120,000, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud.

In most cases, off-label marketing is usually not a jailable offense; but it is with Genotropin.

“Growth hormone is different from any other drug,” Dr Rost explains, “distributing the drug for off-label purposes is a crime.”

“Not even a doctor is allowed to prescribe growth hormone for off-label use,” he says.

The Controlled Substances Act states in part: “...whoever knowingly distributes, or possesses with intent to distribute, human growth hormone for any use in humans other than the treatment of a disease or other recognized medical condition, where such use has been authorized by the Secretary of Health and Human Services ... and pursuant to the order of a physician, is guilty of an offense punishable by not more than 5 years in prison.

“None of us who became employed by Pharmacia asked to be put into an incriminating situation,” Dr Rost points out.

The criminal penalties were a result of the 1988 and 1990 amendments to the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, that made off-label sale of human growth hormone to treat age-associated illnesses illegal, according to a report in the October 26, 2005 Journal of the American Medical Association.

In the JAMA article, authors Dr Thomas Perls, director of the New England Centenarian Study at Boston Medical Center; Dr Neal Reisman, clinical professor of plastic surgery at Baylor College of Medicine, who is also an attorney; and S. Jay Olshansky, professor of epidemiology at the University of Illinois at Chicago School of Public Health discuss the little known law.

According to the article, human growth hormone can be legally prescribed for only 3 conditions: HGH deficiency-related syndromes that cause short stature in children, adult deficiency due to rare pituitary tumors and their treatment, and muscle-wasting disease associated with HIV/AIDS.

According to Dr Olshansky, "off-label use for many drugs is a normal and accepted practice in medicine, but that is not true for growth hormone. According to laws instituted by Congress more than 10 years ago, HGH can only be distributed for indications specifically authorized by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, and aging and its related disorders are not among them.”

“The use of HGH as an alleged anti-aging intervention is a major public health concern not just because it is illegal,” Dr Olshansky explains, “but also because its provision for anti-aging is not supported by science and it is potentially harmful."

People are spending a fortune on HGH under the belief that it reverses aging. "On the contrary, responsibly conducted and peer-reviewed science indicates that HGH could in fact accelerate aging and shorten lifespan,” according to Dr Perls.

“It is associated with very high rates of serious adverse effects,” he advised, “and long-term use could increase one's risk of cancer."

In 2004, sales of HGH totaled $622 million (nearly 213,000 prescriptions) not including sales on anti-aging Web sites. "These data suggest that a very large proportion of HGH sales are for illegal uses," Dr Perls noted.

Logically, the vast majority of prescriptions should be for children, but according to the study, 74% of prescriptions in 2004 were for people 20 and older, and 44% were for people between the age of 40 and 59.

Bush to nominate Gorsuch to Denver appeals court

M.E. Sprengelmeyer, Rocky Mountain News

President Bush is expected to nominate attorney and legal scholar Neil Gorsuch to take a seat on the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver, Sen. Wayne Allard announced late Tuesday.

Gorsuch, who has a long paper trail of writings against issues such as euthanasia and judicial activism, currently serves in the U.S. Department of Justice as a principal deputy to the associate attorney general.

A Denver native, he comes from a family of well-known Colorado conservatives, including his late mother, Anne Gorsuch Burford, who was former President Reagan's Environmental Protection Agency director until she resigned in 1983 amid a mismanagement scandal.

Allard, a Republican, praised Neil Gorsuch's legal credentials. Gorsuch earned a law degree from Harvard University and later a doctorate in legal philosophy from the University of Oxford. He has been a clerk to two U.S. Supreme Court justices, fellow Coloradan Byron White and current Associate Justice Anthony Kennedy.

"He reflects a deep understanding of the law," Allard said. "One of the most assuring things to me is he does not believe in an activist court. You stick with the intent of the legislation."

His writings include the book The Future of Assisted\l "l" Suicide\l "l" and Euthanasia, which, according to one review, presents arguments on both sides but concludes with "the idea that human life is intrinsically valuable and that intentional killing is always wrong."

In an article titled Liberals 'n' Lawsuits for National Review Online, he quotes Washington Post columnist David von Drehle and skewers Democrats who, he argues, have wrongly pushed for courts to decide issues they can't settle in the legislative arena.

"There's no doubt that constitutional lawsuits have secured critical civil-right victories, with the desegregation cases culminating in Brown v. Board of Education topping the list," Gorsuch writes.

"But rather than use the judiciary for extraordinary cases, von Drehle recognizes that American liberals have become addicted to the courtroom, relying on judges and lawyers rather than elected leaders and the ballot box, as the primary means of effecting their agenda on everything from gay marriage to assisted\l "l" suicide\l "l" to the use of vouchers for private-school education."

Gorsuch would need to go through confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee and to win a confirmation vote in the full Senate, where partisan fighting has slowed or even halted some contentious nominations in the past.

Drew Nannis, spokesman for Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said, "the senator looks forward to the hearings and looks forward to the process that is going to come forth."

Two patent rulings raise issues for biotechs, generics

May 10, 2006

By: Beth Herskovits

Two court decisions in the past two weeks set new bounds in the murky territory of patent infringement.

A jury last week found that Eli Lilly owes $65 million in back royalties to Ariad Pharmaceuticals for infringing on a patent that covers the biological pathway known as NF-Kappa B. Lilly was also ordered to pay a 2.3 percent royalty on future sales of osteoporosis drug Evista and sepsis drug Xigris, which act on the NF-Kappa B pathway.

The suit raised questions about the scope of patents covering naturally-occurring phenomena in the body.

Ariad has argued that its patent -- which it licenses from Harvard University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the Whitehead Institute -- covers all methods of treating diseases through regulating NF-Kappa B.

Lilly has argued that the patent is "unenforceable" and demonstrates "improper coverage of natural processes." The company issued a statement saying that it will appeal the decision.

The US Patent and Trademark Office is currently examining the patent. Neither company could immediately be reached for comment.

Bradford Duft, a partner at law firm Duane Morris, which was not involved in the case, noted that the suit raises common issues in the area of biotech law.

"These cases all depend on individual patents," he said. "Just about everything in biotechnology involves some aspect of nature."

Separately, Teva Pharmaceuticals won its suit against FDA and received 180 days of marketing exclusivity for a generic version of Merck's cholesterol drug Zocor.

Teva had challenged Merck's patent under Paragraph IV of the Hatch-Waxman Act, a provision of which provides marketing exclusivity to generic companies that can successfully prove that a brand's patent is invalid.

But when Merck decided not to fight Teva, FDA determined that the patent was not in dispute and denied marketing exclusivity for Teva?s generic product.

Gregory Glass, principal of the consulting firm Gregory Glass Associates, noted that the case clarifies what happens when a generic company challenges a patent and the brand name company does not fight the challenge.

In the past, FDA has required generic companies to win a lawsuit in order to get marketing exclusivity. "That rule's gone now," Glass said. "[This case] provides more certainty in circumstances where the brand choose not to sue the generic company."

He estimated that brand name companies decline to sue the generic company in about 15% of patent challenges.

Pledge atheist' set to challenge 'In God We Trust'

The California atheist known for his legal challenge against the Pledge of Allegiance is in court arguing the national motto "In God We Trust" is unconstitutional.

Michael Newdow, who filed a 162-page complaint against the president and Congress, will argue his case in federal district court in Sacramento May 19.

The national public-interest Thomas More Law Center has filed a brief supporting the United States government's motion to dismiss the suit.

The Law Center argues, "This nation and its form of government were founded upon an essential idea: Individuals have God-given rights that the government may neither bestow nor deny."

Richard Thompson, the center's chief counsel, says Newdow's "attempt to eliminate the mere acknowledgement of our religious heritage by our National Motto has no basis in constitutional law." "Even the Supreme Court, in past decisions, has understood there is an unbroken history of official invocations of Divine guidance beginning with our founding fathers and continuing to our present day leaders," Thompson said.

Discussing the case last November, Newdow told KWTV in Oklahoma City, "The key principle is that we're supposed to treat everybody equally especially in terms of religious belief."

"Clearly it's not treating atheists equal with people who believe in God when you say 'In God We Trust' or we are a 'nation under God,'" he insisted.

"People say, 'Are you an atheist activist?' And I'm not," he continued. "I couldn't care less what anyone believes. I just care that our government treats everybody equally."

Last September, in Newdow's second challenge against the Pledge of Allegiance, a federal judge in Sacramento ruled the reciting of the pledge in public schools is unconstitutional.

The pledge's reference to one nation "under God" violates school children's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God," said U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton.

Karlton granted legal standing to two families represented by Newdow, who lost his previous battle before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The judge, nominated to his seat by President Carter in 1979, said he was bound by the precedent of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' in 2002, which favored Newdow.

In 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected Newdow's case 8-0 because he did not have legal standing to represent his daughter, who is under sole custody of her mother.

In January 2005, however, Newdow filed a complaint in federal court in Sacramento with eight new co-plaintiffs, seeking to remove "under God" from the Pledge of Allegiance on the grounds it violates the so-called "separation of church and state."

Klein Gives Powerful "No Child" Defense

City Schools Chancellor Joel Klein gave an impassioned defense of the federal No Child Left Behind law yesterday, saying schools need more testing and accountability - not less - to bolster performance and close the achievement gap.

And Klein stressed that the city's own promotion policies and school measures go well beyond what the NCLB requires.

The NCLB - approved by Congress and signed into law by President Bush in 2001 - requires standardized testing in schools and a breakdown in scores of students by race, ethnicity and disability.

"It is incredibly valuable because it recognizes that the achievement gap - the gap that separates our African-American and Latino students from their white and Asian peers - is the chief problem in American schooling," Klein said during a speech before the Aspen Institute's Commission on NCLB in West Hartford, Conn.

Klein testified right after Connecticut officials, who filed suit against the U.S. Education Department, claiming the federal law is too intrusive and requires too many tests. Klein disagreed.

"When they passed NCLB, our national leaders finally took responsibility for the fact that white and Asian students are performing four years ahead of African-American and Latino students in high school. Four years. And this law finally put muscle behind the attempt to close that gap," Klein said.

Klein also flunked his anti-testing critics, who claim NCLB and the Bloomberg administration's policy curbing social promotion have turned schools into testing mills.

He said NCLB - like most laws - is not perfect. But he described as "fundamental" the law's focus on holding educators responsible for teaching all students.

"I've never met a law that couldn't improve. But to criticize the heart of No Child Left Behind is to refuse to take responsibility for the achievement gap - the most serious civil-rights, social and economic crisis facing America today," Klein said.

He added that schools should be testing students "routinely," as long as the exams are based on solid standards.

"The anti-testing advocates would have you believe that people like me want our students to run through daily drills on how to properly fill in bubbles with No. 2 pencils. That couldn't be further from the truth," the chancellor said.

"Our teachers should teach students the skills and ideas they must master in order to pass their tests. That's teaching to the test," he said.

Klein also emphasized the city's program has carrots to go along with the sticks, by giving principals more power over curriculum, budgeting and hiring decisions in exchange for greater accountability.

The chancellor said the city Education Department also will begin using data more precisely than NCLB requires to track student performance over a number of years - called the "value-added" approach.

Press Release: CREW Sues Secret Service Over Abramoff-Related Visitor Records, Secret Service Refuses to Hand Over Docs to Ethics Org

WASHINGTON, May 9 /U.S. Newswire/ — Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) has sued the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) today for its failure to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request on documents detailing Abramoff-related visits to the White House, the executive office buildings and the Vice President's house.

On Feb. 2, CREW sent a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request to the Secret Service, a component of the Department of Homeland Security, asking for records relating to any visit that Jack Abramoff, Michael Scanlon, Neil Volz, Tony Rudy, Shawn Vassell, Kevin Ring, Edwin Buckham and Patrick Pizzella made between Jan. 1, 2001 and Feb. 2, 2006.

CREW has not received any documents from DHS regarding the FOIA request.

"We are trying to discover the extent of the ties between Abramoff and his colleagues and the Bush administration. Unfortunately -- as has become commonplace -- the administration is stonewalling," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of CREW. "The American people deserve to know the truth about Abramoff's influence with the Bush administration, something the administration is clearly trying to hide."

The CREW FOIA and suit against DHS are available at http://www.citizensforethics.org.

Registration for the 2006 ACS National Convention is now available. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.qy5y6ubab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.acslaw.org%2Fconvention>

Overview
In law and policy news this week:

* Fourth Circuit judge Michael Luttig resigned his seat on the bench in favor of joining the private sector;

* Reports emerged of a warrantless domestic surveillance program far more extensive than any previously disclosed;

* Air Force General Michael Hayden was nominated to head the CIA;

* The U.N. Committee on Torture investigated U.S. interrogation practices to assess U.S. compliance with the 1984 Convention Against Torture;

* The U.S. announced that it will ban "waterboarding," a controversial interrogation tactic involving creating the impression of drowning, as President Bush spoke for the first time of closing the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay;

* The nomination of White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit was approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, as Senate leaders announced plans to bring a vote before by the full Senate before Memorial Day;

* Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle and Fifth Circuit Nominee Michael Wallace encountered new obstacles, as Boyle's alleged ethical violations were declared a "disqualifier" by Senator Arlen Specter (R- PA) and Wallace received a rare unanimous "unqualified" rating from the ABA;

* President Bush nominated Justice Department official Neil Gorsuch to the Tenth Circuit;

* The Senate rejected a proposed cap on jury awards in medical malpractice suits;

* A corruption trial began involving four Chicago city officials, which observers said may ultimately implicate Mayor Richard Daley;

* The Justice Department found that "justice is simply unavailable" in New Orleans due to the decimation of the public defender's office;

* Two reporters at The San Francisco Chronicle received subpoenas from federal prosecutors relating to reports of steroid use among baseball players that quoted verbatim from secret grand jury proceedings; and

* The Ninth Circuit upheld a Major League Baseball program granting pension benefits to former players in the Negro Leagues, rejected a "reverse discrimination" challenge by white players.

ACS Member Craig Gurian Releases Analysis of Local Human Rights Law ACS member Craig Gurian, Executive Director of the Anti-Discrimination Center of Metro New York and Scholar-in-Residence at Fordham Law School's Stein Center for Law and Ethics, has written a comprehensive analysis of the purposes and intended consequences of New York City's recently passed Local Civil Rights Restoration Act. The article, A Return to Eyes on the Prize: Litigating Under the Restored New York City Human Rights Law, 33 Fordham Urb. L.J. 255 (2006), argues that The Restoration Act, in addition to specific right- enhancing provisions in areas like retaliation, domestic partner protection, and catalyst case fees, protects against the federal rollback of civil rights by rejecting the premise that the City Human Rights Law is nothing more than a carbon copy of its state and federal counterparts, and by reaffirming that the purpose and sweep of the local law is uniquely broad and remedial.

Conservatives Promote Renewed Focus on Judicial Nominations Conservative leaders met with White House Counsel Harriet Miers this Monday <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.7gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.humaneventsonline.com%2Fblog-detail.php%3Fid%3D14649> to seek a renewed emphasis on judicial nominees. The move may reflect a political calculus. According to Senator John Thune (R-SD), "A good fight on judges does nothing but energize our base. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.6gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F08%2Fwashington%2F08judges.html> Right now our folks are feeling a little flat. They need a reason to get engaged, and fights over judges will do that." Thune was echoed by Senator John Cornyn (R-TX), who said, "this is excellent timing. From a political standpoint, when we talk about judges, we win." Rove told the group that the White House will soon send more than twenty nominations to the Senate for confirmation <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.5gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.thehill.com%2Fthehill%2Fexport%2FTheHill%2FNews%2FFrontpage%2F050906%2Fnews4.html> .

D.C. Circuit Nominee Brett Kavanaugh Proceeds to Full Senate Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10-8 along party lines to approve <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.4gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.foxnews.com%2Fstory%2F0%2C2933%2C195132%2C00.html> the nomination of White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit. Kavanaugh faced a rare second hearing by the committee on Tuesday, at which he denied any involvement <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ahfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.sfgate.com%2Fcgi-bin%2Farticle.cgi%3Ffile%3D%2Fchronicle%2Farchive%2F2006%2F05%2F10%2FMNGAQIOMEC1.DTL> in formulating controversial policies on domestic surveillance and torture while serving in the White House. The influential bipartisan "Gang of 14" Senators met on Wednesday <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.bhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.cnn.com%2F2006%2FPOLITICS%2F05%2F10%2Fsenate.judges%2F> to discuss whether Kavanaugh raised "extraordinary circumstances" of the sort required to justify a filibuster under their prior agreement; Senator Lindsay Grahan (R-SC) suggested that "some people [among the Gang of 14] have not yet made the judgment," adding that "there's a generally good feeling about him." Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-TN) has vowed that the full Senate will vote on Kavanaugh's nomination before Memorial Day.

Fourth Circuit Nominee Terrence Boyle FAces Mounting Opposition Last week, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-NV) promised to filibuster <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.chfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F08%2Fwashington%2F08judges.html%3Fex%3D1304740800%26en%3D8f52317023263c2d%26ei%3D5090%26partner%3Drssuserland%26emc%3Drss> the Fourth Circuit nomination of Terrence Boyle, who has been criticized for failing to recuse himself from cases in which he faced financial conflicts of interest, as well as being reversed with unusually high frequency. This Sunday, Senator Joe Biden (D-DE) announced that he is "unalterably opposed to Boyle," <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.dhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.foxnews.com%2Fstory%2F0%2C2933%2C194590%2C00.html> and indicated his consideration of a filibuster. Judiciary chair Arlen Specter (R-PA) argued that Boyle does not raise "extraordinary circumstances," since failing to recuse himself in the face of financial conflicts would be a per se "disqualifier" for confirmation to a higher court.

Fifth Circuit Nominee Michael Wallace Receives "Not Qualified" Rating from ABA For the first time in nearly 25 years, the American Bar Association has issued a rare "not qualified" rating for a judicial nominee <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ehfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.washingtonpost.com%2Fwp-dyn%2Fcontent%2Farticle%2F2006%2F05%2F10%2FAR2006051002101.html> , declaring Michael Wallace unfit for his nomination to the Fifth Circuit. The unanimous decision <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.5lj9rubab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.abanet.org%2Fscfedjud%2Fratings109.pdf> by the ABA's 15-member special judicial nominations did not explain its rationale. While Ralph G. Neas of People for the American Way argued that "[t]he president should immediately withdraw his nomination," White House spokeswoman Erin E. Healy said that "We disagree with the ABA and reject their rating . . . . Mike Wallace . . . . will make an excellent addition to the bench. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.fhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F11%2Fwashington%2F11aba.html%3F_r%3D1%26oref%3Dslogin> " Wallace, who currently practices in Jackson, Mississippi, was a law clerk for then- Associate Justice William Rehnquist and worked on numerous controversial issues as an aide to Senator Trent Lott (R-MS).

Justice Department Official Neil Gorsuch Nominated to 10th Circuit President Bush nominated Neil Gorsuch to the 10th Circuit <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ghfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.denverpost.com%2Fnews%2Fci_3803780> today to fill the seat of Judge David Ebel, who is taking senior status. Gorsuch currently serves the Bush Administration <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ghfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.denverpost.com%2Fnews%2Fci_3803780> in the Justice Department, and before obtaining a doctorate in legal philosophy from Oxford, previously clerked for Justices Byron White and Anthony Kennedy after graduating from Harvard Law School. Gorsuch has met with Senator Wayne Allard (R-CO), who described him as "a top-flight nominee for the appellate bench . . . . with extensive court experience and the appropriate judicial temperament. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ghfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.denverpost.com%2Fnews%2Fci_3803780> " He also predicted that Gorsuch will be confirmed by the Senate if he successfully avoids being depicted as an "activist judge." Gorsuch was described in 1987 as a ringleader among "seven or eight young men who are reinventing conservatism" <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.hhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.findarticles.com%2Fp%2Farticles%2Fmi_m1282%2Fis_v39%2Fai_4665104> as undergraduates at Columbia University, and his prior writings include "Liberals n' Lawsuits, <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ihfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nationalreview.com%2Fcomment%2Fgorsuch200502070742.asp> " a 2005 article in the National Review arguing that liberals' "addiction to the courtroom as the place to debate social policy is bad for the country and bad for the judiciary."

NSA Collecting Phone Records of Tens of Millions of Americans
USA Today reported today that the NSA has amassed records on the phone calls of tens of millions of Americans <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.nhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.usatoday.com%2Fnews%2Fwashington%2F2006-05-10-nsa_x.htm> , using information voluntarily provided by a number of private telecommunications companies. An anonymous informant said the program has created "the largest database ever assembled in the world," and ultimately aims "to create a database of every call ever made" within the nation's borders. USA Today noted that the program is "far more expansive than what the White House has acknowledged," noting that the administration's public defense of the program revealed by The New York Times last December has relied heavily upon the notion that warrantless surveillance is limited to international calls. In addition to monitoring domestic calls, the program disclosed by USA Today reportedly collects records indiscriminately, without regard to suspicion of terrorist activity, in order to identify potential patterns. President Bush asserted this morning that all surveillance activities are "within the law," although former NSA director Bobby Ray Inman said on Monday that even the previously known "activity is not authorized. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ohfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.wired.com%2Fnews%2Ftechnology%2F0%2C70855-0.html> " Senator Arlen Spectre (R-PA) promised to contact participating phone companies to learn "what we can't find out from the Department of Justice or other administration officials," as Senator Dianne Feinstein (D-CA) of the Senate Intelligence Committee predicted that "we are on our way to a major Constitutional confrontation on the Fourth Amendment guarantees over unreasonable search and seizure. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.phfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F11%2Fwashington%2F11cnd-phone.html%3Fhp%26ex%3D1147406400%26en%3D9ebc2132b83f0bfd%26ei%3D5094%26partner%3Dhomepage> "

Within hours of the nomination's announcement, officials also announced further changes at the CIA's top ranks, including the return of longtime CIA veterans who left after disputes with Goss. Other critics have focused on Hayden's role in creating the controversial warrantless surveillance program <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.shfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p= http%3A%2F%2Fwww.sfgate.com%2Fcgi-bin%2Farticle.cgi%3Ffile%3D%2Fchronicle%2Farchive%2F2006 %2F05%2F10%2FEDGQHIOURG1.DTL> while at the National Security Agency (NSA). Upcoming hearings on the nomination will likely include extensive questioning on the NSA wiretapping program disclosed last December, which may be the only opportunity to delve deeply into it since the Justice Department abruptly ended an inquiry into the eavesdropping program <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.thfinvb ab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.msnbc.msn.com%2Fid%2F12727867%2F> after the NSA refused to grant investigators security clearance. U.N. Committee Against Torture Examines Abuse of Detainees in U.S. Prisons U.S. interrogation practices were scrutinized this week at the U.N. John B. Bellinger III, a State Department legal adviser, argued that "U.S. officials from all government agencies are prohibited from engaging in torture at all times and in all places," whereas Norwegian expert Nora Sveaass said the committee had seen official U.S. documents allowing interrogation techniques widely regarded as torture. The panel rejected arguments for secrecy in discussing intelligence matters, insisting that the U.S. has a "duty to answer" questions about a number of issues <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.whfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http% 3A%2F%2Fwww.wcsh6.com%2Fhome%2Farticle.asp%3Fid%3D34901> , such as prisoner interrogations at Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo, secret CIA prisons and extraordinary rendition. In addition to alleged abuses at overseas prisons, the U.N. committee also heard reports of torture in Chicago jails, where interrogation practices have reportedly included placing guns in prisoners' mouths <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.xhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.pacifica.org% 2Fprograms%2Fdn%2F060509.html> , bags over their heads, and inflicting electric shocks to their genitals. U.S. Says it Will Ban Water-Boarding as Bush Speaks of Closing Guantanamo The State Department's legal adviser told the U.N. Committee Against Torture on Monday that the U.S. Army will prohibit "waterboarding," the practice of submerging a prisoner's head in water to simulate drowning <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.9hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.realcities.co m%2Fmld%2Fkrwashington%2Fnews%2Fworld%2F14531370.htm%3Fsource%3Drss%26channel%3D krwashington_world> , when it issues a new interrogation manual. The adviser emphasized that by banning the practice, the U.S. was not admitting to having used it in the past, but Jamil Dakwar of the ACLU noted that its specific mention "raises questions." Meanwhile, The Los Angeles Times reported today that the Pentagon has been forced to delay the release of its updated Field Manual <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.8hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes. com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-manual11may11%2C0%2C2174549.story%3Fcoll%3D la-home-headlines> because of congressional opposition to provisions that some argued would violate the torture ban passed by Congress last year. Speaking in Germany, President Bush said on Sunday that he "would like to close the camp [at Guantanamo Bay] and put the prisoners on trial," <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.7hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F08%2Fwashington%2F08bush.html> and that he is awaiting a Supreme Court ruling as to whether their prosecution must proceed in civilian courts, rather than through ad hoc military commissions.

Moussaoui Moves in Vain to Rescind his Guilty Plea
Late last week, convicted 9-11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui filed a motion saying that his confession about being involved in the plot "was a complete frabrication" <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.6hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2Faponline%2Fus%2Fwire-mous.html%3Fhp%26ex%3D1147147200%26en%3D57ebf94e99896f8e%26ei%3D5094%26partner%3Dhomepage> and that he wanted to withdraw his guilty plea. He wrote that spending over four years in solitary confinement had "made me hostile toward everyone and I began taking extreme positions <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.4hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-moussa9may09%2C1%2C4997187.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-headlines-nation> to fight the system . . . . I now see that I can receive a fair trial even with Americans as jurors and that I can have the opportunity to prove that I . . . was not a member of the plot." U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema rejected Moussaoui's motion, noting that federal law prevents a defendant from withdrawing a plea after sentencing. Moussaoui's lawyers explained that they filed the motion notwithstanding that rule because of their "problematic relationship with Moussaoui."

Senate Rejects Caps on Malpractice Suits
On Monday, the Senate rejected an effort to cap jury awards for pain & suffering in medical malpractice cases <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.jifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F09%2Fwashington%2F09malpractice.html> . It was the fourth time in three years that such measures - one of which related to healthcare providers generally, and the other specifically to obstetrician-gynecologists - failed to attain passage. The L.A. Times noted that "Monday's votes came as the broader debate over malpractice appears to be shifting away from limits on jury awards <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.kifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-medmal9may09%2C1%2C2717190.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-headlines-nation> to . . . alternatives to litigation." President Bush said, "It is time for the Senate to put the needs of the American people ahead of the interests of trial lawyers," while Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) noted that "[t]he explanation for . . . [malpractice insurance] premium spikes can be found not in legislative halls or courtrooms, but in the boardrooms" of insurance companies.

Bush Acknowledges Anxieties Over Prescription Drug Program; Reid Calls to Extend Deadline In the face of a looming May 15 deadline for joining the government's prescription drug program, President Bush went to Florida this week to urge seniors to sign up for it while acknowledging the anxieties the complicated program - which includes over 40 options - has caused <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.lifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-050906bush_lat%2C0%2C5382305.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-home-headlines> among some potential beneficiaries. Bush defended the multiple options available, insisting that he would not extend the May 15 deadline after which higher premiums will apply to all new subscribers except those considered low-income. The President exhorted seniors to "Sign up now. Now's the time. This is a good deal. It's the government doing its duty. . . ." <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.mifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwashingtontimes.com%2Fnational%2F20060510-115723-4797r.htm> Minority Leader Harry Reid, however, argued that the deadline should be extended because "[t]he White House botched the implementation of the prescription drug plan, and millions have been unable to navigate their way through the confusing sign-up process." A recent study by the General Accounting Office revealed that Medicare's telephone operators frequently give false or incomplete information to seniors <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.oifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fseattletimes.nwsource.com%2Fhtml%2Fhealth%2F2002970411_webmedicare03.html> calling with questions about the program.

Justice Department Finds "Justice is Simply Unavailable" in New Orleans A Justice Department report made public on Tuesday concludes that "justice is simply unavailable" for indigent criminal defendants in New Orleans now <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.pifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-indigent9may09%2C1%2C5200713.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-headlines-nation> , and suggests that the city needs 70 full-time public defenders and a $10-million infusion of cash to ensure defendants the opportunity for to exercise their constitutional rights. Several days before the report was released, Qatar announced plans to award $60 million in grants <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.sifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fselect.nytimes.com%2Fgst%2Fabstract.html%3Fres%3DF30B13FA3A5B0C718CDDAC0894DE404482> to benefit Katrina victims. New Orleans had 39 public defenders before Hurricane Katrina struck last August, nearly all of whom were laid off after the storm. Katrina exacerbated existing problems, according to the report, which emphasizes a lack of accountability within the Orleans Parish Indigent Defender program. It noted that "[t]here were no client files or any other records or data, save a monthly tabulation of cases closed," and suggests a series of short and long-term measures to address a variety of problems. State Judge Calvin Johnson said on Wednesday that the recomm ended changes are "not going to happen overnight," <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.tifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nola.com%2Fnewsflash%2Flouisiana%2Findex.ssf%3F%2Fbase%2Fnews-2

New Measure to Let D.C. Residents Vote Unveiled in the House Earlier today, Representative Thomas Davis III (R-VA) and Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-DC) - who is allowed to observe the House on behalf of the District of Columbia (DC) but not to participate in votes - introduced a bill that would grant voting rights for the first time <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.uifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.washingtonpost.com%2Fwp-dyn%2Fcontent%2Farticle%2F2006%2F05%2F11%2FAR2006051100725.html%3Fsub%3DAR> to over 500,000 residents of DC. One of the new seats would be allocated to DC; the other would go to Utah, the next state in line to receive another representative based on the 2000 census. Davis, who was joined by the Government Reform Committee's senior Republican and Democrat (Christopher Shays (CT) and Henry Waxman (CA), respectively), said that "this plan is partisan-neutral, freeing us to do the right thing." is necessary. CCR and a team of cooperating counsel from the private bar can offer extensive background materials and regular training sessions for attorneys beginning their habeas representations. However, volunteer attorneys must be prepared to devote significant resources -- including the time and expense associated with travel to Guantánamo and, perhaps, to Washington, D.C., and foreign countries -- in order to identify legal issues and develop facts specific to the detention of their clients. For example, attorneys must be prepared to navigate (with CCR's help) the necessary paperwork to obtain the security clearance needed to work on cases involving classified information and for visits with clients at Guantánamo. In addition, attorneys may need to expend resources to pursue political and diplomatic avenues for their clients' repatriation to their home countries or resettlement elsewhere. Brennan Center for Justice Seeks Senior Attorney / Democracy Program The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law (the "Center"), a non-profit legal policy and advocacy group fighting for the nation's core progressive values: democracy, opportunity, justice and individual liberty. Founded just a decade ago by the law clerks, family and friends of Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., the Center advances an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action. The Center is seeking an experienced litigator for its Democracy Program. The Program seeks to bring the ideal of representative self-government closer to reality, by eliminating barriers to full and equal political participation and by striving to ensure that public policy and institutions reflect the diverse voices and interests that make for a rich and energetic democracy. The Program works in five project areas: Voting & Representation, Campaign Finance Reform, Fair Courts, Free Expression Policy, and Voter Choice. This position involves work principally on voting rights and reform of election administration, including: registration restrictions, photo ID requirements for voting, and other practices likely to have a disproportionate impact on communities of color. The attorney will principally be responsible for managing affirmative constitutional cases challenging laws that are likely to disenfranchise already under-represented voters. The position is currently funded for one year, with a possibility of renewal, and will commence as soon as possible. The ideal candidate will have substantial litigation experience (including trial experience) and a strong entrepreneurial spirit. Excellent legal research, analysis, and writing skills; initiative, imagination, and versatility; organizational skills; ability to deal with diverse clients and to coordinate work effectively with other organizations are a must. Strong preference for experience litigating constitutional or voting rights cases. Demonstrated commitment to public interest law a real plus. To apply, please send cover letter, resume, two writing samples, and the names, e-mail addresses, and telephone numbers of three references by May 12 to: Senior Attorney, Democracy Program, Brennan Center for Justice, 161 Avenue of the Americas, 12th floor, NY, NY 10013 or via e-mail to brennancenterjobs@nyu.edu with Senior Attorney in the subject line.

The American Judicature Society Seeks Director for Institute of Forensic Science and Public Policy
The American Judicature Society (AJS) is an independent, national, nonpartisan, not-for-profit 501 (c)(3) organization of judges, lawyers, and other members of the public who seek to secure and promote an independent and qualified judiciary and a fair system of justice. Through research, educational programs, and publications, AJS's primary areas of focus are judicial independence, ethics, and selection; the jury; and the criminal justice system. The AJS Institute of Forensic Science and Public Policy, located in Greensboro, N.C., is a new branch of the organization which will focus on justice issues at the nexus of science and law, particularly as they relate to the reliable and efficient operation of the justice system. Institute staff will work with scientists, legal experts, justice system stake holders, and the AJS Commission on Forensic Science and Public Policy, a commission made up of national scientific and justice system experts, to identify and develop best practices and standards in the areas of forensic science and justice administration. The Director will report directly to and work in close collaboration with the AJS President. The Director will attract, develop, and retain highly qualified employees and develop a productive, self-motivated, and positive work environment; establish the Institute as a respected central repository of scientific and legal research relating to justice system reform through conferences, educational opportunities, and publications and will represent the Institute to the greater community locally, nationally, and internationally; establish and maintain contact with current and potential donors, foundations, and governmental agencies; be responsible for developing multi-year long-range plans as the basis for strategic decisions as well as long-term budget needs; identify, prioritize, and develop research plans and educational opportunities for the Institute, including conferences and courses of study for the various constituencies in the justice system. Qualifications include ten plus years of significant and relevant experience, including managing complex projects and building teams and project plans from the ground up; managing and developing employees; and dealing with a broad range of constituencies. Law degree and/or forensic science background desirable. Experience in the not- for-profit sector, particularly in fundraising, a plus. To apply, send a cover letter and resume to AJS Institute of Forensic Science and Public Policy, 101 West Friendly Ave., Suite 100, Greensboro, NC 27401, or via e-mail to scarboneau@ajs.org.

ACS Supporter David Isbell Receives 2006 Thurgood Marshall Award from D.C. Bar
ACS supporter and Covington & Burling senior counsel David B. Isbell was recently selected by the District of Columbia Bar as the winner of the 2006 Thurgood Marshall Award. The Thurgood Marshall Award is presented biennially to an individual demonstrating a strong commitment to and excellence in the fields of civil rights and individual liberties. Isbell said, "I feel deeply honored to be considered a worthy successor to the previous winners of this award." Isbell has worked at the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Bar Association, the University of Virginia School of Law and Georgetown University Law Center, and is a former President of the District of Columbia Bar.

ACS Member Craig Gurian Releases Analysis of Local Human Rights Law
ACS member Craig Gurian, Executive Director of the Anti-Discrimination Center of Metro New York and Scholar-in-Residence at Fordham Law School's Stein Center for Law and Ethics, has written a comprehensive analysis of the purposes and intended consequences of New York City's recently passed Local Civil Rights Restoration Act. The article, A Return to Eyes on the Prize: Litigating Under the Restored New York City Human Rights Law, 33 Fordham Urb. L.J. 255 (2006), argues that The Restoration Act, in addition to specific right-enhancing provisions in areas like retaliation, domestic partner protection, and catalyst case fees, protects against the federal rollback of civil rights by rejecting the premise that the City Human Rights Law is nothing more than a carbon copy of its state and federal counterparts, and by reaffirming that the purpose and sweep of the local law is uniquely broad and remedial.

ACS Member Ian Millhiser Wins 2006 Burton Award for Legal Achievement
Duke 3L Ian Millhiser has received the 2006 Burton Award for Legal Achievement, awarded to 15 law students around the country who demonstrate particular excellence and clarity in legal writing. Millhiser was recognized for his note, "What happened to a dream deferred? Cleansing the taint of San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez," published in the Duke Law Journal. He will receive the award at a ceremony at the Library of Congress on June 12, and after preparing for the bar exam this summer, will join ACS as assistant director for communications and outreach in the fall.

Battle for the Courts

Conservatives Promote Renewed Focus on Judicial Nominations
Conservative leaders met with White House Counsel Harriet Miers this Monday to seek a renewed emphasis on judicial nominees. The move may reflect a political calculus. According to Senator John Thune (R-SD), "A good fight on judges does nothing but energize our base. Right now our folks are feeling a little flat. They need a reason to get engaged, and fights over judges will do that." Thune was echoed by Senator John Cornyn (R-TX), who said, "this is excellent timing. From a political standpoint, when we talk about judges, we win." Rove told the group that the White House will soon send more than twenty nominations to the Senate for confirmation.

D.C. Circuit Nominee Brett Kavanaugh Proceeds to Full Senate

Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10-8 along party lines to approve the nomination of White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit. Kavanaugh faced a rare second hearing by the committee on Tuesday, at which he denied any involvement in formulating controversial policies on domestic surveillance and torture while serving in the White House. The influential bipartisan "Gang of 14" Senators met on Wednesday to discuss whether Kavanaugh raised "extraordinary circumstances" of the sort required to justify a filibuster under their prior agreement; Senator Lindsay Grahan (R-SC) suggested that "some people [among the Gang of 14] have not yet made the judgment," adding that "there's a generally good feeling about him." Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-TN) has vowed that the full Senate will vote on Kavanaugh's nomination before Memorial Day.

Fourth Circuit Nominee Terrence Boyle FAces Mounting Opposition

Last week, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-NV) promised to filibuster the Fourth Circuit nomination of Terrence Boyle, who has been criticized for failing to recuse himself from cases in which he faced financial conflicts of interest, as well as being reversed with unusually high frequency. This Sunday, Senator Joe Biden (D-DE) announced that he is "unalterably opposed to Boyle," and indicated his consideration of a filibuster. Judiciary chair Arlen Specter (R-PA) argued that Boyle does not raise "extraordinary circumstances," since failing to recuse himself in the face of financial conflicts would be a per se "disqualifier" for confirmation to a higher court.

Fifth Circuit Nominee Michael Wallace Receives "Not Qualified" Rating from ABA

For the first time in nearly 25 years, the American Bar Association has issued a rare "not qualified" rating for a judicial nominee, declaring Michael Wallace unfit for his nomination to the Fifth Circuit. The unanimous decision by the ABA's 15-member special judicial nominations did not explain its rationale. While Ralph G. Neas of People for the American Way argued that "[t]he president should immediately withdraw his nomination," White House spokeswoman Erin E. Healy said that "We disagree with the ABA and reject their rating . . . . Mike Wallace . . . . will make an excellent addition to the bench." Wallace, who currently practices in Jackson, Mississippi, was a law clerk for then- Associate Justice William Rehnquist and worked on numerous controversial issues as an aide to Senator Trent Lott (R-MS).

Justice Department Official Neil Gorsuch Nominated to 10th Circuit

President Bush nominated Neil Gorsuch to the 10th Circuit today to fill the seat of Judge David Ebel, who is taking senior status. Gorsuch currently serves the Bush Administration in the Justice Department, and before obtaining a doctorate in legal philosophy from Oxford, previously clerked for Justices Byron philosophy from Oxford, previously clerked for Justices Byron White and Anthony Kennedy after graduating from Harvard Law School. Gorsuch has met with Senator Wayne Allard (R-CO), who described him as "a top-flight nominee for the appellate bench . . . . with extensive court experience and the appropriate judicial temperament." He also predicted that Gorsuch will be confirmed by the Senate if he successfully avoids being depicted as an "activist judge." Gorsuch was described in 1987 as a ringleader among "seven or eight young men who are reinventing conservatism" as undergraduates at Columbia University, and his prior writings include "Liberals n' Lawsuits," a 2005 article in the National Review arguing that liberals' "addiction to the courtroom as the place to debate social policy is bad for the country and bad for the judiciary."

Fourth Circuit's Luttig Resigns to Join Private Sector
Judg e Michael Luttig resigned from the Fourth Circuit on Wednesday to join Boeing Aerospace as senior vice president and general counsel. Luttig was appointed to the Fourth Circuit in 1991 at age 37 and was considered a top candidate for a Supreme Court nomination under the current President. Today, The Wall Street Journal reported that Luttig's resignation may have resulted from his clash with the President over the case of Jose Padilla, an accused terrorist whose military detention Luttig approved in a landmark decision, only two months before the administration announced criminal charges that Luttig later wrote undermined its "credibility before the courts." Boeing is currently negotiating a settlement of two federal criminal investigations into ethics violations and allegedly improper corporate espionage, which could reportedly lead to a fine of up to $500 million. Some have suggested that Luttig's announcement will help indicate the company's seriousness about addressing the substance of the allegations.

Civil Liberties In a Time of Crisis

NSA Collecting Phone Records of Tens of Millions of Americans
USA Today reported today that the NSA has amassed records on the phone calls of tens of millions of Americans, using information voluntarily provided by a number of private telecommunications companies. An anonymous informant said the program has created "the largest database ever assembled in the world," and ultimately aims "to create a database of every call ever made" within the nation's borders. USA Today noted that the program is "far more expansive than what the White House has acknowledged," noting that the administration's public defense of the program revealed by The New York Times last December has relied heavily upon the notion that warrantless surveillance is limited to international calls. In addition to monitoring domestic calls, the program disclosed by USA Today reportedly collects records indiscriminately, without regard to suspicion of terrorist activity, in order to identify potential patterns. President Bush asserted this morning that all surveillance activities are "within the law," although former NSA director Bobby Ray Inman said on Monday that even the previously known "activity is not on Monday that even the previously known "activity is not authorized." Senator Arlen Spectre (R-PA) promised to contact participating phone companies to learn "what we can't find out from the Department of Justice or other administration officials," as Senator Dianne Feinstein (D-CA) of the Senate Intelligence Committee predicted that "we are on our way to a major Constitutional confrontation on the Fourth Amendment guarantees over unreasonable search and seizure."

Hayden Hearings Likely to Probe Warrantless Surveillance Program

President Bush nominated Air Force General Michael V. Hayden to replace Porter Goss as director of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). Hayden's nomination has inspired criticism by numerous critics, including Senators of both parties concerned with the possibility of undue military influence over the agency. Within hours of the nomination's announcement, officials also announced further changes at the CIA's top ranks, including the return of longtime CIA veterans who left after disputes with Goss. Other critics have focused on Hayden's role in creating the controversial warrantless surveillance program while at the National Security Agency (NSA). Upcoming hearings on the nomination will likely include extensive questioning on the NSA wiretapping program disclosed last December, which may be the only opportunity to delve deeply into it since the Justice Department abruptly ended an inquiry into the eavesdropping program after the NSA refused to grant investigators security clearance. Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter (R-PA) said that the hearings could provide "leverage" to force the administration to be more forthcoming with details.

U.N. Committee Against Torture Examines Abuse of Detainees in U.S. Prisons

U.S. interrogation practices were scrutinized this week at the U.N. Committee Against Torture in Geneva, during a periodic review of compliance with the 1984 Convention Against Torture. John B. Bellinger III, a State Department legal adviser, argued that "U.S. officials from all government agencies are prohibited from engaging in torture at all times and in all places," whereas Norwegian expert Nora Sveaass said the committee had seen official U.S. documents allowing interrogation techniques widely regarded as torture. The panel rejected arguments for secrecy in discussing intelligence matters, insisting that the U.S. has a "duty to answer" questions about a number of issues, such as prisoner interrogations at Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo, secret CIA prisons and extraordinary rendition. In addition to alleged abuses at overseas prisons, the U.N. committee also heard reports of torture in Chicago jails, where interrogation practices have reportedly included placing guns in prisoners' mouths, bags over their heads, and inflicting electric shocks to their genitals. A group of 13 European Union legislators also separately visited Washington this week, seeking information about the potential involvement of European countries in secret overseas prisons allegedly run by the CIA.

U.S. Says it Will Ban Water-Boarding as Bush Speaks of Closing Guantanamo

The State Department's legal adviser told the U.N. Committee

Against Torture on Monday that the U.S. Army will prohibit "waterboarding," the practice of submerging a prisoner's head in water to simulate drowning, when it issues a new interrogation manual. The adviser emphasized that by banning the practice, the U.S. was not admitting to having used it in the past, but Jamil Dakwar of the ACLU noted that its specific mention "raises questions." Meanwhile, The Los Angeles Times reported today that the Pentagon has been forced to delay the release of its updated Field Manual because of congressional opposition to provisions that some argued would violate the torture ban passed by Congress last year. Speaking in Germany, President Bush said on Sunday that he "would like to close the camp [at Guantanamo Bay] and put the prisoners on trial," and that he is awaiting a Supreme Court ruling as to whether their prosecution must proceed in civilian courts, rather than through ad hoc military commissions.

Moussaoui Moves in Vain to Rescind his Guilty Plea
Late last week, convicted 9-11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui filed a motion saying that his confession about being involved in the plot "was a complete frabrication" and that he wanted to withdraw his guilty plea. Moussaoui argued that he was "extremely surprised" that the jury decided to spare his life, which indicated to him that he could receive a fair trial despite his earlier impression that the proceedings were rigged. He wrote that spending over four years in solitary confinement had "made me hostile toward everyone and I began taking extreme positions to fight the system . . . . I now see that I can receive a fair trial even with Americans as jurors and that I can have the opportunity to prove that I . . . was not a member of the plot." U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema rejected Moussaoui's motion, noting that federal law prevents a defendant from withdrawing a plea after sentencing. Moussaoui's lawyers explained that they filed the motion notwithstanding that rule because of their "problematic relationship with Moussaoui."

Court Allows Deportation of British Citizen
In a two-sentence order released yesterday, the Court voted 5-4 to allow the deportation of British man who sought a stay pending another case raising similar issues that the Court will hear next year. Specifically, the case will present the question of whether immigrants must face deportation for all state drug convictions. Kiren Kumar Bharti has lived in the U.S. for 25 years, and will leave behind relatives including a young daughter.

Reporters Face Federal Subpoena for Sources in Steroids Investigation

Last Friday, in what The New York Times called "the latest effort by the government to learn the identities of reporters' confidential sources," the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles issued subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters in an effort to compel them to disclose sources who provided grand jury testimony relating to steroid use among professional baseball players. Disclosure of secret grand jury proceedings is a crime. The Times also noted "[t]he relative ordinariness of the case, which arose out of reporting on steroid use in baseball rather than on covert operatives, domestic eavesdropping or secret prisons" that have raised arguably more widespread concerns about the possibility of government intrusion on the press. According to George Washington University journalism professor Mark Feldstein, the subpoenas from federal prosecutors nonetheless represent "a further escalation . . . of the war that the Bush administration has been waging on the press and public's right to know."

Illinois Corruption Trial Begins
On Wednesday, jury selection began in the trial of four former Chicago city officials accused of unethical hiring practices violating the 1983 "Shakman" consent degree that ended a landmark lawsuit against the city. Accusations include charges that candidates were hired for positions based on political reasons, despite being unqualified, overseas during the interview process, or troubled by alcoholism. Jurors were questioned exceptionally carefully during voir dire to avoid errors of the sort that plagued the recent trial of former governor George Ryan (R-IL), who was recently convicted of numerous corruption- related charges after reports emerged that some jurors had lied about their prior arrest records. Some observers have speculated that the latest prosecution could ultimately implicate the office of Mayor Richard Daley, as the FBI revealed that it is currently investigating some 2,000 cases of public corruption around the country.

Ninth Circuit Upholds MLB Pensions for Negro League Players Against "Reverse Discrimination" Challenge
On Tuesday, the Ninth Circuit ruled that Major League Baseball may continue to give benefits to former players in the Negro Leagues to help compensate for their exclusion from the majors. The compensation program, established in 1993 and extended in 1997, pays $10,000 a year and provides medical coverage to some two dozen former players whose careers were impeded by discrimination. In 2003, a former catcher for the Chicago White Sox filed suit on behalf of a group of white former players who did not receive similar benefits, alleging that the League's actions constituted racial discrimination violating Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Judge Stephen Reinhardt wrote that the plaintiffs "were never the victims of discrimination," and instead the "beneficiaries of the discriminatory policy" that allowed them the opportunity to qualify for benefits formally unavailable to players from minority groups.

Senate Rejects Caps on Malpractice Suits
On Monday, the Senate rejected an effort to cap jury awards for pain & suffering in medical malpractice cases. It was the for pain & suffering in medical malpractice cases. It was the fourth time in three years that such measures – one of which related to healthcare providers generally, and the other specifically to obstetrician-gynecologists – failed to attain passage. The L.A. Times noted that "Monday's votes came as the broader debate over malpractice appears to be shifting away from limits on jury awards to . . . alternatives to litigation." President Bush said, "It is time for the Senate to put the needs of the American people ahead of the interests of trial lawyers," while Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) noted that "[t]he explanation for . . . [malpractice insurance] premium spikes can be found not in legislative halls or courtrooms, but in the boardrooms" of insurance companies.

Bush Acknowledges Anxieties Over Prescription Drug Program; Reid Calls to Extend Deadline

In the face of a looming May 15 deadline for joining the government's prescription drug program, President Bush went to Florida this week to urge seniors to sign up for it while acknowledging the anxieties the complicated program - which includes over 40 options - has caused among some potential beneficiaries. Bush defended the multiple options available, insisting that he would not extend the May 15 deadline after which higher premiums will apply to all new subscribers except those considered low-income. The President exhorted seniors to "Sign up now. Now's the time. This is a good deal. It's the government doing its duty. . . ." Minority Leader Harry Reid, however, argued that the deadline should be extended because "[t]he White House botched the implementation of the prescription drug plan, and millions have been unable to navigate their way through the confusing sign-up process." A recent study by the General Accounting Office revealed that Medicare's telephone operators frequently give false or incomplete information to seniors calling with questions about the program.

Justice Department Finds "Justice is Simply Unavailable" in New Orleans

A Justice Department report made public on Tuesday concludes that "justice is simply unavailable" for indigent criminal defendants in New Orleans now, and suggests that the city needs 70 full-time public defenders and a $10-million infusion of cash to ensure defendants the opportunity for to exercise their constitutional rights. Several days before the report was released, Qatar announced plans to award $60 million in grants to benefit Katrina victims. New Orleans had 39 public defenders before Hurricane Katrina struck last August, nearly all of whom were laid off after the storm. Katrina exacerbated existing problems, according to the report, which emphasizes a lack of accountability within the Orleans Parish Indigent Defender program. It noted that "[t]here were no client files or any other records or data, save a monthly tabulation of cases closed," and suggests a series of short and long-term measures to address a variety of problems. State Judge Calvin Johnson said on Wednesday that the recommended changes are "not going to happen overnight," but added that "the Justice Department report is going to be the foundation for rebuilding the public defender's office and making sure there is justice for everyone."

New Measure to Let D.C. Residents Vote Unveiled in the House
Earlier today, Representative Thomas Davis III (R-VA) and Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-DC) – who is allowed to observe the House on behalf of the District of Columbia (DC) but not to participate in votes – introduced a bill that would grant voting rights for the first time to over 500,000 residents of DC. The legislation, known as "the DC Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act of 2006," would expand the House from 435 to 437 seats. One of the new seats would be allocated to DC; the other would go to Utah, the next state in line to receive another representative based on the 2000 census. Davis, who was joined by the Government Reform Committee's senior Republican and Democrat (Christopher Shays (CT) and Henry Waxman (CA), respectively), said that "this plan is partisan-neutral, freeing us to do the right thing." According to Ilir Zherka, Executive Director of DC Vote, "We are on the brink of a major voting rights victory."

Center for Constitutional Rights (CCR) Seeks Pro Bono Volunteers to Represent Guantanamo Detainees
The Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York-based human rights organization, has filed a single habeas petition in federal court on behalf of nearly 200 men who were waiting for individual attorneys to represent them. CCR is now looking for pro bono attorneys willing to enter an appearance in the case on behalf of individual prisoners. No experience with habeas petitions is necessary. CCR and a team of cooperating counsel from the private bar can offer extensive background materials and regular training sessions for attorneys beginning their habeas representations. However, volunteer attorneys must be prepared to devote significant resources -- including the time and expense associated with travel to Guantánamo and, perhaps, to Washington, D.C., and foreign countries -- in order to identify legal issues and develop facts specific to the detention of their clients. For example, attorneys must be prepared to navigate (with CCR's help) the necessary paperwork to obtain the security clearance needed to work on cases involving classified information and for visits with clients at Guantánamo. In addition, attorneys may need to expend resources to pursue political and diplomatic avenues for their clients' repatriation to their home countries or resettlement elsewhere. If you would like to learn more about representing a Guantánamo prisoner, or if you are prepared to volunteer as a pro bono habeas lawyer, please contact CCR directly at gtmo@ccr-ny.org.

June 7: The Century Foundation and the Center for American Progress Co-Sponsor "Power and Superpower: Global Leadership in the 21st Century" in New York City
On Tuesday, June 6, the Security and Peace Initiative -- a joint venture of the Center for American Progress and The Century Foundation -- is convening its 2006 conference, "Power and Superpower: Global Leadership in the 21st Century," to provide a forum for debate about achieving the public's aspirations for security and economic progress and for dialogue on the changes needed for effective cooperative action. As a supplement to the conference, expert working groups will define the relevant issues in policy papers that inform and frame the conference debate for wider dissemination in a published volume. The conference program will explore, in four sessions, the uses of force, unconventional threats, international values and interests, and the global economy. The conference will take place at the Essex House Hotel, 160 Central Park South, New York, NY 10019. Space is limited. To register, please click here. For information about the conference program or the Security and Peace Initiative, please contact Spencer P. Boyer at 202-481-8164 or sboyer@americanprogress.org.

Brennan Center for Justice Seeks Senior Attorney / Democracy

Brennan Center for Justice Seeks Senior Attorney / Democracy Program

The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law (the "Center"), a non-profit legal policy and advocacy group fighting for the nation's core progressive values: democracy, opportunity, justice and individual liberty. Founded just a decade ago by the law clerks, family and friends of Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., the Center advances an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action. The Center is seeking an experienced litigator for its Democracy Program. The Program seeks to bring the ideal of representative self-government closer to reality, by eliminating barriers to full and equal political participation and by striving to ensure that public policy and institutions reflect the diverse voices and interests that make for a rich and energetic democracy. The Program works in five project areas: Voting & Representation, Campaign Finance Reform, Fair Courts, Free Expression Policy, and Voter Choice. This position involves work principally on voting rights and reform of election administration, including: registration restrictions, photo ID requirements for voting, and other practices likely to have a disproportionate impact on communities of color. The attorney will principally be responsible for managing affirmative constitutional cases challenging laws that are likely to disenfranchise already under-represented voters. The position is currently funded for one year, with a possibility of renewal, and will commence as soon as possible. The ideal candidate will have substantial litigation experience (including trial experience) and a strong entrepreneurial spirit. Excellent legal research, analysis, and writing skills; initiative, imagination, and versatility; organizational skills; ability to deal with diverse clients and to coordinate work effectively with other organizations are a must. Strong preference for experience litigating constitutional or voting rights cases. Demonstrated commitment to public interest law a real plus. To apply, please send cover letter, resume, two writing samples, and the names, e-mail addresses, and telephone numbers of three references by May 12 to: Senior Attorney, Democracy Program, Brennan Center for Justice, 161 Avenue of the Americas, 12th floor, NY, NY 10013 or via e-mail to brennancenterjobs@nyu.edu with Senior Attorney in the subject line.

Brennan Center for Justice Seeks Junior Attorney / Democracy Program

The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law (the "Center"), a non-profit legal policy and advocacy group fighting for the nation's core progressive values: democracy, opportunity, justice and individual liberty. Founded just a decade ago by the law clerks, family and friends of Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., the Center advances an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action. The Center is seeking a junior attorney for its Democracy Program. The Program seeks to bring the ideal of representative self- government closer to reality, by eliminating barriers to full and equal political participation and by striving to ensure that public policy and institutions reflect the diverse voices and interests that make for a rich and energetic democracy. The Program works in five project areas: Voting & Representation, Campaign Finance Reform, Fair Courts, Free Expression Policy, and Voter Choice. This position

Courts, Free Expression Policy, and Voter Choice. This position involves work principally on voting rights (especially the rights of people with felony convictions) and reform of election administration (including registration restrictions, photo ID requirements for voting, and other practices likely to have a disproportionate impact on communities of color). Activities include legal and policy analysis and counseling; legislative drafting at federal, state, and local levels; administrative and legislative advocacy; public education and scholarship; and litigation in trial and appellate courts. The position will commence in the fall of 2006. The ideal candidate will have approximately three years of legal experience (including clerkships, if any) and a strong entrepreneurial spirit. Excellent legal research, analysis, and writing skills; initiative, imagination, and versatility; organizational skills; ability to deal with diverse clients and to coordinate work effectively with other organizations. Strong preference for a lawyer with legal advocacy experience on voting rights and elections at the state level. Demonstrated commitment to public interest law a real plus. To apply, please send a cover letter, resume, two writing samples, and the names, e-mail addresses, and telephone numbers of three references to: Junior Attorney, Democracy Program, Brennan Center for Justice, 161 Avenue of the Americas, 12th floor, NY, NY 10013 or via e-mail to brennancenterjobs@nyu.edu with Junior Attorney in the subject line.

- Public Interest Staff positions

National Security Archive Seeks Freedom of Information Coordinator
The National Security Archive, an independent, non- profit research institute and library located at George Washington University, is seeking a full-time Freedom of Information Coordinator. The National Security Archive undertakes research projects to enrich the debate on American public policy by making available information on a variety of key foreign, defense and intelligence issues. The Freedom of Information Coordinator oversees the National Security Archive's Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) process and plays a leading role in FOIA education and policy matters for the Archive. The Coordinator manages the Archive's FOIA Microsoft Access database (which contains more than 150,000 records), works with federal agencies to negotiate pending FOIA requests, counsels the public and other NGOs about the FOIA, keeps up-to-date on breaking issues relating to government transparency, assists the Archive's legal staff with secrecy litigation and advocacy, and assists Archive analysts in crafting FOIA requests and appeals. The Coordinator will have the opportunity to interact with other non-profits, government personnel, and international delegations as well as publish articles and reports on open government issues. Applicants should have strong organizational skills and attention to detail, a demonstrated interest in current events, national security policy, foreign relations, or other similar substantive areas, and writing experience. The position is best suited to someone with good communications skills and who is able to balance a wide range of diverse activities. Applicants must have a bachelor's degree and computer literacy. Additional skills that are helpful include: knowledge of the U.S. Freedom of Information Act; knowledge of the U.S. Federal Government, including specifically the national security, intelligence, military and foreign relations establishment; and knowledge of United States foreign policy and national security policy. For further information, visit http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/index.html.

Management Assistance Group Seeks Senior Consultant
The Management Assistance Group (MAG) seeks a Senior Consultant to join our diverse team of organizational development consultants. MAG is a 501 (c)(3) nonprofit organization that provides customized, high-quality consulting services to social- change organizations. MAG helps its clients revitalize missions, set bold goals, manage growth, design organizational structures, ensure stable funding, strengthen governance, and cultivate leadership. MAG works only with organizations that share MAG's vision of a just, equitable, and sustainable world for all. Over than 1,000 social-change organizations have worked with MAG over the last 25 years. The consultant we hire will be expected to deliver high- quality organizational development services to MAG's clients, develop new business, manage client engagements, and to create and disseminate ideas and practices that will strengthen individual clients and the social change sector overall. Qualifications include: extensive experience (10+ years) consulting with nonprofits, including advocacy and activist organizations; deep understanding of and fascination with the organizational aspects of nonprofits: structure, staffing, leadership style, management, culture, strategic planning, internal relationships and communication, fundraising, finances, and board development; strong commitment to the values and goals of organizations working for economic, political, and social justice; excellent people skills, including insight into and perceptiveness about people and organizational dynamics, ability to quickly win confidence and trust, and willingness to tell the truth and tackle tough issues; excellent communication skills: speaking, writing, and especially listening; excellent client-development and client-relationship skills; strong grounding in theories of individual, organizational, or systemic change; desire to contribute to the development of nonprofit management theory and practice. Experience and credentials in private sector management and consulting is highly desirable. To apply, please email your resume to Lori Green at LDGreen@magmail.org.

Freedom to Marry Seeks Program Director
Freedom to Marry is the gay and non-gay partnership working to win marriage equality nationwide. Headed by Evan Wolfson, one of America's leading civil rights advocates and lawyers, Freedom to Marry brings new resources and a renewed context of urgency and opportunity to this social justice movement. Freedom to Marry brings the work of its partner organizations into a larger whole, a shared civil rights campaign that fosters heightened outreach to non-gay allies. The Program Director reports directly to Freedom to Marry's Executive Director; supervises our Mobilization Coordinator; works closely with leaders and counterparts in national, state and local partner organizations. Applicant must be excellent strategist, manager, educator, and coalition-builder, must possess exceptional oral and written communications skills; and must have leadership experience in fast- paced national or state wide advocacy organizations, political campaigns or the like. Qualified applicants will have: dynamic public speaking skills; experience facilitating educational trainings and workshops; experience leading a non-profit organization and/or mobilizing grassroots constituencies, including working for national or state-wide advocacy campaigns designed to achieve a major public policy goal; proven ability to bring together diverse individuals and/or organizations to pursue a common objective, as well as to work with a wide range of organizations and/or national leaders and public figures; experience working with at least one or more of the following groups: faith, feminist, labor, LGBT, people of color; solid contacts with progressive organizations; experience with proposal writing, general grants management, report writing, prospect research or foundation stewardship; experience managing, supervising, and evaluating staff; and an ability to work quickly, in a campaign-like environment, managing multiple assignments simultaneously. To apply, please send a cover letter, resume, and three references all in a single Microsoft Word document as an attachment via e-mail with JOB-DIRECTOR as the topic to Charles Ignacio, Deputy Director, at charles@freedomtomarry.org.

Constitution Project Seeks Director of Management and Operations

The Constitution Project, a small nonprofit public policy organization based in Washington, DC, seeks an experienced Director of Management and Operations. The Project conducts bipartisan public education on controversial legal and governance issues, including criminal justice issues, liberty and security after 9/11, the constitutional amendment process, and U.S. war powers. It acts primarily through bipartisan, blue-ribbon committees of current and former legislators, judges, and other government officials, law enforcement officers, prosecutors and defense lawyers, national security experts, scholars, and other experts. The Director of Management and Operations will report directly to the President of the Constitution Project and to its Board of Directors. He or she will be responsible for fund-raising, budgeting, and management. The ideal candidate will have superb organizational and management ability, mature judgment, excellent writing skills, and an ability to meet short deadlines. He or she must have a demonstrated ability to take charge and also work as a member of a team, to anticipate and overcome obstacles to success, and to juggle competing demands. Experience in nonprofit management, including fund-raising, are required. A J.D. is preferred. To apply, please submit a resume, references, and writing sample to casteel@constitutionproject.org. Please include the word "Application" in the subject line. Registration for the 2006 ACS National Convention is now available. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.qy5y6ubab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.acslaw.org%2Fconvention>

Overview
In law and policy news this week:

* Fourth Circuit judge Michael Luttig resigned his seat on the bench in favor of joining the private sector;

* Reports emerged of a warrantless domestic surveillance program far more extensive than any previously disclosed;

* Air Force General Michael Hayden was nominated to head the CIA;

* The U.N. Committee on Torture investigated U.S. interrogation practices to assess U.S. compliance with the 1984 Convention Against Torture;

* The U.S. announced that it will ban "waterboarding," a controversial interrogation tactic involving creating the impression of drowning, as President Bush spoke for the first time of closing the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay;

* The nomination of White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit was approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, as Senate leaders announced plans to bring a vote before by the full Senate before Memorial Day;

* Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle and Fifth Circuit Nominee Michael Wallace encountered new obstacles, as Boyle's alleged ethical violations were declared a "disqualifier" by Senator Arlen Specter (R- PA) and Wallace received a rare unanimous "unqualified" rating from the ABA;

* President Bush nominated Justice Department official Neil Gorsuch to the Tenth Circuit;

* The Senate rejected a proposed cap on jury awards in medical malpractice suits;

* A corruption trial began involving four Chicago city officials, which observers said may ultimately implicate Mayor Richard Daley;

* The Justice Department found that "justice is simply unavailable" in New Orleans due to the decimation of the public defender's office;

* Two reporters at The San Francisco Chronicle received subpoenas from federal prosecutors relating to reports of steroid use among baseball players that quoted verbatim from secret grand jury proceedings; and

* The Ninth Circuit upheld a Major League Baseball program granting pension benefits to former players in the Negro Leagues, rejected a "reverse discrimination" challenge by white players.

ACS Member Craig Gurian Releases Analysis of Local Human Rights Law ACS member Craig Gurian, Executive Director of the Anti-Discrimination Center of Metro New York and Scholar-in-Residence at Fordham Law School's Stein Center for Law and Ethics, has written a comprehensive analysis of the purposes and intended consequences of New York City's recently passed Local Civil Rights Restoration Act. The article, A Return to Eyes on the Prize: Litigating Under the Restored New York City Human Rights Law, 33 Fordham Urb. L.J. 255 (2006), argues that The Restoration Act, in addition to specific right- enhancing provisions in areas like retaliation, domestic partner protection, and catalyst case fees, protects against the federal rollback of civil rights by rejecting the premise that the City Human Rights Law is nothing more than a carbon copy of its state and federal counterparts, and by reaffirming that the purpose and sweep of the local law is uniquely broad and remedial.

Conservatives Promote Renewed Focus on Judicial Nominations Conservative leaders met with White House Counsel Harriet Miers this Monday <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.7gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.humaneventsonline.com%2Fblog-detail.php%3Fid%3D14649> to seek a renewed emphasis on judicial nominees. The move may reflect a political calculus. According to Senator John Thune (R-SD), "A good fight on judges does nothing but energize our base. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.6gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F08%2Fwashington%2F08judges.html> Right now our folks are feeling a little flat. They need a reason to get engaged, and fights over judges will do that." Thune was echoed by Senator John Cornyn (R-TX), who said, "this is excellent timing. From a political standpoint, when we talk about judges, we win." Rove told the group that the White House will soon send more than twenty nominations to the Senate for confirmation <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.5gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.thehill.com%2Fthehill%2Fexport%2FTheHill%2FNews%2FFrontpage%2F050906%2Fnews4.html> .

D.C. Circuit Nominee Brett Kavanaugh Proceeds to Full Senate Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10-8 along party lines to approve <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.4gfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.foxnews.com%2Fstory%2F0%2C2933%2C195132%2C00.html> the nomination of White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit. The influential bipartisan "Gang of 14" Senators met on Wednesday <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.bhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.cnn.com%2F2006%2FPOLITICS%2F05%2F10%2Fsenate.judges%2F> to discuss whether Kavanaugh raised "extraordinary circumstances" of the sort required to justify a filibuster under their prior agreement; Senator Lindsay Grahan (R-SC) suggested that "some people [among the Gang of 14] have not yet made the judgment," adding that "there's a generally good feeling about him." Majority Leader

Fourth Circuit Nominee Terrence Boyle FAces Mounting Opposition Last week, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-NV) promised to filibuster <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.chfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F08%2Fwashington%2F08judges.html%3Fex%3D1304740800%26en%3D8f52317023263c2d%26ei%3D5090%26partner%3Drssuserland%26emc%3Drss> the Fourth Circuit nomination of Terrence Boyle, who has been criticized for failing to recuse himself from cases in which he faced financial conflicts of interest, as well as being reversed with unusually high frequency. This Sunday, Senator Joe Biden (D-DE) announced that he is "unalterably opposed to Boyle," <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.dhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.foxnews.com%2Fstory%2F0%2C2933%2C194590%2C00.html> and indicated his consideration of a filibuster. Judiciary chair Arlen Specter (R-PA) argued that Boyle does not raise "extraordinary circumstances," since failing to recuse himself in the face of financial conflicts would be a per se "disqualifier" for confirmation to a higher court.

Fifth Circuit Nominee Michael Wallace Receives "Not Qualified" Rating from ABA For the first time in nearly 25 years, the American Bar Association has issued a rare "not qualified" rating for a judicial nominee <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ehfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.washingtonpost.com%2Fwp-dyn%2Fcontent%2Farticle%2F2006%2F05%2F10%2FAR2006051002101.html> , declaring Michael Wallace unfit for his nomination to the Fifth Circuit. While Ralph G. Neas of People for the American Way argued that "[t]he president should immediately withdraw his nomination," White House spokeswoman Erin E. NSA Collecting Phone Records of Tens of Millions of Americans
USA Today reported today that the NSA has amassed records on the phone calls of tens of millions of Americans <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.nhfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.usatoday.com%2Fnews%2Fwashington%2F2006-05-10-nsa_x.htm> , using information voluntarily provided by a number of private telecommunications companies. An anonymous informant said the program has created "the largest database ever assembled in the world," and ultimately aims "to create a database of every call ever made" within the nation's borders. USA Today noted that the program is "far more expansive than what the White House has acknowledged," noting that the administration's public defense of the program revealed by The New York Times last December has relied heavily upon the notion that warrantless surveillance is limited to international calls. In addition to monitoring domestic calls, the program disclosed by USA Today reportedly collects records indiscriminately, without regard to suspicion of terrorist activity, in order to identify potential patterns. President Bush asserted this morning that all surveillance activities are "within the law," although former NSA director Bobby Ray Inman said on Monday that even the previously known "activity is not authorized. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.ohfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.wired.com%2Fnews%2Ftechnology%2F0%2C70855-0.html> " Senator Arlen Spectre (R-PA) promised to contact participating phone companies to learn "what we can't find out from the Department of Justice or other administration officials," as Senator Dianne Feinstein (D-CA) of the Senate Intelligence Committee predicted that "we are on our way to a major Constitutional confrontation on the Fourth Amendment guarantees over unreasonable search and seizure. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.phfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F11%2Fwashington%2F11cnd-phone.html%3Fhp%26ex%3D1147406400%26en%3D9ebc2132b83f0bfd%26ei%3D5094%26p

Within hours of the nomination's announcement, officials also announced further changes at the CIA's top ranks, including the return of longtime CIA veterans who left after disputes with Goss. Other critics have focused on Hayden's role in creating the controversial warrantless surveillance program <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.shfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.sfgate.com%2Fcgi-bin%2Farticle.cgi%3Ffile%3D%2Fchronicle%2Farchive%2F2006%2F05%2F10%2FEDGQHIOURG1.DTL> while at the National Security Agency (NSA). Upcoming hearings on the nomination will likely include extensive questioning on the NSA wiretapping program disclosed last December, which may be the only opportunity to delve deeply into it since the Justice Department abruptly ended an inquiry into the eavesdropping program <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.thfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.msnbc.msn.com%2Fid%2F12727867%2F> after the NSA refused to grant investigators security clearance. U.N. Committee Against Torture Examines Abuse of Detainees in U.S. Prisons U.S. interrogation practices were scrutinized this week at the U.N. John B. Bellinger III, a State Department legal adviser, argued that "U.S. officials from all government agencies are prohibited from engaging in torture at all times and in all places," whereas Norwegian expert Nora Sveaass said the committee had seen official U.S. documents allowing interrogation techniques widely regarded as torture. U.S. Says it Will Ban Water-Boarding as Bush Speaks of Closing Guantanamo The State Department's legal adviser told the U.N. The adviser emphasized that by banning the practice, the U.S. was not admitting to having used it in the past, but Jamil Dakwar of the ACLU noted that its specific mention "raises questions." Meanwhile, The Los Angeles Times reported today that the Pentagon has been forced to delay the release of its updated Field Manual <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.8hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-manual11may11%2C0%2C2174549.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-home-headlines> because of congressional opposition to provisions that some argued would violate the torture ban passed by Congress last year. Moussaoui Moves in Vain to Rescind his Guilty Plea
Late last week, convicted 9-11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui filed a motion saying that his confession about being involved in the plot "was a complete frabrication" <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.6hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2Faponline%2Fus%2Fwire-mous.html%3Fhp%26ex%3D1147147200%26en%3D57ebf94e99896f8e%26ei%3D5094%26partner%3Dhomepage> and that he wanted to withdraw his guilty plea. He wrote that spending over four years in solitary confinement had "made me hostile toward everyone and I began taking extreme positions <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.4hfinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-moussa9may09%2C1%2C4997187.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-headlines-nation> to fight the system . . . . I now see that I can receive a fair trial even with Americans as jurors and that I can have the opportunity to prove that I . . . was not a member of the plot." U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema rejected Moussaoui's motion, noting that federal law prevents a defendant from withdrawing a plea after sentencing. Moussaoui's lawyers explained that they filed the motion notwithstanding that rule because of their "problematic relationship with Moussaoui."

Senate Rejects Caps on Malpractice Suits
On Monday, the Senate rejected an effort to cap jury awards for pain & suffering in medical malpractice cases <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.jifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nytimes.com%2F2006%2F05%2F09%2Fwashington%2F09malpractice.html> . It was the fourth time in three years that such measures - one of which related to healthcare providers generally, and the other specifically to obstetrician-gynecologists - failed to attain passage. The L.A. Times noted that "Monday's votes came as the broader debate over malpractice appears to be shifting away from limits on jury awards <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.kifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-medmal9may09%2C1%2C2717190.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-headlines-nation> to . . . alternatives to litigation." President Bush said, "It is time for the Senate to put the needs of the American people ahead of the interests of trial lawyers," while Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) noted that "[t]he explanation for . . . [malpractice insurance] premium spikes can be found not in legislative halls or courtrooms, but in the boardrooms" of insurance companies.

Bush Acknowledges Anxieties Over Prescription Drug Program; Reid Calls to Extend Deadline In the face of a looming May 15 deadline for joining the government's prescription drug program, President Bush went to Florida this week to urge seniors to sign up for it while acknowledging the anxieties the complicated program - which includes over 40 options - has caused <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.lifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-050906bush_lat%2C0%2C5382305.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-home-headlines> among some potential beneficiaries. Bush defended the multiple options available, insisting that he would not extend the May 15 deadline after which higher premiums will apply to all new subscribers except those considered low-income. The President exhorted seniors to "Sign up now. Now's the time. This is a good deal. It's the government doing its duty. . . ." <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.mifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwashingtontimes.com%2Fnational%2F20060510-115723-4797r.htm> Minority Leader Harry Reid, however, argued that the deadline should be extended because "[t]he White House botched the implementation of the prescription drug plan, and millions have been unable to navigate their way through the confusing sign-up process." A recent study by the General Accounting Office revealed that Medicare's telephone operators frequently give false or incomplete information to seniors <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.oifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fseattletimes.nwsource.com%2Fhtml%2Fhealth%2F2002970411_webmedicare03.html> calling with questions about the program.

Justice Department Finds "Justice is Simply Unavailable" in New Orleans A Justice Department report made public on Tuesday concludes that "justice is simply unavailable" for indigent criminal defendants in New Orleans now <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.pifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.latimes.com%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation%2Fla-na-indigent9may09%2C1%2C5200713.story%3Fcoll%3Dla-headlines-nation> , and suggests that the city needs 70 full-time public defenders and a $10-million infusion of cash to ensure defendants the opportunity for to exercise their constitutional rights. Several days before the report was released, Qatar announced plans to award $60 million in grants <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.sifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%

2Fselect.nytimes.com%2Fgst%2Fabstract.html%3Fres%3DF30B13FA3A5B0C718CDDAC0894DE404482> to benefit Katrina victims. New Orleans had 39 public defenders before Hurricane Katrina struck last August, nearly all of whom were laid off after the storm. Katrina exacerbated existing problems, according to the report, which emphasizes a lack of accountability within the Orleans Parish Indigent Defender program. It noted that "[t]here were no client files or any other records or data, save a monthly tabulation of cases closed," and suggests a series of short and long-term measures to address a variety of problems. State Judge Calvin Johnson said on Wednesday that the recomm ended changes are "not going to happen overnight," <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.tifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.nola.com%2Fnewsflash%2Flouisiana%2Findex.ssf%3F%2Fbase%2Fnews-24%2F114729326428350.xml%26storylist%3Dlouisiana> but added that "the Justice Department report is going to be the foundation for rebuilding the public defender's office and making sure there is justice for everyone."

New Measure to Let D.C. Residents Vote Unveiled in the House Earlier today, Representative Thomas Davis III (R-VA) and Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-DC) - who is allowed to observe the House on behalf of the District of Columbia (DC) but not to participate in votes - introduced a bill that would grant voting rights for the first time <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.uifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.washingtonpost.com%2Fwp-dyn%2Fcontent%2Farticle%2F2006%2F05%2F11%2FAR2006051100725.html%3Fsub%3DAR> to over 500,000 residents of DC. The legislation, known as "the DC Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act of 2006 <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.vifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.dcvote.org%2Fadvocacy%2Fdcfairact.cfm> ," would expand the House from 435 to 437 seats. One of the new seats would be allocated to DC; the other would go to Utah, the next state in line to receive another representative based on the 2000 census. Davis, who was joined by the Government Reform Committee's senior Republican and Democrat (Christopher Shays (CT) and Henry Waxman (CA), respectively), said that "this plan is partisan-neutral, freeing us to do the right thing." According to Ilir Zherka, Executive Director of DC Vote, "We are on the brink of a major voting rights victory. <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.wifinvbab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.dcvote.org%2Fmedia%2Frelease.cfm%3FreleaseID%3D231> "

Center for Constitutional Rights (CCR) Seeks Pro Bono Volunteers to Represent Guantanamo Detainees The Center for Constitutional Rights <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.xgwnyubab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.ccr-ny.org%2Fv2%2Fgac%2F> , a New York-based human rights organization, has filed a single habeas petition in federal court on behalf of nearly 200 men who were waiting for individual attorneys to represent them. CCR is now looking for pro bono attorneys willing to enter an appearance in the case on behalf of individual prisoners. No experience with habeas petitions is necessary. CCR and a team of cooperating counsel from the private bar can offer extensive background materials and regular training sessions for attorneys beginning their habeas representations. However, volunteer attorneys must be prepared to devote significant resources -- including the time and expense associated with travel to Guantánamo and, perhaps, to Washington, D.C., and foreign countries -- in order to identify legal issues and develop facts specific to the detention of their clients. For example, attorneys must be prepared to navigate (with CCR's help) the necessary paperwork to obtain the security clearance needed to work on cases involving classified information and for visits with clients at Guantánamo. In addition, attorneys may need to expend resources to pursue political and diplomatic avenues for their clients' repatriation to their home countries or resettlement elsewhere. If you would like to learn more about representing a Guantánamo prisoner, or if you are prepared to volunteer as a pro bono habeas lawyer, please contact CCR <http://rs6.net/tn.jsp?t=xt45mvbab.0.xgwnyubab.dkevvvn6.25135&p=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.ccr-ny.org%2Fv2%2Fgac%2F> directly at gtmo@ccr-ny.org.

Brennan Center for Justice Seeks Senior Attorney / Democracy Program The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law (the "Center"), a non-profit legal policy and advocacy group fighting for the nation's core progressive values: democracy, opportunity, justice and individual liberty. Founded just a decade ago by the law clerks, family and friends of Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., the Center advances an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action. The Center is seeking an experienced litigator for its Democracy Program. The Program seeks to bring the ideal of representative self-government closer to reality, by eliminating barriers to full and equal political participation and by striving to ensure that public policy and institutions reflect the diverse voices and interests that make for a rich and energetic democracy. The Program works in five project areas: Voting & Representation, Campaign Finance Reform, Fair Courts, Free Expression Policy, and Voter Choice. This position involves work principally on voting rights and reform of election administration, including: registration restrictions, photo ID requirements for voting, and other practices likely to have a disproportionate impact on communities of color. The attorney will principally be responsible for managing affirmative constitutional cases challenging laws that are likely to disenfranchise already under-represented voters. The position is currently funded for one year, with a possibility of renewal, and will commence as soon as possible. The ideal candidate will have substantial litigation experience (including trial experience) and a strong entrepreneurial spirit. Excellent legal research, analysis, and writing skills; initiative, imagination, and versatility; organizational skills; ability to deal with diverse clients and to coordinate work effectively with other organizations are a must. Strong preference for experience litigating constitutional or voting rights cases. Demonstrated commitment to public interest law a real plus. To apply, please send cover letter, resume, two writing samples, and the names, e-mail addresses, and telephone numbers of three references by May 12 to: Senior Attorney, Democracy Program, Brennan Center for Justice, 161 Avenue of the Americas, 12th floor, NY, NY 10013 or via e-mail to brennancenterjobs@nyu.edu with Senior Attorney in the subject line.

Brennan Center for Justice Seeks Junior Attorney / Democracy Program The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law (the "Center"), a non-profit legal policy and advocacy group fighting for the nation's core progressive values: democracy, opportunity, justice and individual liberty. Founded just a decade ago by the law clerks, family and friends of Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., the Center advances an innovative, nonpartisan agenda of scholarship, public education and legal action. The Center is seeking a junior attorney for its Democracy Program. The Program seeks to bring the ideal of representative self- government closer to reality, by eliminating barriers to full and equal political participation and by striving to ensure that public policy and institutions reflect the diverse voices and interests that make for a rich and energetic democracy. The Program works in five project areas: Voting & Representation, Campaign Finance Reform, Fair Courts, Free Expression Policy, and Voter Choice. This position involves work principally on voting rights (especially the rights of people with felony convictions) and reform of election administration (including registration restrictions, photo ID requirements for voting, and other practices likely to have a disproportionate impact on communities of color). Activities include legal and policy analysis and counseling; legislative drafting at federal, state, and local levels; administrative and legislative advocacy; public education and scholarship; and litigation in trial and appellate courts. The position will commence in the fall of 2006. The ideal candidate will have approximately three years of legal experience (including clerkships, if any) and a strong entrepreneurial spirit. Excellent legal research, analysis, and writing skills; initiative, imagination, and versatility; organizational skills; ability to deal with diverse clients and to coordinate work effectively with other organizations. Strong preference for a lawyer with legal advocacy experience on voting rights and elections at the state level. Demonstrated commitment to public interest law a real plus. To apply, please send a cover letter, resume, two writing samples, and the names, e-mail addresses, and telephone numbers of three references to: Junior Attorney, Democracy Program, Brennan Center for Justice, 161 Avenue of the Americas, 12th floor, NY, NY 10013 or via e-mail to brennancenterjobs@nyu.edu with Junior Attorney in the subject line.

* Public Interest Staff positions

National Security Archive Seeks Freedom of Information Coordinator The National Security Archive, an independent, non- profit research institute and library located at George Washington University, is seeking a full-time Freedom of Information Coordinator. The National Security Archive undertakes research projects to enrich the debate on American public policy by making available information on a variety of key foreign, defense and intelligence issues. The Freedom of Information Coordinator oversees the National Security Archive's Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) process and plays a leading role in FOIA education and policy matters for the Archive. The Coordinator manages the Archive's FOIA Microsoft Access database (which contains more than 150,000 records), works with federal agencies to negotiate pending FOIA requests, counsels the public and other NGOs about the FOIA, keeps up-to-date on breaking issues relating to government transparency, assists the Archive's legal staff with secrecy litigation and advocacy, and assists Archive analysts in crafting FOIA requests and appeals. The Coordinator will have the opportunity to interact with other non-profits, government personnel, and international delegations as well as publish articles and reports on open government issues. Applicants should have strong organizational skills and attention to detail, a demonstrated interest in current events, national security policy, foreign relations, or other similar substantive areas, and writing experience. The position is best suited to someone with good communications skills and who is able to balance a wide range of diverse activities. Applicants must have a bachelor's degree and computer literacy. Additional skills that are helpful include: knowledge of the U.S. Freedom of Information Act; knowledge of the U.S. Federal Government, including specifically the national security, intelligence, military and foreign relations establishment; and knowledge of United States foreign policy and national security policy. Constitution Project Seeks Director of Management and Operations
The Constitution Project, a small nonprofit public policy organization based in Washington, DC, seeks an experienced Director of Management and Operations. The Project conducts bipartisan public education on controversial legal and governance issues, including criminal justice issues, liberty and security after 9/11, the constitutional amendment process, and U.S. war powers. It acts primarily through bipartisan, blue- ribbon committees of current and former legislators, judges, and other government officials, law enforcement officers, prosecutors and defense lawyers, national security experts, scholars, and other experts. The Director of Management and Operations will report directly to the President of the Constitution Project and to its Board of Directors. He or she will be responsible for fund-raising, budgeting, and management. The ideal candidate will have superb organizational and management ability, mature judgment, excellent writing skills, and an ability to meet short deadlines. He or she must have a demonstrated ability to take charge and also work as a member of a team, to anticipate and overcome obstacles to success, and to juggle competing demands. Experience in nonprofit management, including fund-raising, are required. A J.D. is preferred. To apply, please submit a resume, references, and writing sample to casteel@constitutionproject.org. Please include the word "Application" in the subject line. Alternatively, you may mail your application materials to Emily Casteel, The Constitution Project, 1025 Vermont Ave., N.W., 3rd Fl., Washington, DC 20005.

The American Judicature Society Seeks Director for Institute of Forensic Science and Public Policy
The American Judicature Society (AJS) is an independent, national, nonpartisan, not-for-profit 501 (c)(3) organization of judges, lawyers, and other members of the public who seek to secure and promote an independent and qualified judiciary and a fair system of justice. Through research, educational programs, and publications, AJS's primary areas of focus are judicial independence, ethics, and selection; the jury; and the criminal justice system. The AJS Institute of Forensic Science and Public Policy, located in Greensboro, N.C., is a new branch of the organization which will focus on justice issues at the nexus of science and law, particularly as they relate to the reliable and efficient operation of the justice system. Institute staff will work with scientists, legal experts, justice system stake holders, and the AJS Commission on Forensic Science and Public Policy, a commission made up of national scientific and justice system experts, to identify and develop best practices and standards in the areas of forensic science and justice administration. The Director will report directly to and work in close collaboration with the AJS President. The Director will attract, develop, and retain highly qualified employees and develop a productive, self-motivated, and positive work environment; establish the Institute as a respected central repository of scientific and legal research relating to justice system reform through conferences, educational opportunities, and publications and will represent the Institute to the greater community locally, nationally, and internationally; establish and maintain contact with current and potential donors, foundations, and governmental agencies; be responsible for developing multi-year long-range plans as the basis for strategic decisions as well as long-term budget needs; identify, prioritize, and develop research plans and educational opportunities for the Institute, including conferences and courses of study for the various constituencies in the justice system. Qualifications include ten plus years of significant and relevant experience, including managing complex projects and building teams and project plans from the ground up; managing and developing employees; and dealing with a broad range of constituencies. Law degree and/or forensic science background desirable. Experience in the not- for-profit sector, particularly in fundraising, a plus. To apply, send a cover letter and resume to AJS Institute of Forensic Science and Public Policy, 101 West Friendly Ave., Suite 100, Greensboro, NC 27401, or via e-mail to scarboneau@ajs.org.

Boeing to pay $615 million to avoid trial

By Leslie Wayne The New York Times

NEW YORK Boeing, the second- largest U.S. military contractor, has agreed to pay $615 million under a tentative deal with federal prosecutors that will allow the company to avoid criminal charges, according to Boeing and senior Justice Department officials.

The agreement, which is expected to become final in a few weeks, would end a three-year investigation into wrongdoing by Boeing employees and would require the aircraft maker to pay $565 million to cover civil claims and $50 million to end a criminal inquiry. Senior Justice Department officials said Monday that they believed this to be the largest fine ever imposed on a military contractor.

While avoiding criminal charges, Boeing will agree to "accept responsibility," those officials said, for the actions of its employees. One case involved the theft of proprietary data from the largest military contractor, Lockheed Martin. The other involved Boeing's hiring of a former air force official who had overseen Boeing contracts at the Pentagon.

Boeing will also be monitored by the Justice Department for a two-year period and be required to maintain a federal ethics and compliance program as well as cooperate with investigators in any future inquiries. Should Boeing violate these provisions, it could be prosecuted and fined as much as $10 million, according to the settlement.

"Boeing does accept responsibility for the actions of its employees," said the senior Justice Department official, who added that the $615 million figure reflected "money that was lost to the government due to Boeing's illicit activities."

The company declined to comment other than to issue a statement saying that "Boeing will accept responsibility for the conduct of its employees and make additional commitments regarding ongoing compliance."

News of the settlement was first reported Monday by The Wall Street Journal.

"This is a heck of a penalty," said Howard Rubel, an aerospace analyst with the brokerage firm Jefferies. "But it has eliminated the 'bad citizenship' knock from being on the company. It pushes into the past things that were done in the past. And it gets rid of the uncertainty that a defense contractor could have been convicted of fraud or a felony."

Settlement of the charges also reflects efforts by the Boeing chief executive, W. James McNerney, who was hired last year after the two previous Boeing chief executives resigned under fire. McNerney responded to the ethical controversies by reorganizing the company's military business, putting a new emphasis on training and pressing for a resolution of the government investigations.

"McNerney inherited a company in crisis," said Loren Thompson, a military industry analyst at the Lexington Institute, a research group. "There was a danger that all these controversies would distract the company from getting business. His top goal was to eliminate these distractions. To announce that this controversy is behind them would be a major breakthrough."

The settlement grew out of two investigations into the company.

In one, Boeing employees were found to have stolen thousands of pages of proprietary documents from Lockheed in the late 1990s and used them to help bid for government rocket-launch business. The Pentagon penalized Boeing by stripping it of $1 billion in rocket launch business in 2004. In March, Boeing was allowed to bid for rocket-launch business after a 20-month suspension, the longest for any major military contractor.

In the other case, Boeing was found to have improperly recruited an air force contracting official, Darleen Druyun, while she was still at the Pentagon, where she was overseeing billions of dollars in Boeing business. Druyun later admitted to steering contracts to Boeing to help her get a job with the company. Druyun was fired from Boeing and then pleaded guilty to conflict-of-interest charges and was sentenced to a nine- month prison term. Michael Sears, who as chief financial officer of Boeing had met with Druyun to recruit her, was also fired and later imprisoned.

Those scandals also led to Philip Condit's resignation as chief executive. His successor, Harry Stonecipher, was fired last year after an extramarital affair with a Boeing employee.

McNerney has taken several steps to clean up the company. He let Boeing's in-house counsel, Douglas Bain, make a blistering presentation to Boeing executives at an Florida meeting this year about unethical behavior. He restructured the military division to provide for greater accountability. A U.S. Circuit Court judge, J. Michael Luttig, is replacing Bain, who is retiring. And Boeing's board recently altered the company's executive compensation plan to put more emphasis on ethical behavior.

U.S. opens assault on wiretap suit : AT&T is accused of aiding surveillance

Bob Egelko

The Bush administration has launched a multipronged attack on a lawsuit that accuses AT&T of collaborating with the U.S. government in illegal electronic surveillance, arguing that customers can't prove their phones were tapped or that the company or the government broke the law -- and that, in any event, the entire case endangers national security.

Those assertions in a move for dismissal were based on arguments and evidence that the government submitted to a federal judge under seal, keeping them secret from the public and from the privacy-rights group that filed the suit on behalf of AT&T customers.

The sealed documents and a heavily edited public version were submitted in federal court in San Francisco early Saturday along with declarations from John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, and Lt. Gen. Keith Alexander, director of the National Security Agency. Both officials attest to the need for secrecy as a reason to keep the lawsuit, filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, from going forward.

"Any attempt to proceed in this case will substantially risk disclosure of ... privileged information and will cause exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States," Alexander said in a public filing accompanying his sealed statement.

The foundation filed suit in January accusing AT&T of illegally giving the NSA access to its voice and data network and its customer databases to help the agency's surveillance program.

The suit was accompanied by documents obtained by a former AT&T technician describing equipment installed in the company's San Francisco office that allegedly would enable the federal agency to sweep up huge amounts of data that it could screen for targeted information. AT&T plans to ask a federal judge Wednesday to declare the documents, which have been sealed, to be trade secrets and order them returned.

The former employee, Mark Klein, handled problems on Internet fiber optic circuits and said in a statement that the equipment was being attached to the circuits in San Francisco and other AT&T offices. The equipment allowed the National Security Agency to conduct "vacuum-cleaner surveillance of all the data crossing the Internet," he said.

His lawyers said in a court filing that the government had never classified as a secret anything that Klein saw.

In Saturday's filing, government lawyers wrote that "the lawfulness of the alleged activities cannot be determined without a full factual record, and that record cannot be made without seriously compromising U.S. national security interests."

Without evidence of how the program operated and whom it targeted -- evidence that the Justice Department argued can't be made public -- the plaintiffs have no chance of proving the essential elements of their case, the government said.

Those elements are:

-- That President Bush exceeded his legal authority by authorizing wiretaps and e-mail interception without a warrant;

-- That innocent Americans not in contact with al Qaeda or affiliated groups had their calls or messages intercepted;

-- That AT&T participated in the program;

-- And that any participation by AT&T lacked authorization from the government. The Justice Department endorsed AT&T's argument that the plaintiffs must prove that the company failed to obtain written approval from top federal officials.

The administration asked Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker to hear its dismissal motion June 21, the day Walker is scheduled to consider the Electronic Frontier Foundation's request for an injunction that would prohibit AT&T from any further cooperation in the surveillance program.

Bush acknowledged in December that he had authorized the National Security Agency to intercept phone calls and e-mails between U.S. residents and terror suspects abroad without the court approval required by a 1978 federal law.

The alleged role of telecommunications companies gained new prominence last week when USA Today reported that the National Security Agency had paid AT&T, Verizon and Bell South for the telephone records of tens of millions of Americans. The government's goal reportedly was to find calling patterns that could indicate communications with terrorists. (BellSouth later said a "thorough review" had found no indication that it had given such records to the NSA.)

The government's dismissal motion in the San Francisco case against AT&T relies on the "state secrets" privilege that the Supreme Court recognized in a 1953 ruling allowing the government to keep military secrets out of court. Lower courts, including the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, have ruled that a lawsuit must be dismissed if it can't be litigated without the risk of exposing military secrets.

A court's consideration of the Electronic Frontier Foundation suit "would require confirmation or denial of the existence, scope and potential targets of alleged intelligence activities, as well as AT&T's alleged involvement," information that cannot be revealed "without causing exceptionally grave danger to the national security," government lawyers said.

Their brief repeatedly referred to arguments that were filed under seal, along with the sealed declarations of Negroponte and Alexander.

Kevin Bankston, a lawyer with the foundation, said Monday that it would be difficult for its attorneys to contest government arguments they hadn't been allowed to see. But he said the factual claims in the lawsuit have already been widely reported in the press, and to some extent conceded by the government, without harming national security.

"We're seeking to protect national security by protecting millions of Americans from a government that is colluding with telecommunications companies in spying on their phone and Internet communications," Bankston said.

He also said the plaintiffs were not arguing that the government had monitored particular calls or messages, only that their phone and Internet records had been turned over to the government illegally, without a warrant or suspicion of wrongdoing. That should be enough to allow them to sue, Bankston said, unless AT&T produces evidence of valid authorization by the government.

The plaintiffs are four AT&T customers. The Electronic Frontier Foundation is proposing that the case become a class action on behalf of all affected customers.

Ann Beeson, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union, said she anticipates a similar government dismissal motion Friday in the ACLU's\l "l" suit\l "l" on behalf of private citizens who say they have reason to believe their calls and messages have been or will be monitored. That suit\l "l", filed in a Michigan federal court, seeks to halt the federal surveillance program.

"There are no secrets here," Beeson said. "All the facts that are needed to decide the case are known and conceded: that the government wiretapped without a warrant and that it did so on U.S. soil."

FCC commissioner calls for probe of phone companies working with NSA

By DOUGLASS K. DANIEL

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_The Federal Communications Commission should investigate whether phone companies are violating federal communications law by providing calling records to the National Security Agency as part of an anti-terrorism program, an FCC commissioner said Monday.

"There is no doubt that protecting the security of the American people is our government's No. 1 responsibility," Commissioner Michael J. Copps, a Democrat, said in a statement. "But in a digital age where collecting, distributing and manipulating consumers' personal information is as easy as a click of a button, the privacy of our citizens must still matter."

USA Today reported last week that AT&T Corp., Verizon Communications Inc. and BellSouth Corp. began turning over tens of millions of phone records to the NSA after the spy agency requested the records shortly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The paper reported that the NSA is building a massive call databank to analyze calling patterns.

The telecommunications company Qwest said it refused to cooperate with the NSA after determining that doing so would violate privacy law.

On Monday, Atlanta-based BellSouth issued a statement that it had found no contract to provide phone records to the NSA and had not been providing bulk customer calling records to the agency. Verizon has refused to confirm or deny whether it has participated in the program.

The New York Times reported in December that the NSA was eavesdropping on electronic communications in the U.S. and abroad involving suspected al-Qaida members and operatives. Critics of the eavesdropping programs, Democrats and Republicans, have questioned whether the NSA has stepped outside the law by not seeking court-ordered warrants.

President Bush, while not discussing the details of any NSA programs directed at detecting terrorism plots, has repeatedly assured Americans that the initiatives he authorizes are within the law and the Constitution and are not violating the privacy of ordinary Americans.

When the NSA developed the programs it was under the direction of Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden, now Bush's choice to replace Porter Goss as head of the CIA. The eavesdropping program and the phone call databank are likely to be the focus of questions Thursday when the Senate Intelligence Committee begins Hayden's confirmation hearings.

Sen. Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said he wants to gather testimony from phone company representatives about how they work with the NSA because they cannot decline to cooperate by claiming executive privilege.

An FCC investigation, if undertaken, would be the second attempt this year by the government to explore an aspect of an NSA program. The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" sought to investigate the role of its lawyers in the warrantless eavesdropping program, but it ended the inquiry last week because its lawyers were denied security clearances.

Copps cited the federal Communications Act when he questioned the legality of the phone companies' reported cooperation with the NSA.

"We need to be certain that the companies over which the FCC has public-interest oversight have not gone _ or been asked to go _ to a place where they should not be," Copps said.

Pentagon hands over list of all Guantanamo Bay detainees

By BEN FOX

Associated Press Writer

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico_After years of secrecy, the Pentagon has disclosed the names, ages and home countries of everyone held at the isolated Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeastern Cuba as a suspect in the U.S.-led war on terror.

The U.S. says it has held 759 males, ranging from teenagers to older than 70, from more than 40 countries, according to the list released late Monday in response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by The Associated Press.

The list includes some 200 previously undisclosed names. They are of former Guantanamo detainees\l "l" who were moved out before the military began hearings in the summer of 2004 to determine whether detainees\l "l" were properly classified as "enemy combatants" who should be held at the base.

While the list includes the 10 detainees\l "l" who have been charged with crimes, it doesn't include the most notorious U.S. prisoners, like alleged Sept\l "l". 11\l "l" plotters Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh _ whose whereabouts are secret.

"There's still much more in darkness," said Priti Patel, a lawyer with New York-based Human Rights First who has monitored legal proceedings at Guantanamo.

Lawyers and other advocates will be able to use the new list to track who has been held at the base and find former detainees\l "l" to help investigate allegations of abuse, Patel said.

The Pentagon released the list while denying the AP access to other information about the detainees\l "l", who were mostly held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban following the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan after the Sept\l "l". 11\l "l" attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0028670

The handover marks the first time that everyone who has been held by the Defense Department at Guantanamo Bay has been identified, said Navy Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler, a Pentagon spokesman.

Last month, the military released the names of 558 detainees\l "I", also in response to an AP lawsuit\l "I".

The names of all detainees\l "I" held at Guantanamo Bay were previously kept classified because of "the security operation as well as the intelligence operation that takes place down there," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman.

The new list, when compared to the one from April, shows the Pentagon released many Afghans who were swept up early in the war. More than 90 were transferred out of Guantanamo between January 2002 and the summer of 2004.

Anthony Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, believes U.S. officials are trying to deflect international criticism of Guantanamo Bay by gradually moving out detainees.

"They are trying to slowly let the air out of the tires as a way to make the problem go away," Romero said.

The list released Monday also does not specify what has happened to former Guantanamo Bay detainees.

The fate of some is documented. All British nationals held at Guantanamo Bay, for example, were transferred back to Britain. But what has become of dozens of other detainees was not known.

Some could be free. Others could be in secret U.S. detention centers, or in torture cells of prisons in other countries.

The AP sought the names, photos and other details of current and former Guantanamo Bay detainees through a Freedom of Information Act request on Jan. 18. After the Pentagon didn't respond, the AP filed a lawsuit in March seeking compliance.

The Pentagon later agreed to turn over much of the information. Motions are pending in court for additional information, including the height and weight of the roughly 480 detainees still at Guantanamo Bay to assist with news coverage of a hunger strike.

The Pentagon refused to release that information, arguing that medical records are private. The military said the hunger strike began in August and has involved a maximum of 131 detainees.

The Pentagon also argued that releasing photos of current detainees would damage U.S. intelligence gathering. Releasing pictures would make it easier for al-Qaida to retaliate against detainees suspected of cooperating with interrogators, said Paul B. Rester, the director of the Joint Intelligence Group at Guantanamo. That would make it harder for the U.S. to collect intelligence, Rester said in a May 10 affidavit filed in response to the AP's Freedom of Information Act suit.

"No human intelligence sources interested in cooperating with the United States officials under any hope of anonymity will be willing to do so if their photographs and names are publicly released," he said.

The U.S. military says about 480 detainees are now at Guantanamo Bay. About 275 have been released or transferred.

Supreme Court Ruling for eBay a Major Victory for Big Patent Holders

By Tony Mauro

A Supreme Court ruling Monday in favor of eBay Inc. in a closely watched patent dispute made it harder for those claiming infringement to win permanent injunctions against major patent holders and manufacturers.

The unanimous decision was a major win for eBay and other big patent holders that frequently face crippling litigation from parties that get injunctions to protect one of thousands of patents used in a complex product.

Writing for the Court, Justice Clarence Thomas said district court judges have discretion, guided by traditional factors such as whether "irreparable harm" would result if an injunction is not issued, in deciding whether a party claiming infringement should win a permanent injunction against continued use of the product. The ruling in eBay Inc. v. MercExchange spells an end to the long-standing presumption in patent cases that an injunction should issue almost automatically when infringement is found.

That presumption has been used as leverage against manufacturers that would rather settle with challengers than risk seeing a product halted in its tracks. The recent multimillion-dollar settlement between the makers of BlackBerry devices and a patent holder, NTP Inc., which narrowly averted a shutdown of the BlackBerry network, was often cited in debate over the issues in the eBay case.

"The decision whether to grant or deny injunctive relief rests within the equitable discretion of the district courts, and that such discretion must be exercised consistent with traditional principles of equity," Thomas wrote.

The ruling sends the dispute between eBay and MercExchange, a Virginia company that sued eBay for infringement, back to the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. A statement from MercExchange predicted it would win an injunction even under the standards the Supreme Court articulated on Monday.

Some analysts predicted that the ruling would not put an end to efforts by challengers to seek injunctions. "Patentees will continue to exploit the threat of an injunction, along with the always-present threat of an enormous judgment, in their negotiations with deep-pocket defendants, says Erik Puknys of Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner in Palo Alto, Calif.

In a concurring opinion four justices -- Anthony Kennedy, David Souter, John Paul Stevens and Stephen Breyer -- also took note of the growth of what they described as an "industry" of small patent holders, known as patent trolls, who use patents not to manufacture products but as a "bargaining tool to charge exorbitant fees" from major companies to license their patents.

But Thomas' majority opinion did not take such a dim view of patent holders who do not manufacture their products, asserting that solo inventors and university researchers might have legitimate reasons for seeking licensing arrangements, and they could still win injunctions if they meet the traditional test for injunctive relief in civil cases.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. also wrote a concurrence, joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, suggesting that judges, while having discretion, should still issue injunctions more often than not. Roberts noted that since the early 19th century, "courts have granted injunctive relief upon a finding of infringement in the vast majority of patent cases."

In a statement, Robert Holleyman of the Business Software Alliance, which supported eBay, called the decision a "clear victory for innovation and for consumers, and a defeat for patent trolls and others who are abusing the legal system. ... By giving courts greater latitude on whether or not to issue an injunction, we are making progress towards restoring much-needed balance to the out-of-control patent litigation process."

The Court's ruling was one of several unanimous decisions Monday. The rulings seem to bolster a growing perception that, at least for the moment, the high court under Roberts is achieving a considerable degree of agreement. Even though Thomas' decision drew several concurrences, they were brief and devoid of any criticism of the majority opinion. At oral argument in March, it was far from clear that the justices would come to such a pro-patent decision unanimously.

The eBay dispute began in 2001, when MercExchange sued eBay for infringing its patent that enabled the "Buy it Now" feature used on the popular online-auction site. A jury in the Eastern District of Virginia awarded MercExchange $35 million for infringement, and the company promptly sought a permanent injunction to prevent future infringement by eBay. MercExchange invoked the 1908 precedent, Continental Paper Bag Co. v. Eastern Paper Bag Co., that established the presumption in favor of an injunction against the infringer. But the judge denied MercExchange's motion, finding that the company, which licenses but does not practice its patents, would not suffer irreparable harm without an injunction.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit rejected the District Court's reasoning and said that nothing in the case justified deviating from the rule in favor of an injunction.

"We are extremely gratified by the Supreme Court's unanimous decision," said Jay Monahan, eBay's deputy general counsel for intellectual property, in a statement. "The trial judge originally found in this case that money was sufficient and denied an injunction. We are confident that when the District Court revisits this issue, particularly in light of the ongoing re-examination of the patents, that the result will be the same."

But other companies, joined by the Bush administration, argued that the precedent should be upheld to give needed protection to valid patents. The solicitor general argued that infringement alone amounts to irreparable harm and, therefore, should trigger an injunction against the infringer.

Also on Monday, the Court ruled that Ohio taxpayers had no standing to challenge a tax-incentive program that encouraged Daimler-Chrysler to build a new facility in Toledo. The case, DaimlerChrysler v. Cuno, was closely watched by businesses and states because it threatened commonly used tax incentives aimed at luring business investment. A group of taxpayers successfully challenged the program before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which found a commerce clause violation because it favors companies that invest in Ohio. The high court opted to sidestep the merits of the issue, focusing instead on the standing issue.

Roberts, writing for the Court, said expanding the concept of standing to allow the suit to proceed to the merits would have "remarkable implications" for both state and federal taxpayer claims.

"The Supreme Court's ruling today is a big win for America because it sends a clear message that states will not be held hostage to lawsuits brought by individuals or groups with no direct connection to the issue at hand," says W. Frank Fountain, spokesman for DaimlerChrysler.

In a third decision, the Court ruled that hydroelectric dams have the potential for creating a "discharge" that triggers federal and state regulation through the Clean Water Act, even though the water is not changed by the dam itself. Souter, writing in S.D. Warren Co. v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection, said the word "discharge" is not limited to the release of pollutants, as Warren had argued, but also includes the mere release of water from one location to another.

Souter also accepted the argument of environmentalists that hydroelectric dams alter the temperature and quality of the water downstream and have significant environmental effects. The ruling boosts state as well as federal regulation, because the Clean Water Act gives states a major role in the federal licensing of any activity that produces a discharge into a navigable water.

Scalia dissented only to the extent that Souter used the legislative history of the Clean Water Act to justify his decision. Scalia has long rejected legislative history as a way to interpret statutes, arguing instead that the law's words should guide the interpretation.

Supreme Court Buries Patent Trolls

Jessica Holzer

WASHINGTON, D.C. - The U.S. Supreme Court has tipped the balance in patent disputes ever so slightly toward the end users of patented technology and away from inventors, owners of intellectual property and the hated "patent trolls"--companies that make money by suing for infringement of patents they own but don't use.

In a victory for eBay, the justices ruled unanimously that federal courts must weigh several factors before barring a patent infringer from using a contested technology or business method.

The online auction house had petitioned the Supreme Court to review the practice of automatically issuing a permanent injunction whenever a patent was found valid and infringed, arguing that the standard was not grounded in the law.

At stake for eBay was the viability of the popular, fixed-price "Buy It Now" section of its Web site. MercExchange, a tiny Virginia-based patent-holding company, won millions of dollars in damages when it successfully sued eBay for violating one of its patents related to the fixed-price auction feature.

Now the case will be sent back to the district court where eBay originally won the right to continue operating "Buy It Now" while it designs around the patents.

For years now, the U.S. Court of Appeals--the Federal Circuit in Washington, D.C., which reviews all appeals of patent suits--has slapped infringers with permanent injunctions as a matter of course, except in the most extreme circumstances.

But the Supreme Court ruled that traditional "principles of equity" must be taken into account before such a drastic sanction is imposed. These principles include whether the patent holder has suffered irreparable damage or whether monetary awards might be enough to compensate for the harm done to the patent holder.

In this case, a district court stopped short of forcing eBay to shut down the service entirely, saying that MercExchange wouldn't be harmed if eBay continues to offer the service while it tries to design around the patents. MercExchange hasn't used its patents, the court wrote, and could eventually be compensated with additional monetary damages if the infringing continued. But on appeal, the Federal Circuit stuck to its rule of always handing down injunctions and reversed the decision.

The high court's decision deals a blow to patent trolls, which are notorious for using the threat of permanent injunction to extort hefty fees in licensing negotiations as well as huge settlements from companies they have accused of infringing. Often, those settlements can be far greater than the value of the infringing technology: Recall the $612.5 million that Canada's Research in Motion forked over to patent-holding company NTP to avoid the shutting down of its popular BlackBerry service.

Patent trolls have thrived as American industries have churned out more and more high-tech gizmos containing dozens or even hundred of patented bits of technology. In accepting the case and ruling as they did, the justices seemed to have had it in mind to hem in the power granted to patent holders.

But doesn't the ruling also hurt bona fide inventors, not to mention the many universities that fund their research and own the patents? To be sure, it plainly erodes the power that has been typically bestowed by a patent. Patent law unambiguously grants owners of intellectual property the same rights as regular property holders, including the right to exclude others from using their property. But the law also clearly states that injunctions "may"--not "shall"--be issued "in accordance with the principles of equity."

"All this is saying is that district courts are free to use their discretion and to be fair. And it takes away a little of the edge from those patent-licensing operations," says Steven Bauer, a partner at Proskauer Rose in Boston who often represents biotech firms in patent disputes.

The justices drew the line on ruling out injunctive relief in all cases where the patent holder does not use the patents it owns to produce anything, as is often the case with universities. That makes the ruling somewhat less than an unmitigated victory for eBay, since the lower court had refrained from imposing an injunction on the basis of MercExchange not using its patents.

The courts will have to work out on a case-by-case basis when an injunction is appropriate, says Mark Davis, a patent litigator at McDermott Will & Emery in Washington, D.C. "There's going to be more uncertainty here, and it's going to take a while for the law to develop to figure out when you can expect an injunction," he says.

Courtroom Defense (Deficit Reduction Act)

May 15, 2006

Courtroom Defense. Attorneys for the Justice Department refuted allegations last week that the Deficit Reduction Act is unconstitutional, citing an 1892 Supreme Court ruling.

Plaintiffs in a lawsuit that has questioned the law's status assert that because the House and Senate approved different versions of the bill in December - an error inserted by a Senate clerk caused the discrepancy - the act is unconstitutional.

But the government's response, filed late Wednesday in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, argues that the act, signed into law in February, meets the Constitution's bicameral clause because both the Speaker and the Senate President Pro Tem certified the legislation before it reached the president.

Citing a Supreme Court ruling in Field v. Clark, Justice Department attorney Steven Bressler wrote: "The enrolled bill rule ... provides that if a legislative document is authenticated in regular form by the appropriate officials, the courts treat that document as properly adopted."

The lawsuit, Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Leavitt, centers on a dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals but has prompted questions over the act's constitutionality as the case has progressed.

In an unrelated case that also challenges the law's constitutionality, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed a similar defense Tuesday, citing the same 1892 decision.

At least three other lawsuits questioning the law's legal status, including one brought by senior House Democrats, have been filed in the federal court system, but the government has yet to respond in those cases.

More than a dozen House Democrats also have sought to file an amicus brief in the Cookeville lawsuit. The watchdog group Public Citizen, which has filed its own challenge, also has asked to submit a friend-of-the-court brief in that case.

Lincare settles for $12-million; The Clearwater company, which supplies home oxygen equipment, admits nothing in a deal to end federal inquiries.

By KRIS HUNDLEY, Times Staff Writer

CLEARWATER - Lincare Holdings Inc., one of the nation's largest suppliers of home oxygen equipment, resolved four long-standing federal investigations Monday at a cost of $12-million.

The Clearwater company said the settlement payments did not include admission of wrongdoing for allegations, some of which were more than a decade old.

"We are pleased to have resolved these matters with the government," Lincare's chief executive John P. Byrnes said in a release after the close of the stock market. "Lincare fully cooperated with the government during the course of their inquiries. Our board of directors believes that it was in the best interests of the company to put these matters behind us."

Byrnes said the company had reserves for a substantial portion of the settlement charges. Lincare, which held its annual meeting on Monday, had reported the four investigations in previous filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The longest-running investigation was disclosed in June 2000 and concerned a Florida inquiry into Lincare's relationships with "certain physicians and other referral sources" from January 1993 through December 2000. The company said the Office of Inspector General of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services alleged the company had given kickbacks to providers in violation of federal laws.

Three separate investigations of the company's practices had taken place in Massachusetts, Tennessee and Idaho. Each involved allegations that Lincare had inappropriately sought reimbursement under Medicare. Under scrutiny were billing practices from January 1995 through March 2004.

In addition to the $12-million, Lincare, as part of the settlements, entered into what the company's press release described as a "corporate integrity agreement" with the Office of Inspector General. Satisfying government regulators is critical because Lincare, which had $1.3-billion in revenue last year, receives 67 percent of its revenue from Medicare and Medicaid.

Lincare, which has more than 800 locations nationwide, settled an investigation by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Sacramento, Calif., in 2001, paying $4.15-million while admitting no wrongdoing.

Migrants returned to Cuba after reaching Florida bridge grow frustrated waiting to leave

By ANDREA RODRIGUEZ Associated Press Writer

(AP) - HAVANA-A group of Cuban migrants sent home after reaching an abandoned bridge in the Florida Keys said they are becoming frustrated waiting for final Cuban government approval to leave for good.

"It has been 48 days, we have the U.S. visas, we have passports," Ernesto Hernandez said Monday.

Hernandez added that all the migrants lack is the "white card," the exit permit that Cubans must get from the communist-run government to leave the island.

The 14 members of the group applied for the exit permits about six weeks ago at Cuba's migration office in Matanzas Province.

In the meantime, Hernandez said, they have quit their jobs as instructed by Cuban authorities in preparation for their migration to the United States and had even turned in their monthly food ration cards.

The migrants had said earlier in the day that they would travel to Havana on Tuesday to seek help from U.S. officials.

But they decided to wait another week or two for the last documents from the Cuban government, group member Junior Blanco said by telephone from the central province of Matanzas.

Blanco and Hernandez part of the group of would-be migrants who were returned to Cuba in January after reaching the old bridge in Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0028675

Under the United States' "wet foot/dry foot" policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain, while those intercepted at sea are generally sent home.

U.S. Coast Guard officials determined that the bridge did not qualify as dry land because parts of it are missing and it no longer connects to U.S. soil.

The repatriations caused an uproar in South Florida's large Cuban exile community.

A deal allowing most of the Cubans to emigrate permanently was reached March 15 between U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno in Miami and the U.S. government, which had argued that the U.S. Coast Guard acted correctly.

- Supreme Court Grants Certiorari to Resolve Conflict Among Circuits on the Scope of the Attorney General's Certification Authority Under the Westfall Act
  Pat Osborn v. Barry Haley [United States Supreme Court; United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit; United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky]. On May 15, the Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve conflicts among the circuits concerning application of the Federal Employee Liability Reform and Torts Compensation Act of 1988 (Westfall Act). The Westfall Act generally provides immunity to federal employees from torts committed within the employee's scope of employment. Upon the Attorney General's certification that the employee was in the scope of employment, the United States is substituted for the employee and the case proceeds against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act. In this case, the Sixth Circuit followed the majority of circuits to rule that the Attorney General, in making the scope certification, could deny that the underlying incident had occurred. The Sixth Circuit also ruled, following another majority of the circuits, that the certification is

"conclusive" with respect to removal and that the district court lacked authority to remand the case even if the court rejected the scope certification. Noting the conflict among the circuits, the Department, which represents the individual federal employee in this matter, acquiesced to certiorari on both the scope of the Attorney General's scope certification authority and on the scope of the district court's remand authority. The Court's May 15, order granting certiorari also ordered the parties to brief the question of whether the court of appeals lacked jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. 1447(d) to review the district court's remand decision. That issue was not presented by petitioner.

· Supreme Court Holds that Traditional Four-Factor Test Determines Whether Injunctions Should be Granted in Patent Infringement Cases eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, L.L.C. [United States Supreme Court; United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit; United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia]. On May 15, the Supreme Court held that the traditional tests for granting a permanent injunction "apply with equal force to disputes arising under the Patent Act." Those tests are: (1) irreparable injury, (2) inadequacy of legal remedies, such as damages, (3) balance of hardships, and (4) the public interest. The Court disapproved both: (a) the Federal Circuit's rule that injunctions should be granted in infringement cases except in extraordinary circumstances, and (b) the district court's holding that the patentee's willingness to license its patent rather than to commercially develop the invention on its own should weigh against granting an injunction.

C. LAST WEEK

· Fifth Circuit Holds West Bank Palestinian Asylum Seekers Were Victims of Circumstance
Majd v. Gonzales [5th Cir.]. On April 17, in a published decision, the Fifth Circuit granted the petition for panel rehearing, ordered its previous published opinion of March 8, withdrawn and substituted a new opinion. The Court upheld the Immigration Judge's denial of asylum, withholding of removal, and Convention Against Torture to West Bank Palestinians, determining that the record supported the determination that the aliens had suffered discrimination and harassment not rising to the level of persecution on account of one of the five statutory grounds. The court also rejected the alien's claim that he qualifies as a refugee pursuant to the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, adopting the holding of Al-Fara v. Gonzales, 404 F.3d 733 (3d Cir. 2005) that an alien cannot assert rights beyond those contained in the Immigration and Nationality Act.

· York County, Pennsylvania, Settles False Claims Allegations for $16 Million
On April 26, York County, Pennsylvania, agreed to pay the United States $16 million to resolve allegations that the county inflated the per diem rate it charged the Immigration and Naturalization Service to house detainees from October 1999 to March 2003. In 2000, the county sought to increase the per diem rate it charged. In support of the increase, York submitted a certified statement of prison operating costs and represented the average daily population of the prison to be 996. In fact, the average daily population was 1,544 inmates. As a result, INS paid $60 a day per detainee, rather than the $38.70 it would have paid had York been truthful. York is one of the largest providers of detention services to INS/Immigration and Customs Enforcement in the nation.

- First Circuit Concludes that It Lacks Jurisdiction to Review "Due Diligence" Determination
  Boakai v. Gonzales [1st Cir.]. On April 27, the First Circuit in a published decision found that it lacked jurisdiction under the REAL ID Act to review the Board's finding that the alien, who was convicted of an aggravated felony, had failed to exercise due diligence in filing his motion to reopen out of time. The motion to reopen had been filed fourteen months after the Board's decision denying protection under the Convention Against Torture and failed to mention the timeliness issue. The Court concluded that the finding that the alien had not exercised due diligence was a factual determination not subject to review. The Court also refused to consider the merits of the motion to reopen because it held that the failure to file a timely motion to reopen is a failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

- Seventh Circuit Concludes that Sua Sponte Denial of Motion to Reopen Raises No Due Process Issue
  Cevilla v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On May 1, the Seventh Circuit, in a published decision, affirmed the Board's decision to decline to grant the alien's motion to reopen sua sponte. The Court concluded that although the REAL ID Act granted jurisdiction to review the denial of sua sponte reopening for questions of law and constitutional questions, no due process right attached to the failure to grant discretionary relief and that the "analysis that generated the finding, the procedure and evidence on which that analysis rested, and the finding itself are not so unreasonable as to constitute a denial of due process."

- Seventh Circuit Rules that Adverse Credibility Cannot be Based on the Submission of Forged Documents Without a Determination of Whether the Alien Knew of the Forgery
  Hanaj v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On May 3, the Seventh Circuit in a published decision, vacated and remanded the Board's denial of asylum and withholding of removal. Primarily relying upon the testimony of the government's expert document witness that certain of the documents submitted by the alien were forgeries, the Immigration Judge determined that the alien was not credible and denied relief. The Court held that the submission of forged documents cannot negate the credibility of an entire claim unless the Immigration Judge determined that the alien knew or suspected that the documents were forged.

- D.C. Circuit Holds Orders Dismissal of Federal Tort Claims Act and Rehabilitation Act Claims on Interlocutory Appeal
  Spinelli v. Goss [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On May 5, the District of Columbia Circuit (Randolph, Tatel, C.J, Williams, S.C.J.) reversed on interlocutory appeal the district court's denial of a motion to dismiss claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act and the Rehabilitation Act. Adopting our arguments with respect to both claims, the Court held that: (1) a determination by the Secretary of Labor that a condition is covered by the Federal Employees Compensation Act conclusively forecloses a Federal Tort Claims Act claim based on that condition, and (2) the Rehabilitation Act requires exhaustion of administrative remedies that cannot be excused on the basis of alleged futility. The decision also indicates (at least implicitly) that the court may grant permission to take a § 1292(b) appeal even when the district court provides no written decision of any kind in denying a motion to dismiss, when two dispositive issues are raised, and even when additional claims remain in district court.

- Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit Affirms Ruling Dismissing Claims Arising From Overturned Convictions
  Carney et al. v. United States, et al., Appeal No. 05-10198 [5th Cir. 2006]. On May 10, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the rulings of the district court, dismissing the United States and the FBI for failure to timely exhaust claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act. Twenty-three months after plaintiffs' acquittal on criminal charges, plaintiffs filed suit alleging claims for malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and false imprisonment against the United States and individual federal employees. The United States was substituted for the federal employees. The district court dismissed the tort claims, finding that the plaintiffs had not exhausted their administrative remedies within two years of accrual. 28 U.S.C. § 2401(b). The court further ruled that plaintiffs claims did not fall within 28 U.S.C. § 2679(d)(5), under which certain cases may be deemed timely if dismissed after the substitution of the United States, because the plaintiffs had known of the federal presence in the case prior to filing suit.

- Plaintiffs Voluntarily Dismiss Action Against the United States in Long-standing Nevada Munitions Factory Case
  Kemp, et al. v. United States [District of Nevada] (Judge Hicks). On May 10, the court granted plaintiffs' voluntary dismissal of their $20 million Federal Tort Claims Act action, alleging that their son suffered serious personal injuries, including failure of a transplanted kidney, as a result of exposure to hazardous chemicals emanating from an explosives factory ruin located on public land managed by the U.S. Department of the Interior's Bureau of Land Management in North Sparks, Nevada. The voluntary dismissal came immediately after the United States filed a comprehensive motion to exclude the testimony of plaintiffs' toxicological and medical expert witness, pursuant to Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993). The Daubert challenge demonstrated that the purported expert's knowledge of the toxins at issue was litigation-driven and that her method of determining general causation was flawed.

- Two Defendants Indicted in $15,000,000 Business Opportunity Scam
  United States v. Leonard Needelman, et al. [Southern District of Florida] (Judge Cohn). On May 11, a federal grand jury in Ft. Lauderdale indicted Leonard Needelman and Jason Kowal for fraudulent sale of business opportunities at a firm called Cash Link Systems. The Indictment charges both defendants with conspiracy and mail and wire fraud. According to the Indictment, defendants and others sold fraudulent business opportunities through Cash Link. Cash Link purported to sell cash-less ATMs and potential purchasers were told that for approximately $12,000, Cash Link would, among other things: perform the most difficult and time consuming part of the business – securing viable locations in which to place the cash-less ATMs; find appropriate high-traffic locations to place the kiosks; and relocate any kiosk that underperformed. Cash Link Systems victimized over 900 people and caused over $15,000,000 in victim losses.

- Nine Defendants Indicted in $17,000,000 Business Opportunity Scam

United States v. Jay Mayne, et al. [Southern District of Florida] (Judge Martinez). On May 12, a Superseding Indictment against nine defendants was unsealed, charging fraud in connection with business opportunity sales at Pantheon Holdings, a/k/a Internet Machine Company (Pantheon). The nine defendants played various roles at the company, primarily in sales positions, or acting as bogus references. The Superseding Indictment charges all defendants with conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud, and various defendants with substantive mail and wire fraud counts. Pantheon purported to sell Internet kiosks, and potential purchasers were told that for approximately $18,000, Pantheon would, among other things: perform all the legwork of the business; find viable, high-traffic locations to place the kiosks; relocate any kiosk that underperformed; and place national advertisements on the kiosk. Pantheon victimized over 700 people and caused more than $17,000,000 in victim losses.

- Court Enjoins Guantanamo Bay Military Commission Proceeding
  Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. Al Sharbi v. Bush [District of Columbia]. On May 12, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan enjoined military commission proceedings with respect to a Guantanamo Bay detainee, Ghassan Abdullah Al Sharbi, pending a decision of the Supreme Court. The court rejected the government's argument that the court lacked jurisdiction under the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 as "premature," given the pendency of the issue of the Act's effect before the D.C. Circuit and the Supreme Court. The court considered enjoining the commission proceedings to be imminently practical since a decision in the Hamdan case is expected soon. The court stated, "The government has not explained . . . why the Court must adhere to the laws of war now [by permitting the continuation of commission proceedings intended ultimately to address accused violations of the law of war], rather than wait a few weeks so that it may follow the rule of law, as it will be determined by the Supreme Court."

D. LONG RANGE EVENTS

- Oral Argument Rescheduled and Supplemental Briefing Ordered in Establishment Clause Challenge to National Motto
  Newdow v. Congress of the United States of America [Eastern District of California]. On May 10, the court rescheduled oral argument on defendants' pending motion to dismiss. The argument, which had previously been set for May 19, will now be heard on June 16. This case against the United States, Congress, its Law Revision Counsel, and Department of Treasury officials challenges the constitutionality of the national motto, "In God We Trust," and its inscription on United States coins and currency, under the Establishment Clause, the Free Exercise Clause, and various other theories. Our supplemental brief addressing an amended complaint is due May 26

Subject: Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee Update
Attachments: Draft Meth Initiatives 5 14 06doc.doc; PatriotMethSummary.doc; Master Report 5-14-06.doc

All,

As mentioned at the last Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Subcommittee meeting, we need the following from you by COB Friday, May 26, 2006:

1) Please review and make any changes or additions to the attached updated Department Meth Initiatives. Please make sure your component's goals or strategies are represented and captured accurately in the Meth Initiatives; and

2) Please review the attached DOJ Meth Report. Please review sections for accuracy and completeness. Please remember to submit a short (1 to 2 paragraphs) prose summary of your component's accomplishments.

Also, please find attached OLP's summary on the Combat Meth Act.

The next Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination meeting will be held on Thursday, July 13, 2006, at 2:00 p.m. at the 7th floor Conference Center.

Please e-mail all changes and updates to the Meth Initiatives and the Meth Report to Mark Grider, Kristi Macklin, and John Manning.

Thank you.

METHAMPHETAMINE INITIATIVES for the Department of Justice

Executive Summary

The Department of Justice is working with federal, state, tribal, and local law enforcement and our international partners to combat methamphetamine production capabilities and the trafficking and abuse of methamphetamine that plagues our Nation. Addressing the illegal distribution of methamphetamine is the Department's top drug enforcement priority.

To achieve a significant reduction in methamphetamine distribution and use, the Department will:

Establish the Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee

- the Committee will oversee the implementation of the Department Initiatives and ensure the most effective coordination of Department anti-methamphetamine efforts.

Decrease Methamphetamine Production

- increase our cooperation with Mexican law enforcement authorities to halt the spread of this deadly and addictive drug and disrupt and dismantle the trafficking organizations responsible; and

- seek the cooperation of law enforcement authorities in countries that are a source of precursor chemicals in order to cut off the international supply of precursor chemicals to methamphetamine producers.

Enhance Anti-Methamphetamine Trafficking Capabilities

- assist tribal, state, and local authorities with training, cleanup, and enforcement initiatives;

DRAFT

DOJ_NMG_0028687

- enhance intelligence gathering capabilities through the OCDETF Fusion Center and the El Paso Intelligence Center; and

Maximize Department Resources in the Area of Prevention and Education

- coordinate efforts of DOJ components to assure that available resources for training, prevention, intervention, and treatment efforts are deployed efficiently and in a manner that serves overarching policy goals.

PRIORITY THREE: DRUG ENFORCEMENT

Strategic Objectives and Initiatives:

I. Establish the Anti-Methamphetamine Coordination Committee

a. Ensure the most effective coordination of anti-meth efforts by the Department of Justice.

i. Participants: OLP, OLA, DEA, ATF, OTJ, BOP, NMCI, CRIM, ENRD, OJP, HIDTA, EOUSA, COPS, OPA, OIPL, FBI, USMS, OAAG, OCDETF, NDIC, USAs.

ii. Establish Clear Objectives:

1. Implement 2006 Department's Meth Initiatives.

2. Develop a quarterly Meth Report for the Department.

3. Prepare 2008 Budget for Meth.

4. Coordinate Department policy and efforts with the 2006 Synthetic Drug Control Strategy.

iii. Develop Methamphetamine Trafficking Intelligence.

1. Prepare, within the next 120 days, an up-to-date assessment of methamphetamine trafficking into, and within, the United States.

2. Receive work product and briefing from the participants in Anti-drug Intelligence community.

DRAFT

DOJ_NMG_0028688

3. Direct NDIC to produce, in selected regions, methamphetamine-specific regional intelligence assessments to establish the current baseline threat and periodic (120-180 day) follow-up assessments.

4. DEA and State will continue to review the feasibility of employing newly emerging technologies to identify, monitor, and intercept foreign shipments of precursor chemical diverted from appropriate commercial distribution channels.

II. Decrease Methamphetamine Production

a. Enhance international cooperation to decrease illegal importation of methamphetamine and chemicals.

b. Build Mexican capacity to tackle its methamphetamine and chemical problem.

i. Full clandestine lab training by DEA Quantico for Mexican counterparts. (March 2006)

ii. DEA will offer basic identification, interdiction, and clan lab training seminars to state and local police agencies in key Mexican states on an ongoing basis. (NAS-funded, 40-50 per class, about 2 per month, coordinated by Mexican nationals using U.S. instructors – March-December 2006)

iii. Offer interdiction training opportunities including:

1. Share "best practices" with Mexican law enforcement on how to interdict chemicals by land, sea, border and highway. (August/September 2006)

2. Operation Jetway training in airport interdiction – offer classes to Mexican law enforcement assigned to the Mexico City Airport to be followed by several other identical training at DEA's various resident offices in Mexico (e.g. Guadalajara, Tijuana, Monterrey, etc.).

iv. One week chemical identification class to Mexican FDA-type groups that have jurisdiction over precursor chemicals and pharmaceutical drugs. (Tentative)

v. Support Mexican outreach efforts, including –

DRAFT

DOJ_NMG_0028689

1. Educating "first responders" (e.g., fire, ambulance, etc.); and

2. Raising public awareness of the dangers of meth labs and destructive nature of the drug.

vi. Provide material assistance to Mexico, including surplus clan lab trucks and safety and testing equipment.

c. Convene Principals meeting: Attorneys General of the U.S. and Mexico to meet during the National Methamphetamine & Chemicals Initiative Conference. (May 2006)

d. Partnership with Precursor Source Countries.

i. Convene Hong Kong Conference to monitor flow and identify suspect shipments of ephedrine and pseudoephedrine; ask precursor source countries to share historical and current data on production and distribution through law enforcement channels. (February 2006) COMPLETED (partial success – resolution makes info sharing voluntary and references national laws)

ii. Petition Commission on Narcotics Drugs in Vienna. The United States will seek a resolution by all nations that are signatories to the various UN drug and precursor conventions to provide and share information relating to their annual requirements for key meth precursors. (March 2006) COMPLETED

iii. DEA will continue to work with the State Department and ONDCP to raise the awareness and profile of the problem of meth production and the largely unregulated flow of chemicals that permits it in international contacts. DEA and DOJ sit on international committees that specifically address international precursor chemical issues with producing countries such as India, China, and Germany.

e. Monitor and ensure enforcement of the key methamphetamine precursor provisions in the Combat Meth Act.

i. Retail sales limited to 3.6 grams;

ii. Behind the counter and related provisions; and,

iii. Spot market control.

DRAFT

f. Support State and Local Law Enforcement.

i. Promote groundbreaking for Clan Lab Training Center at Quantico in Spring 2006.

ii. Travel to states to promote the Combat Meth Act provisions and encourage federal, state, tribal, and local partnership in the fight against methamphetamine. (GA, MO)

OCDETF will work with NDIC to integrate docex with existing Post Seizure Analysis Teams (PSATs) pursued by OCDETF in OCDETF's 9 Regions. PSATs, an OCDETF initiative, involves partnering with and training state and local law enforcement with the ultimate goal of fully exploiting evidence collected from highway interdictions. Pursuant to these initiatives, state and locals have agreed to contact the PSATs who collect and analyze evidence from the scene for subsequent follow-up, with the goal of linking these seizures to organizations.

III. Enhance Anti-Methamphetamine Trafficking Capabilities

a. Partner with Mexican counterparts to build cases against distribution groups.

i. Encourage agents, investigators, and prosecutors to engage in bilateral investigations and prosecutions working with trusted Mexican counterparts to prosecute key members of methamphetamine distribution organizations.

ii. Post a NDDS attorney in Mexico City to work with Mexican counterparts to develop meth chemical cases in both countries.

iii. Designate a dedicated NDDS meth/chemicals prosecutor.

b. Intensify domestic enforcement efforts against methamphetamine traffickers.

i. Continue the redirection of DEA Mobile Enforcement Teams (METs) to prioritize the investigation of methamphetamine crimes, coordinating with DEA's Clandestine Lab Enforcement Teams where necessary.

ii. Expand the focus of DEA's existing Clan Lab Enforcement Teams, comprised of agents and task force officers, to enhance efforts in areas particularly hard hit by meth in order to identify meth targets or help with ongoing investigations.

iii. Enhance the use of DEA's chemical importer inspection teams that can be quickly deployed to perform on-site inspections of DEA registered importers if information is developed that indicates possible diversion at importer facilities.

iv. Encourage U.S. Attorneys to grant high priority to the prosecution of methamphetamine "cooks" and repeat offenders in areas where methamphetamine is a problem, even if the cooks are not large-scale.

v. Seek a new mandatory minimum sentence or, alternatively, a new sentencing guideline to establish a federal sentencing floor of approximately 3 to 4 years for any meth lab operator.

vi. Consider amendments to the CSA to reach international chemical trafficking to third countries where meth is destined for the U.S.

vii. Promote the OCDETF Fusion Center. Commit one section of the OCDETF Fusion Center to analyze data gathered in investigations to determine whether there are connections among and between existing cases in an effort to support cases involving CPOT-level traffickers in methamphetamine and precursor chemicals.

viii. Suspicious Activity Reports (SAR): Encourage United States Attorney's Offices to establish Suspicious Activity Report Review Teams.

ix. Increase prosecutor and LEA Training. (per National Synthetic Drug Action Plan (Oct. 2004)

x. Enhance partnership between EPIC and OCDETF Fusion Center in order to include all relevant EPIC databases and analytical capabilities concerning the movement of drugs and other contraband, as well as organizations that control them, across the Southwest Border.

xi. The Trifecta: Guns – Gangs – Drugs: Analyze Nexus between Guns – Gangs – Drugs. Coordinate with Gang groups to address Meth and Gangs.

IV. Methamphetamine and Indian Country

a. Focus on the Department's unique responsibilities to federally recognized tribes and recognize that methamphetamine production, use, and distribution is a major issue in Indian country.

   i. Promote the continued use of regional multi-jurisdictional investigative task forces to combat methamphetamine in Indian Country, consistent with the federal government's exclusive investigative and prosecutorial jurisdiction over felony level offenses in Indian country.

   ii. Support U.S. Attorneys and Federal investigative agencies efforts to adjust threshold amounts as necessary based on the needs of tribal communities and specific prosecution and investigation strategies.

   iii. Provide tribal law enforcement training for the management of methamphetamine investigations as force multiplier in Indian country.

   iv. When conducting intelligence gathering include a representative from the FBI's Indian Country Unit. Despite enhanced efforts by DEA, the FBI is still the primary federal law entity investigating drug offenses in Indian country. Information on trafficking in Indian country is often not reflected in information obtained from general intelligence sources. Should additional Indian country intelligence or background be needed, the Office of Tribal Justice would also welcome the opportunity to sit on the Intelligence Group.

V. Demand Reduction Strategies and the 2008 Budget

a. Establish Demand Reduction Subcommittee

   i. Participants: OLP, DEA, EOUSA, OJP, OTJ, OPA, OIPL, BOP, COPS

   ii. Coordinate efforts of DOJ components to ensure that available resources are deployed efficiently

   iii. Develop comprehensive list of all existing Demand Reduction programs

   iv. Gather existing DOJ component anti-methamphetamine educational materials/best practices

v. Coordinate DOJ sponsored anti-methamphetamine conferences

b. Identify methamphetamine user demographics to ensure that the Department's efforts are appropriately focused

i. Review all existing studies on methamphetamine use:

1. National Survey of Drug Use and Health (NSDUH)

2. Monitoring the Future (MTF)

3. Youth Risk behavior Surveillance System (YRBSS)

4. Treatment and Episode Data Set (TEDS)

5. Drug Abuse Warning Network (DAWN)

6. Arrestee Drug Abuse Monitoring (ADAM)

7. Quest Diagnostics Drug Testing Index

ii. Commission new research if appropriate and feasible

c. Create educational programs directed at groups that currently are underserved by existing DOJ and other anti-methamphetamine education efforts

i. Identify underserved groups:

1. College students (near average age of first use)

2. Women (use meth almost as much as men, unlike other drugs)

3. Workforce/professions (encompass most of meth using population, but are only reached if enter hospital or treatment, or get arrested)

4. Tribes (meth use doubled between 2000 and 2004)

ii. Draft plans to disseminate educational materials to each group identified

DRAFT

DOJ_NMG_0028694

d. Partner with industry and the private sector as a force multiplier in education and prevention efforts

   i. Identify corporations that can help disseminate educational materials (e.g., through advertising/banner space)

   ii. Identify corporations with large percentage of methamphetamine use and assist with establishing or improving drug free workplace programs

   iii. Establish good corporate citizen awards

e. Continue to support drug endangered children (DEC) programs.

   i. Collect DEC educational/best practices

   ii. Ensure relevant DOJ websites link to best practices DEC sites

f. Coordinate National Methamphetamine Awareness Day (NMAD) (October 2006)

   i. Coordinate with potential cosponsors

   ii. Develop list of target forums for meth education efforts on NMAD.

   iii. Develop list of participating organizations, to include all USAOs and federal law enforcement agency field offices

   iv. Develop educational materials for dissemination on NMAD

   v. Conduct coordinated media outreach effort

Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF)

Accomplishments:

- During the past year, ATF has seized numerous firearms, real estate, currency, vehicles, and methamphetamine as a result of investigations into methamphetamine trafficking.

Training:

- ATF offers training to our law enforcement partners in the identification of improvised explosive devices used as booby traps in clandestine meth labs.

In progress/future plans:

- ATF continues to work with other federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies to combat the proliferation of methamphetamine. ATF's expertise in firearm and explosives investigations enhances investigations of methamphetamine trafficking organizations utilizing firearms and/or explosives. ATF has numerous undercover investigations currently underway into outlaw motorcycle gangs (OMG) that distribute meth.

Bureau of Prisons (BOP)

Accomplishments:

- Consistent with the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, BOP provides appropriate substance abuse treatment to 100% of all eligible inmates, including inmates with a diagnosis of methamphetamine abuse or dependence. This program has been proven to reduce recidivism and relapse for participants.

Training:

- No information.

In progress/future plans:

- In FY 06, BOP will continue to provide substance abuse treatment to all eligible inmates.

Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS)

Accomplishments:

- COPS supports state, local and tribal law enforcement and their fight against methamphetamine through grants, training, technical assistance, conferences, best practices, publications, and evaluations. Since 1998, COPS has invested more than $385 million nationwide to combat the spread of methamphetamine.

- DARE America used COPS funding to educate youth on the dangers of meth use.

- COPS Publications:
  - Clandestine Drug Labs Guide
  - Combating Methamphetamine Laboratories and Abuse: Strategies for Success
  - Drug Dealing in Open Air Markets Guide
  - Drug Dealing in Privately Owned Apartment Complexes Guide
  - Prescription Fraud Guide

DOJ_NMG_0028696

- Rave Parties Guide
- Evaluation of the COPS Meth Program (evaluates COPS' first six methamphetamine grants)

Training:

- The California Department of Justice used COPS funding to establish the Western Regional Training Center, which provides training on a variety of methamphetamine-related issues, including clan lab training, to law enforcement agencies from California and 12 other western states.

- Circle Solutions, Inc. used COPS funding to develop and deliver awareness training on community policing approaches to meth reduction.

- COPS funded Regional Community Policing Institutes (RCPI) in Carolinas, Colorado, Florida, Oregon

- COPS sponsored COPS hosted five annual national meth conferences for grantees that brought together the nation's leading meth enforcement experts and practitioners.

In progress/future plans:

- For FY 06, COPS is working to distribute $63.5 million to meth-related efforts. Of that amount, $43.8M is earmarked. $19.7M is for the DEA to assist state and local law enforcement with DEC programs, clandestine meth labs hazmat removal and disposal, and container programs, including funds for training, technical assistance, and purchase of equipment to remove and store hazardous waste.

  - Meth Earmark Projects include training to prevent and detect methamphetamine operations, augmenting enforcement efforts, reducing production, enhancing prevention, monitoring precursor chemical sales, expanding treatment, intelligence gathering and effective prosecution preparation, equipment purchases to develop needed infrastructure, and clean-up efforts for methamphetamine manufacturing by-products.

- COPS is also currently working to make over 100 grant awards to state and local law enforcement programs to combat meth production and distribution; to target drug "hot spots"; and to remove and dispose of hazardous materials at clandestine meth labs. The application deadline is May 31, 2006. COPS plans to have all of these awards obligated by September of this year.

- In FY 2007, the COPS Methamphetamine program will continue to provide resources to improve the crime fighting and criminal justice system capabilities of state, tribal, and local governments. The FY 2007 request includes $40 million for local law enforcement meth clean up efforts led by the DEA.

DOJ_NMG_0028697

Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA)

Accomplishments:

- Since January 1, 2003, the Document Exploitation (Doc Ex) Division has completed 25 methamphetamine/pseudoephedrine missions. A synopsis of significant missions follows:

  - DEA Guadalajara, Mexico –On January 5, 2006, a meth lab was discovered in Guadalajara. 500 kilos of meth, 11 kilos of ephedrine, 18 fifty-five gallon drums of hydriodic acid, 50 five-gallon cans of acetone, 11 large "cookers," 60 sacks of sodium hydroxide, and an assortment of laboratory equipment were seized. A Doc Ex mission will be conducted at a date to be determined.

  - FBI Sacramento (March 2006) – Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of an FBI Sacramento investigation into five Palestinian brothers who were sending large amounts of cash to the West Bank, including to accounts, businesses, and individuals associated with Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The brothers generated revenue by supplying large quantities of pseudoephedrine to Mexican meth organizations and retail businesses. The proceeds were moved to the Middle East through wire transfers, overseas money exchangers, and bulk shipments of cash and money orders.

  - DEA Oklahoma City (March 14-24, 2006), Operation Surge – Doc Ex and Comp Ex deployed in support of an investigation by DEA Oklahoma City, the Central Oklahoma Metro Interdiction Team (COMIT), and the Oklahoma Highway Patrol. The team exploited documents and telephone numbers from three real-time seizures and eight historical cases, and performed additional database queries and analysis at NDIC.

  - DEA Atlanta (Chattanooga) (November 2005) – Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of an OCDETF investigation by DEA Chattanooga. The investigation targeted the intentional distribution of chemicals, primarily pseudoephedrine and ephedrine, and equipment by businesses to individuals engaged in the manufacture of meth. Comp Ex conducted forensic analysis on six computers seized in this investigation.

  - DEA Miami (Ft. Lauderdale) (September 2005) –Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of an investigation of a meth manufacturer by DEA Fort Lauderdale. Through the exploitation of the data on the suspect's computer, the case agents were able to discover child pornography to support additional charges against the suspect.

  - DEA Washington, DC (Wheeling, WV) (August 2005) –Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of an investigation by DEA Wheeling targeting an individual suspected of producing and selling methamphetamine. Comp Ex conducted forensic analysis on one computer seized in this investigation.

- DEA Seattle (Portland) (May 2005) – Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of an investigation by DEA Portland targeting individuals ordering, via the Internet, large quantities of precursor chemicals for the production of meth. These individuals had used several different names and e-mail addresses to purchase the precursor chemicals.

- DEA Seattle (Portland) (May 2005) – Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of an investigation by DEA Portland targeting a meth manufacturer. The suspect originally was a source of supply to area motorcycle gangs in Salt Lake City, but had relocated his operations to the Portland area. Comp Ex conducted forensic analysis on five computers seized in this investigation.

- DEA Phoenix (May 2005) – Doc Ex deployed to Phoenix, Arizona, in support of a DEA Phoenix OCDETF investigation targeting a meth, cocaine, and marijuana trafficking organization. This organization principally obtained its drugs from a source in Mexico, and oversees the distribution of the narcotics to California, Nebraska, and New Mexico, as well as the eventual transfer of drug proceeds back to Mexico.

- FBI Omaha (April 2005) – Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of a FBI Omaha OCDETF investigation called "Operation Backtrack." The investigation targeted an organization distributing large quantities of meth in south-central Nebraska. The first Doc Ex mission in support of this investigation was conducted in May 2003. The Doc Ex information identified additional locations to search for assets.

- DEA Hong Kong (March 2005) – Doc Ex conducted an in-house mission in support of a DEA Hong Kong and SOD coordinated investigation. The investigation targeted an organization that provided chemists and lab equipment to establish crystal methamphetamine mega-labs for various drug trafficking organizations in Southeast Asia. To date, one lab has been seized in the United States.

Training:

- DEA sponsors Meth Summits (11 so far). Upcoming summits will be in Alabama, New York and D.C. area. DRCs conduct meth training at national conferences. Additionally, Victim Witness specialists speak at DEC conferences and work with state DEC alliances.

- In 2007, DEA will open the new Clandestine Laboratory Training Center at the DEA Training Academy. The Clandestine Laboratory Training Unit has successfully trained thousands of DEA personnel and state and local officers. The new Training Center will enhance the current training programs, and allow for the flexibility necessary to combat an ever-changing threat.

- DEA's Clandestine Laboratory Training program certifies Special Agents, Forensic Chemists, and state and local officers to comply with OSHA standards regarding hazardous waste operations. It also provides training on how to operate safely in a clan lab environment, and offers tailored awareness training for different groups.

Clan Lab Seminar

- DEA has also entered into a partnership with the National Guard Midwest Counter-Drug Training Center (MCTC) in Des Moines, Iowa, to conduct joint training.

- DEA has also worked with individual states receiving grants to conduct basic certification schools. DEA has coordinated state-funded schools in Illinois, South Carolina, Florida, and Virginia.

- If funded, DEA will train Mexican law enforcement on methamphetamine and clandestine labs. INL funded training, scheduled to be conducted by contractors, will train an additional 650 Mexican law enforcement officials by the end of 2006.

In progress/future plans:
- The DEA's efforts to combat the methamphetamine problem include a vigorous enforcement program targeting major drug and chemical trafficking organizations, domestic and international precursor chemical controls, the identification and clean up of small toxic laboratories, drug prevention and education programs, and training of DEA personnel and its domestic and international law enforcement counterparts.

- Methamphetamine Task Force (MTF)
  The MTF is dedicated to the improvement of the federal government's response to methamphetamine. The MTF is comprised of DEA, DOJ, and ONDCP representatives. The MTF will collect, analyze, and disseminate information concerning meth trafficking. The MTF will identify specific issues that require action and will work with the Synthetic Drugs Interagency Working Group on potential solutions. The MTF first met in March 2006 and plans to meet on a monthly basis.

- Drug & Chemical Enforcement Initiatives
  - 7 of the 44 organizations on the FY 2006 CPOT list (16 percent) are engaged in methamphetamine trafficking. At the end of the first quarter of FY 2006, DEA had 31 PTO investigations with methamphetamine as the primary drug type. Since the inception of the PTO program in FY 2001, DEA has disrupted 223, and dismantled 204, PTOs with methamphetamine as the primary drug type.

  - Since March 2005, DEA Mobile Enforcement Teams (METs) have prioritized meth investigations. In FY 2005, 41 percent of new MET deployments targeted methamphetamine trafficking organizations.

  - DEA has a Special Investigative Unit (SIU) program in Mexico, working with Mexican law enforcement to combat meth.

  - DEA, in conjunction with the Department of States Office of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs (INL), is working to improve the enforcement and intelligence collection capabilities of our Mexican counterparts through training and commodities assistance programs, including clandestine lab and precursor chemical training programs in Mexico during the coming year.

  - DEA is working with the international law enforcement and precursor control community to improve international chemical controls. DEA attended the Precursor Chemical Producer's Meeting in Hong Kong in February 2006, and the 49th Commission on Narcotic Drugs (CND) in Vienna, Austria in March 2006.

  - In FY 2005, DEA administered approximately 8,700 clandestine lab clean ups for state and local agencies.

  - DEA Clandestine Laboratory Enforcement Teams (CLET or Team) now also target major Mexico and U.S. based Mexican organizations involved in the manufacture, trafficking, and distribution of methamphetamine.

  - In 2003, DEA began the Authorized Central Storage Program (ACS), otherwise known as the Container Storage Program, to expedite the removal of seized chemicals at clandestine drug laboratories, thereby minimizing on-site wait time for law enforcement, and overtime costs. A pilot program was successfully initiated in Kentucky. Alabama, Illinois, Nebraska, Indiana, and Oklahoma have also signed letters of agreement to participate in the program.

- Demand Reduction / Prevention / Education Initiatives

  - DEA's Demand Reduction program enhances prevention programs across the nation by developing strategic alliances with prevention and treatment agencies, community coalitions, and state and local governments. With its partners like the Partnership for Drug Free America, DEA engages in aggressive public messaging campaigns to illustrate the consequences of drug use. These efforts include PSAs and on-the-ground outreach with pediatricians, editorial boards, and community leaders.

  - Demand Reduction Coordinators (DRC) in 31 Field Divisions work on meth prevention.

  - In 2005, DEA and the Elks collaborated on a publication titled "Meth: It's Everyone's Problem." The Elks have also agreed to publish a teen meth magazine.

  - DEA sponsors a traveling exhibit called "Target America: Opening Eyes to the Damage Drugs Cause." The exhibit includes a replica of a hotel room with a meth lab.

  - DEA's teen website Justthinktwice.com has a portion called "Got Meth?" dedicated to meth issues. Since its launch, the site has attracted 1.5 million visitors.

Environmental and Natural Resources Division

Accomplishments:

- ENRD did not report any methamphetamine related activity prior to April 2006.

Training:

- ENRD plans to incorporate a meth component into existing training programs for (1) federal land managers and investigators, and (2) federal, state and local prosecutors, investigators, and regulators. There will be no separate ENRD budget item for meth training. Existing programs include:
  - Environmental Crimes Seminar at the NAC (May 8-12), which is ENRD's principal environmental crimes training program for prosecutors
  - Environmental Crimes Policy Committee, which is led by the Environmental Crimes Section, and attended by prosecutors and government lawyers
  - Regional state environmental association meetings
  - Law enforcement coordinating committee meetings and task force meetings

DOJ_NMG_0028702

- Training at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Brunswick, GA.

In progress/future plans:

- In FY 06, there will be "a surge day" on the U.S./Mexican border looking for violations of environmental criminal laws. Enforcement personnel will look for meth and its precursors.

- The Environmental Crimes Section will prosecute, or provide support for, meth cases charged as environmental crimes, as appropriate.

National Drug Intelligence Center (NDIC)

Accomplishments:

- During the past year, NDIC has produced a number of intelligence products and briefings pertaining, either in whole or in part, to methamphetamine trafficking and abuse, including:

- Treat Assessments:
  - National Drug Threat Assessment 2006
  - Marijuana and Methamphetamine Trafficking on Federal Lands Threat Assessment
  - Methamphetamine and Identity Theft Intelligence Bulletin
  - Methamphetamine Prices and Profit Margins Intelligence Bulletin
  - Native American Reservation Lands Drug Threat Assessment
  - U.S.-Canada Drug Smuggling Threat Assessment
  - Bilateral U.S.-Canada Drug Smuggling Threat Assessment
  - 6 Regional Drug Threat Assessments
  - 37 Drug Market Analyses

- Special Projects:
  - Paper prepared for the Office of Congressman Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina – Methamphetamine Laboratory Seizures and Children Affected Nationwide, in North Carolina, and in the 10th Congressional District of North Carolina
  - Paper prepared for the Office of Congressman Collin C. Peterson, Minnesota – The methamphetamine situation in Minnesota and in the Seventh Congressional District of Minnesota
  - Paper prepared for the Office of Congressman John E. Peterson, Pennsylvania, 5th District – Using liquid preparations of pseudoephedrine in methamphetamine production
  - Paper prepared for the Office of Congressman William M. "Mac" Thornberry, Texas – The methamphetamine threat in Texas and the 13th Congressional District
  - Paper prepared for Mr. J. Spencer Morgan, Subcommittee Legislative Assistant, Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security Committee on the Judiciary – Methamphetamine production using the three predominant methods (Lithium/Ammonia, Phenyl-2-Propanone, and Red Phosphorus); Powder and ice methamphetamine production in Asia and distribution in the United States

- Paper prepared for the American Academy of Pediatrics – The presence of children at methamphetamine laboratories

- Briefings:
  - Methamphetamine Situation brief for the Western District of Oklahoma Methamphetamine Conference
  - Methamphetamine Situation on Big Ten College Campuses brief for the Big Ten Campus Police Conference
  - Anhydrous Ammonia in Methamphetamine Production brief for the Congressional Caucus to Fight and Control Methamphetamine
  - National Methamphetamine Situation brief for the U.S. Interdiction Coordinator
  - National Methamphetamine Situation brief for Congressman J.M. Peterson, Titusville, Pa Community Methamphetamine Summit
  - National Methamphetamine Situation brief for Virginia Methamphetamine Leadership Summit

Training:
- No information

In progress/future plans:
- In FY 2006, NDIC anticipates producing several meth-related intelligence products, including:
  - National Drug Threat Assessment 2007
  - National Methamphetamine Threat Assessment
  - 9 Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force (OCDETF) Regional Drug Threat Assessments
  - 32 High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area (HIDTA) Program Market Analyses
  - 9 OCDETF Regional Methamphetamine Assessments
  - Special Projects and briefings relating to methamphetamine, upon request.

Office of Intergovernmental and Public Liaison (OIPL)

Accomplishments:
- Outreach to Groups Working to Prevent or Treat Methamphetamine Use: OIPL has established relationships with national organizations representing the interests of state and local law enforcement, prosecution offices, child protection advocates, and other state and local government officials, including state legislators. OIPL has also established relationships with key meth substance abuse treatment and counseling service providers and groups that work to prevent meth use.
- Outreach to College Groups: OIPL contacted leading associations of institutions of higher education, such as county and community colleges, independent colleges, and the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA), to understand the ways in which their members are addressing meth use. With the exception of the NCAA's general program to combat drug use, it appears that institutions of higher education do not see meth use as a significant issue.

Training:

- No information

In progress/future:

- OIPL will continue to work to develop and implement an outreach strategy.

Office of Justice Programs

Accomplishments:

Speakers included Special Agent Philippa Levine, Dangerous Drugs & Chemical Section; Deb Augustine with national overview of Meth victims and drug endangered children; and one state's response to Meth Abuse and its victims by Holly Hopper, Kentucky DEC Training Network. This week included two additional lectures on Identity Theft and Child Safety. Resources were provided to all attendees.

- NIJ Published Methamphetamine Use: Lessons Learned (NIJ sponsored, May 2005, NCJ 209730) serves as an overview of meth, including a review of the history of the meth problem, trends in its use, characteristics of users, adverse effects, production and trafficking, and treatment. The analysis involved a literature review of the extant knowledge on meth, a review of the existing datasets relevant to meth, and interviews with law enforcement and government personnel.

- National DEC Training Coordinator for DEC Programs. Since September 2003, OVC, through USAO-SDCA, has provided $233,000 to cover the salary and training costs of the coordinator. The program has trained thousands of individuals and many communities to respond to the children found at meth sites. In the past 6 months the program has conducted training for over 3,000 individuals. The coordinator follows up with trained communities to monitor the impact of the training sessions. Many of the trained communities develop their own DEC Programs. A request from USAO-SD CA for $205,000 to continue the project funding is being reviewed to determine whether these funds will be needed.

- Substance Dependence, Abuse, and Treatment of Jail Inmates, 2002, (BJS 2005) presents data on inmates' prior use, dependence, and abuse of alcohol and illegal drugs. Prior drug use by jail inmates by type of drug is provided, however, meth use is not presented as an individual category; rather it is included within a "stimulant" category.

Training:

- Interagency Agreement for Training and Technical Assistance with DEA (OVC) (October 1, 2003), provides support for DEA's Victim Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) through funding for travel, lodging, per diem, registration, and consulting costs to assist in the agency's training and technical assistance efforts to better serve federal victims of crime.

In progress/future plans:

- National Drug Endangered Children (DEC) Resource Center will raise awareness of the problem of drug endangered children; provide information and respond to inquiries from individuals, agencies, and communities in establishing or maintaining DEC programs; and provide a forum for experts in the various fields who serve drug endangered children. The Resource Center will provide a national resource for individuals, communities, states, and federal agencies working to combat the problem of drug endangered children. A grant for the center, totaling $605,000 for the first year, will be awarded to the National Alliance for Drug Endangered Children. \

- Multi-jurisdictional Methamphetamine Task Forces (MMTFs): Will make available funding to support the development of multi-jurisdictional, local law enforcement task forces to address meth production, trafficking, and use. MMTFs will work in a coordinated and collaborative fashion with federal law enforcement entities.

Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA)

- BJA also maintains http://www.methresources.gov/.

- Sponsoring the following programs:
  - Drug Court programs

  - Meth Response Training for Tribal Law Enforcement: Will provide up to 10 intensive meth investigation management training sessions for Tribal law enforcement officers and officers from neighboring jurisdictions. This training will focus on managing meth investigations, with a special emphasis on officer safety.

  - Indian Alcohol and Substance Abuse (IASA): Designed to improve comprehensive responses to drug and alcohol abuse on tribal lands, addressing the demand for these illicit substances. In FY 2006 and 2007, DOJ=s Bureau of Justice Assistance will work with Tribal communities to determine the impact of methamphetamine on their communities and to develop appropriate responses to address them.

  - Reentry of Methamphetamine Addicted Offenders: A pilot project with selected communities to develop innovative, promising reentry supervision and service practices for methamphetamine addicted offenders returning to the community.

  - Residential Substance Abuse Treatment (RSAT) Grant Program: Assists states and local governments in developing and implementing residential substance abuse treatment programs in their correctional and detention facilities. RSAT programs provide individual and group treatment activities for offenders, and must last between 6 and 12 months, be provided in residential treatment facilities set apart from the general correctional population, focus on the substance abuse problems of the inmate, and develop the inmate's cognitive, behavioral, social, vocational, and other skills to solve the substance abuse and related problems. In FY06, $9,600,000 was awarded to the states in support of the RSAT program.

  - Expand Community, Law Enforcement, and Youth Partnerships: In partnership with the Boys and Girls Clubs of America and many other national crime prevention and youth development organizations, DOJ will make meth demand reduction a special focus of its 3rd Annual Law Enforcement and Youth Partnerships for Crime Prevention Conference, scheduled for October 2006. This conference involves over 100 teams of law enforcement and community leaders which gain exposure to dozens of promising strategies that engage law enforcement, community leaders and youth in prevention-oriented activities, including drug-demand reduction strategies. Each team creates a blueprint for action that can be implemented when they return home, with assistance and training from many of the initiative co-sponsors.

- Ensuring Law Enforcement Officer Safety: DOJ=s Office of Justice Programs will undertake a review of the latest scientific information available regarding the health risks for law enforcement officers and other justice professionals associated with exposure to meth. OJP will work with its national partners to ensure that the latest exposure research findings are readily available to law enforcement agencies and are incorporated into training for these officers. Products such as publications and audiovisual productions may also be developed and disseminated.

- New/Proposed Efforts (No current funding):

  - Engaging the Community: Will call on Neighborhood Watch groups to join in the fight against meth. Created in 2002, the USAonwatch initiative will include a special focus on meth, engaging citizens in the struggle to eradicate meth labs, to protect children from exposure to meth or its hazards, and to work closely with local businesses to prevent the theft and excessive purchase of methamphetamine precursor chemicals.

  - Drug Endangered Children (DEC): DOJ will provide support for enhanced, multi-disciplinary-focused training, technical assistance, and other efforts to address DEC. Such support will further the development of standard response protocols, delivery of a standardized training curriculum through existing DOJ training entities, enable the identification and promotion of promising approaches and programs, and support national DEC conferences and training.

Bureau of Justice Statistics

- Forthcoming Publications and Reports:

  - Report on law enforcement meth clandestine laboratories training (Early 2007). In June 2006, BJS will field a survey of law enforcement training academies which will include items on specialized training, including training in the identification of, response to, and handling of meth clan labs.

  - Drug Abuse and Treatment, State and Federal Prisoners, 2004 (Summer 2006). The report will provide national estimates of drug involvement, including meth, among the prison population. Also included will be a profile of meth. These findings are from the 2004 Survey of Inmates in State and Federal Correctional Facilities that interviewed about 14,000 State prisoners and another 6,000 Federal prisoners. A number of the questions asked of the inmates pertained to their drug use habits and behaviors and their need for treatment (tracking DSM-IV and HHS and NIAAA definitions of treatment need).

- Federal Criminal Justice Trends 2003, which contains data on meth-related arrests by DEA (1994-2003), including regional and demographic breakdowns.

- Through the State Justice Statistics Program (SJS), BJS provides funds to the Program for Statistical Analysis Centers (SACs) in the states. SACs collect, analyze, and report statistics on crime and justice. In 2006, one of the themes for the SJS is the impact of meth abuse on state and local criminal justice and public health systems.

- BJS staff will attend "Meth: What's Working? What's Next?" (Helena, MT May 15-16, 2006), which is a joint project of the Wheeler Center, the Montana Governor's Office, the Montana DOJ, the Montana Meth Project and the MSU 4H Center for Youth Development.

Community Capacity Development Office (CCDO)

- Meth Lab Special Emphasis Area: FY 2006 Weed and Seed Continuation Sites may apply for up to $25,000 to implement targeted programs that may encompass Meth Lab/Environmental Activities. This Special Emphasis Area provides funds for training, equipment, and contractor expenses needed to handle, contain, and dispose of these dangerous substances at meth labs.

National Institute of Justice (NIJ)

- Controlling Methamphetamine Precursors: from Policy to Practice (NIJ Grant Award #2005-IJ-CX-0028) will provide policy makers, practitioners, and researchers with both a macro and detailed picture of state efforts to control meth precursor chemicals. Dissemination plans include working with NIJ to produce practitioner briefs; presentations at relevant NIJ conferences, state practitioner meetings, and scientific meetings; as well as publication in peer-reviewed journals.

- The Chinese Connection: Changing Patterns of Drug Trafficking in the Golden Triangle (NIJ Grant Award #2004-IJ-CX-0023) seeks to build basic knowledge about cross-border drug trafficking in the Golden Triangle and to advance theories on transnational organized crime by examining existing conceptual frameworks in a comparative context with studies of the Latin American drug trade. Two specific drugs will be of particular attention: heroin and amphetamine-type stimulants. Data will be collected through face-to-face interviews with drug enforcement authorities in China, government officials in three Southeast Asian urban centers, warlords in Burma border regions, and convicted drug traffickers in Kunming, China.

- The Voice Stress Analysis Project will contribute to data collection that could easily be used to compare data with earlier research data to show impact, if any, of the "Sudafed Law". Respondents of the voice stress analysis project will be asked a series of questions, including queries about drug use (marijuana, cocaine, opiates, meth, and PCP) in the past 3 days, past 30 days, and past year. At the conclusion of the questionnaire, respondents will be asked to provide a voluntary urine sample. Data collection on drug use among arrestees had been conducted at the proposed research site from 1998 to 2004. The proposed study would provide arrestee urinalysis data that could easily be used to compare with earlier research data using the same protocols.

Office for Victims of Crime (OVC)

Organized Crime and Drug Enforcement Task Force (OCDETF)

Accomplishments:

- OCDETF has refocused its guidelines to target the most significant drug trafficking organizations and their financial infrastructures. Between FY 2003 and 2005, OCDETF had a 59% increase in the number of investigations initiated involving methamphetamine.

- The OCDETF Executive Office requires each of its nine regions to develop and implement annual strategic plans. Strategic initiatives to target the most significant drug threats in each region are a critical component of each region's strategic plan. Several regions have developed methamphetamine initiatives including the Pacific, Southeast, New England, New York/New Jersey and Florida/Caribbean. Other regions have developed strategic initiatives designed to ensnare large poly-drug trafficking organizations by targeting distribution vulnerabilities. These often identify links to organizations involved in methamphetamine trafficking. Highway interdiction initiatives are being carried out by state and local law enforcement. These agencies have agreed to contact federal "Post Seizure Analysis Teams" (PSAT's), which collect and analyze evidence from the scene for subsequent follow up. PSAT's have been effective in identifying links to OCDETF investigations across the country, many involving methamphetamine distribution.

- The following cases demonstrate the types of investigations OCDETF partner agencies are conducting to attack the methamphetamine threat.

  - OPERATION 700 ROUND UP
    On March 7, 2006, the DEA Dallas Field Division MET concluded a nine-month deployment and OCDETF investigation that resulted in the dismemberment of seven methamphetamine trafficking organizations and two crack cocaine organizations. The investigation targeted Rocky Salazar (Priority Target) who headed a street gang named Satan's Disciples, which was responsible for distributing methamphetamine in the Gainesville, Texas area. The Satan's Disciples also distributed narcotics and laundered money in three separate casinos located on Indian Reservations in Oklahoma. The investigation culminated with the arrest of 93 individuals (81 state and 12 federal), including Salazar, and the seizure of 0.6 kilograms of crack cocaine, 0.2 kilograms of powder cocaine, 2.5 kilograms of marijuana, 8.8 kilograms of methamphetamine, 0.6 kilograms of GHB, 65 firearms, $167,000 in U.S. currency, $70,000 in real property, and four vehicles. DEA conducted this enforcement operation together with ATF, BIA, the Chickasaw Indian Nation, and state and local officers from Texas and Oklahoma.

- OPERATION WEST EASY
  In the Fall of 2003, the Los Angeles Field Division of the DEA began an investigation of Ventura Rios who was identified as a lieutenant for the Zambada-Garcia Drug Trafficking Organization, a CPOT target. Ismael Rodriguez worked for Rios and headed a cell in California. Rodriguez was assisted by a group in Arkansas that was involved in transporting and distributing approximately 60 kilograms of meth and 20 kilograms of cocaine a year. DEA Los Angeles and DEA Fayetteville worked together to investigate the Arkansas cell of the organization. They conducted four wire taps during one sixty day period. 12 pounds of methamphetamine and 2 kilograms of cocaine were seized, including a load of methamphetamine and cocaine that was being transported from California to Minnesota by an Arkansas member of the organization. 14 defendants, including all the leaders of the Arkansas cell, were eventually convicted.
  The financial investigation revealed drug proceeds were either transported or wire transferred from Arkansas to Rodriguez in California. Approximately $750,000 worth of assets was seized from Rodriguez.

- OPERATION ICE BREAKER
  This investigation resulted in the conviction of 28 defendants in Nebraska for conspiring to distribute more than 600 pounds of methamphetamine, which was transported to Nebraska from California. Proceeds from the drug sales were collected and transported back to California after the bills were exchanged for $100 bills at local retail stores, and larger transactions were laundered at area casinos. Connections to seven other DEA investigations in the Midwest, Oregon, and California were established including a link to one Regional Priority Target (RPOT). In addition, one of the principal targets was linked to a money launderer with ties to the Arellano-Felix Organization which is a designated CPOT. A number of firearms, one Ford Harley Davidson model pickup, and over $150,000 in currency was seized.

- OPERATION WYLIE COYOTE
  This investigation targeted a large drug trafficking organization in the Fargo, ND/ Moorhead, MN, area operated by Ruben Hernandez, who supervised the organization from jail. The Hernandez organization obtained large quantities of methamphetamine, marijuana, and cocaine by an organization in Fresno, California, operated by Alejandrino Guerrero. Guerrero's organization was supplying another organization in North Dakota located on the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation. This organization was estimated to be transporting approximately 227 kilograms of methamphetamine and 68 kilograms of cocaine on an annual basis, as well as laundering $1,000,000 in currency annually. 27 defendants were indicted during the course of this case. Sentences ranged from probation to 22 years in prison. This case was investigated by numerous state and federal law enforcement agencies including: DEA, IRS, ICE, ATF, USAO -

DOJ_NMG_0028713

District of ND, USAO - Eastern District of California, USAO - District of Nevada, Las Vegas Police Department, Fargo Police Department, North Dakota Bureau of Criminal Investigation, Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension, Cass County Sheriff's Department (ND), Clay County Sheriff's Department (MN), Bureau of Indian Affairs, and the Belcourt Police Department (ND).

- OPERATION S.M.I.L.E.
  This investigation, involving multiple law enforcement agencies at the federal, state and local level, dismantled the Jimenez Organization, which was responsible for distributing 1,000 pounds of marijuana and hundreds of pounds of methamphetamine over a three-year period in Wyoming and Nebraska. Jimenez obtained the methamphetamine and marijuana from his former prison associates in Mexico. The drugs were transported to Jimenez through an associated RPOT, Renaldo Olivas in Nevada. This organization was also estimated to be laundering approximately $500,000 per year. 45 defendants have been convicted and sentenced so far in this case.

- OPERATION SPEED BUMP
  From 1994 through March 2004, a California organization supplied various distributors in the Eastern District of Arkansas with approximately two pounds of methamphetamine a month. This organization was also estimated to be laundering approximately $1,000,000 in currency on an annual basis. Local authorities in Conway, Arkansas, who initiated the investigation, did not possess the manpower to fully identify and dismantle this multi-state operation. By combining their resources, however, with OCDETF partner agencies (DEA, ATF and IRS-CID), 26 members of the Arkansas organization were convicted of drug conspiracy and money laundering charges and sentenced to between 24 months to 235 months. Defendants in California and Missouri were also convicted.

- OPERATION TRIFECTA
  This was a 19-month long OCDETF investigation, which concluded on July 31, 2003, and resulted in the indictment of Ismael Zambada-Garcia and the arrests of more than 400 associates in the United States and Mexico. The Zambada-Garcia Organization (CPOT) is one of the largest and most powerful drug trafficking organizations in Mexico. The operation resulted in the seizure of over 12 tons of cocaine, approximately 6 tons of marijuana, approximately 160 pounds of methamphetamine, and more than $10.5 million in U.S. currency. Zambada-Garcia, who has been indicted in California and Texas on narcotics trafficking charges, was not arrested and remains a fugitive. The investigation was coordinated by the Special Operations Division and involved the efforts of DEA, FBI, ICE, IRS, ATF, U.S. Postal Inspectors, USMS, U.S. Attorneys offices from nine judicial districts, and numerous state and local agencies.

In progress/future:

- The OCDETF Program is committed to reducing the domestic supply of methamphetamine by disrupting and dismantling the most significant drug trafficking organizations operating regionally, nationally, and internationally that manufacture, smuggle, transport and distribute this devastating drug into the United States. OCDETF partner agencies will also continue to target the financial infrastructure of these organizations. Mexican drug trafficking organizations are now the primary source for domestic methamphetamine, and are directly in the cross-hairs of the OCDETF Program.

- In 2007, the OCDETF Program will continue to pursue investigations of the highest level drug trafficking organizations, many of whom are responsible for manufacturing methamphetamine in Mexico, smuggling it into the Untied States, transporting it across the nation, and distributing it in our neighborhoods. OCDETF will work with each region to critically evaluate and revise strategic initiatives that target methamphetamine. OCDETF, through our leadership structure, will continue to make the methamphetamine threat the program's highest priority. The Executive Office will support regional leadership in developing innovative and effective investigative and training initiatives by directing resources to these efforts. In addition, the OCDETF Program will continue to expand its usage of intelligence resources like the OCDETF Fusion Center and the El Paso Intelligence Center to support national and regional strategic initiatives and intelligence driven strategies targeting methamphetamine drug trafficking organizations. Through these efforts, we expect that OCDETF partner agencies will continue to improve their effectiveness and significantly impact the domestic supply of methamphetamine.

United States Marshals Service (USMS)

Accomplishments:

- USMS currently heads 93 District Fugitive Task Forces (DFTF) and five Congressionally funded Regional Fugitive Task Forces (RFTF). These task forces bring together federal, state, and local resources, thereby strengthening and streamlining the process of locating and apprehending fugitives. Task forces promote communication and information sharing, help eliminate duplication of efforts, and consolidate resources dedicated to fugitive apprehension.

    - In FY 2005, USMS task forces closed 16,820 federal and 51,270 state/local warrants by arrest. This figure includes 7,205 federal and 15,547 state/local warrants for narcotics-related offenses.

- The USMS locates and arrests OCDETF fugitives, and participates in pre-arrest planning as well as execution of large-scale takedowns in OCDETF cases. The USMS currently has thirty-five investigators and one analyst dedicated full-time to the OCDETF program, including one investigator assigned to the OCDETF Fusion Center and one assigned to the DEA Special Operations Division.

    - With FY 2006 appropriations, the USMS will provide an analyst to each location to further enhance the narcotics intelligence mission.

DOJ_NMG_0028715

- The USMS International Investigations Branch (IIB) is responsible for processing, reviewing, and forwarding information concerning the pursuit and apprehension of international fugitives (fugitives wanted in the US who fled to foreign countries) and locating and apprehending foreign fugitives (fugitives wanted in other countries, but believed to be in the U.S.). The USMS has Foreign Field Offices in Mexico, Jamaica, and the Dominican Republic, as well as investigative liaison programs along the Mexican and Canadian borders dedicated to the apprehension of fugitives. The USMS works with law enforcement authorities around the world on investigations, apprehensions, extraditions, and deportation of fugitives. The success of the USMS Foreign Field Offices and other International Investigation programs has increased the number of extradition cases handled by the USMS, especially those associated with narcotics and narco-terrorism.

    - From FY 2000 to FY 2005 the number of extraditions increased from 288 to 653. The majority of these extraditions followed narcotics and OCDETF international fugitive arrests.

    - Over 400 of the international extraditions conducted in FY 2005 were narcotics related, with 74 of those resulting from OCDETF cases.

- The USMS has conducted numerous Fugitive Investigation Strike Team (FIST) Operations targeting fugitives in specific geographic areas and/or wanted for specific types of offenses.

    - In FY 2005 the USMS and more than 950 participating law enforcement agencies conducted Operation FALCON, a one-week nationwide fugitive operation targeting fugitives wanted for violent offenses. More than 10,300 fugitives were arrested, including more than 3,300 wanted on narcotics charges, with more than 275 kg of narcotics seized.

    - In April 2006 the USMS and 793 participating law enforcement agencies conducted Operation FALCON II, targeting sex offenders and other violent/dangerous fugitives in the western half of the country. After the one-week operation, more than 9,000 fugitives were arrested, including 2,600 wanted on narcotics charges with more than 90 kg of narcotics seized, including the discovery of several meth labs.

Training:

- No information

In progress/future plans:

- The USMS will continue to utilize its fugitive task forces, OCDETF program, and Foreign Field Office programs to apprehend narcotics offenders, specifically targeting fugitives associated with large scale narcotics organizations, focusing on those identified as OCDETF consolidated priority targets, and those individuals wanted for meth distribution and production. The USMS will also continue to assist its federal, state, and local law enforcement counterparts in conducting search warrants and takedowns in meth cases.

- The USMS will continue to work with foreign law enforcement partners to locate, arrest, and extradite foreign and international fugitives wanted on large-scale drug trafficking charges.

- The USMS will continue to coordinate large-scale FIST operations targeting dangerous fugitives, including those wanted on narcotics charges.

USA PATRIOT IMPROVEMENT AND REAUTHORIZATION ACT OF 2005

TITLE VII – COMBAT METHAMPHETAMINE EPIDEMIC ACT OF 2005

SUBTITLE A – DOMESTIC REGULATION OF PRECURSOR CHEMICALS

Sec. 711. Scheduled Listed Chemical Products; Restrictions on Sale Quantity, Behind-the-Counter Access, and Other Safeguards.

- Defines over-the-counter drug products containing pseudoephedrine, ephedrine, and phenylpropanolamine as "scheduled listed chemical products";

- Imposes a daily retail sales limit of 3.6 grams of the "base" chemical (very similar quantity to, e.g., 30- or 60-mg strength on the pill) – previous federal law imposed a requirement to verify ID and keep records of retail transactions of 9 grams or more;

- Requires that solid doses (as opposed to liquids) be sold in "blister packs" with up to 2 pills per blister;

- Requires behind-the-counter placement or display and storage in locked cabinets;

- Requires that regulated sellers maintain a written logbook of purchases and that buyers present photo ID and sign the log;

- Restricts monthly sales by mail order (including Internet) sellers and "mobile retail vendors" to no more than 7.5 grams;

DOJ_NMG_0028718

- Requires each regulated seller to submit a certification to the DEA:
    - that it agrees to comply with these requirements,
    - that its employees have been trained as to these requirements, and
    - Such certifications are to be made available by the Attorney General to State and local law enforcement (anticipated by an Internet link).
    - Introduces new civil penalties for "knowing" or "reckless" sales that violate these provisions.
        - Note: Later removes any sales covered by these civil penalties (subject to misdemeanor in certain instances) from the possibility of felony prosecution.

Sec. 712. Regulated Transactions.

- Repeals the Federal "blister pack" exemption (rendered obsolete by Sec. 711) and, in effect, will require the AG to make a determination that OTC drugs containing methamphetamine precursors are being diverted, or else sales at distribution levels above retail would become deregulated;

Sec. 713. Authority to Establish Production Quotas.

- Attorney General may set production quotas for pseudoephedrine, ephedrine, and phenylpropanolamine

Sec. 714. Penalties; Authority for Manufacturing; Quota.

- Expands the existing civil penalty for illegal production beyond established quotas (see 21 U.S.C. § 842(b)) to take into account the Attorney General's new authority to set quotas for methamphetamine precursors.

DOJ_NMG_0028719

Sec. 715. Restrictions on Importation; Authority to Permit Imports for Medical, Scientific, or other Legitimate Purposes.

- Attorney General may set annual import quotas for pseudoephedrine, ephedrine, and phenylpropanolamine;

- Registered importers may apply for temporary or permanent increases in a quota at any time during the year to meet legitimate needs.

    - AG must respond within 60 days or approval is automatic.

Sec. 716. Notice of Importation or Exportation; Approval of Sale or Transfer by Importer or Exporter.

- Attempts to eliminate the after-import "spot market" by requiring importers to notify DEA of changes from transfers originally notified to DEA.

    - If the originally declared sale by the importer or exporter falls through, and if the transaction would otherwise require 15 days advance notice (i.e., not to a "regular customer" abroad), the importer or exporter will be required to file a second notice with DOJ identifying the new proposed purchaser. DOJ would then have 15 days to review the new transaction and decide whether it presents enough of a risk of diversion to warrant suspension.

        - Note: A suspension can be appealed through an administrative process, and if the new proposed purchaser qualifies as a "regular" foreign customer under existing law, the importer/exporter would not be required to file a second advance notice.

Sec. 717. Enforcement of Restrictions on Importation and of Requirement of Notice of Transfer.

- Conforming amendment to extend existing penalties for illegal imports or exports to the new regulatory requirements.

DOJ_NMG_0028720

Sec. 718. Coordination with United States Trade Representative.

- Requires coordination by the Attorney General with the United States Trade Representative.

SUBTITLE B – INTERNATIONAL REGULATION OF PRECURSOR CHEMICALS

Sec. 721. Information on Foreign Chain of Distribution; Import Restrictions Regarding Failure of Distributors to Cooperate.

- Expands the scope of the existing notice of importation to include all information the importer knows about the chain of distribution of the listed chemicals from manufacturer to importer.
    - This will assist U.S. law enforcement agencies to better track where meth precursors come from, and how they get to the U.S.
    - If the AG determines that a "foreign chain distributor" is refusing to cooperate by providing such information, the DEA may issue an order prohibit imports in any instance where the firm is in the distribution chain.

Sec. 722. Requirements Relating to the Largest Exporting and Importing Countries of Certain Precursor Chemicals.

- Requires the State Department, as part of the annual INCSR report process, to identify the five largest exporters of major meth precursor chemicals, and the five largest importers that also have the highest rate of meth production or diversion of these chemicals to the production of meth. If the President does not certify that countries are cooperating fully with U.S. law enforcement, they may face decertification and ineligibility for U.S. aid.

Sec. 723. Prevention of Smuggling of Methamphetamine into the United States from Mexico.

- Requires the State Department's Bureau for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs (INL) to provide assistance to Mexico to prevent the production of meth in that country and to encourage Mexico to stop illegal diversion of meth precursor chemicals.

    - Authorizes appropriation of $4 million for FY-2006 and 2007 for this purpose.

SUBTITLE C – ENHANCED CRIMINAL PENALTIES FOR METHAMPHETAMINE PRODUCTION AND TRACKING

Sec. 731. Smuggling Methamphetamine or Methamphetamine Precursor Chemicals into the United States While Using Facilitated Entry Programs.

- "Fastpass" systems like SENTRI (for passenger traffic on the Southwest border), FAST (for commercial truck traffic), and NEXUS (for passenger traffic on the Northern border) allow pre-screened individuals to use dedicated lanes at border crossings, subject only to occasional searches to test compliance with customs and immigration laws. For anyone who misuses a facilitated entry program to smuggle meth or its precursor chemicals, an additional penalty of up to 15 years imprisonment is added to the punishment for the base offense along with permanent disbarment from using a fastpass system.

Sec. 732. Manufacturing Controlled Substances on Federal Property.

- Clarifies that current penalties for cultivating illegal drugs on Federal property also apply to manufacturing synthetic drugs such as meth to combat meth cookers who frequently move their operations to parks, national forests and other public lands, causing serious environmental damage.

Sec. 733. Increased Punishment for Methamphetamine Kingpins.

- Kingpins of Continuing Criminal Enterprises would be exposed to life imprisonment for a reduced threshold amount of meth (from 300 to 200 times the threshold for base violations) and profits from meth (from $10 million to $5 million).

Sec. 734. New Child-Protection Criminal Enhancement.

- Punishes an offender who manufactures meth at a location where a child resides or is present and imposes a consecutive sentence of up to an additional 20 years imprisonment.

Sec. 735. Amendments to Certain Sentencing Court Reporting Requirements.

- Authorizes the U.S. Sentencing Commission to establish a form to be used by U.S. District Judges when imposing criminal sentences in order to facilitate data gathering and reporting by the Sentencing Commission.

Sec. 736. Semiannual Reports to Congress.

- Requires the Attorney General to report to Congress on investigations and prosecutions relating to meth production.

SUBTITLE D – ENHANCED ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATION OF METHAMPHETAMINE BYPRODUCTS

Sect. 741. Biennial Report to Congress on Agency Designations of By-Products on Methamphetamine Laboratories as Hazardous Materials.

- Requires the Department of Transportation to report to Congress every two years whether then-existing statutes and regulations cover methamphetamine by-products as hazardous materials.

DOJ_NMG_0028723

Sec. 742. Methamphetamine Production Report.

- Requires the Environmental Protection Agency to report to Congress every two years on whether then-existing statutes and regulations cover methamphetamine by-products as hazardous materials.

Sec. 743. Cleanup costs.

- Clarifies existing law imposing the obligation of restitution for environmental cleanup costs on person involved in meth production and trafficking.

SUBTITLE E – ADDITIONAL PROGRAMS AND ACTIVITIES

Sec. 751. Improvements to Department of Justice Drug Courts Program.

- Revises the Drug Court program statute to clarify the requirements for periodic testing, graduated sanctions when an offender tests positive, and a list of potential sanctions when a positive test occurs.

Sec. 752 Drug Courts Funding.

- Authorizes appropriations for drug courts.

Sec. 753. Feasibility Study on Federal Drug Courts.

- Directs the Attorney General to conduct a study on the feasibility of Federal drug courts.

Sec. 754. Grants to Hot Spot Areas to Reduce Availability of Methamphetamine.

- Authorizes $99 million for fiscal years 2006 to 2010 for grants to State and local law enforcement agencies to assist in the investigation of meth traffickers and to reimburse the DEA for assistance in cleaning up meth labs.

DOJ_NMG_0028724

Sec. 755. Grants for Programs for Drug-Endangered Children.

- Authorizes grants to States to assist in treatment of children who have been endangered by living at a residence where meth has been manufactured or distributed.

Sec. 756. Authority to Award Competitive Grants to Address Meth Use by Pregnant and Parenting Women Offenders.

- Authorizes the Attorney General to award grants to address the use of methamphetamine around pregnant and parenting women offenders to promote public safety, public health, family permanence and well being.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Defends Termination Of Probe Of Into Surveillance Program. In its report on today's hearings on CIA director nominee Gen. Michael Hayden, Washington Post (5/18, A5, Linzer, Babington) reports senators "will face an array of questions, loose ends and seeming contradictions about the administration's domestic surveillance techniques." Regarding National Security Agency surveillance, "an internal Justice Department investigation tried to determine whether lawyers who authorized the program may have acted improperly." But Attorney General Gonzales "suggested yesterday that secrecy concerns shut down the inquiry. The department's Office of Professional Responsibility notified lawmakers last week that it was forced to end its investigation because the office was denied security clearances to access information on the NSA program. Gonzales defended that decision yesterday and suggested that the probe was unnecessary because Justice issued a legal analysis supporting the effort." Gonzales said, "It's a very important program to the United States, and so certain decisions are made in terms of…how much information should be shared throughout the federal government. We don't want to be talking so much about the program that we compromise the effectiveness." Gonzales "declined to discuss who denied security clearances to OPR investigators or whether he was consulted on the issue."

Fox News (5/17, 3:35 p.m.) reported, "The White House says it is taking legal and vital steps to win the war on terror. … One of those steps is collecting millions of private phone conversations. Attorney General Gonzales came on this newscast and said he will not confirm or deny the existence of that program, but the average American would be safer because of it." Gonzales: "Let me just say that winning the war on terror requires winning the war on information. More information we have about what terrorists may be potentially doing is going to make America safer. And again, our intelligence activities are not focused on the communications of innocent Americans. We are focused on what al Qaeda is doing."

DOJ Motion To Dismiss EFF Suit Against AT&T Gets Coverage. The Boston Phoenix (5/18, Miliard) writes, "As we learn more and more about the scope and extent of the National Security Agency's (NSA) warrantless wiretapping program, we're also learning -- to the surprise of precisely no one -- how difficult it will be to challenge such domestic espionage in court." In January, Electronic Frontier Foundation "brought a class-action suit against AT&T, accusing the telecom giant of offering the NSA unfettered access to key facilities and databases, and of continuing to assist the government in the surveillance of phone and Internet communications among millions of Americans. Last Saturday, in the wee hours of the morning, lawyers from the Justice Department filed a motion in San Francisco federal court seeking to dismiss the suit, claiming that a trial would reveal state secrets and compromise national security."

NSA Director Briefs Intelligence Committees About Surveillance Program. NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander yesterday briefed the full House and Senate intelligence committees about the agency's domestic surveillance program. The CBS Evening News (5/17, story 4, 1:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Why is the Administration suddenly so forthcoming, at least with Congress?" CBS (Borger) added, "Well, of course the timing of this is absolutely no coincidence. Tomorrow on Capitol Hill, General Michael Hayden will come up for his confirmation hearings to head the CIA." Gen. Hayden was "was in charge of those controversial eavesdropping programs. So, what they really want to do is diffuse that controversy before he starts testifying on Capitol Hill. And one other thing, if you ask questions in a private classified briefing, you can't ask them again in an open hearing. So it'll probably ease the tension for him tomorrow." CNN's The Situation Room (5/17, Blitzer) also reported that the briefing "comes on the day before the confirmation hearings for the CIA Director nominee General Michael Hayden. He's expected to be grilled about his leading role in the NSA secret spying program." CNN's The Situation Room (5/17, Ensor) noted that Sen. Pat Roberts "said it's going well. But whether Senate Democrats and even some Republicans agree they're learning what they want to know, will it become clear at the hearings on the nomination of General Michael Hayden, former NSA director, to be director of the CIA? And based on past comments by senators, the probable answer to that is no."

The Washington Times (5/18, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Senators "would not disclose the particulars of the briefing," but Roberts "said the discussion allowed members to move past the 'very awkward' position of having just half the committee familiar with the program." Without "getting into specifics, Mr. Roberts said newspapers have printed misinformation about the top-secret program, which he said has prevented terrorist attacks." The New York Times (5/18, A1, Mazzetti, Stolberg, 1.19M) adds that White House press secretary Tony Snow "sought to play down the significance of the tactical shift. He said" Roberts "argued that the briefings were necessary 'to have a full and appropriate confirmation hearing for General Hayden, and we agreed with it.' But Republicans as well as Democrats said the White House had blundered by waiting until the last minute to share information on the spying program with members of the intelligence panel."

Administration Has Briefed Members Of Congress On NSA Program 30 Times Since 9/11. USA Today (5/18, Stone, 2.31M) reports the Bush Administration "briefed select members of Congress 30 times on the National Security Agency's surveillance programs since the Sept. 11 attacks, according to a declassified list released Wednesday." National Intelligence Director John Negroponte "released the document on the eve of today's confirmation hearings for Gen. Michael Hayden to lead the CIA." The "declassified list shows that half the secret briefings were held in the past five months, after The New York Times revealed the NSA was spying on international calls in the USA without court warrants. Until then, only party leaders and senior members of the intelligence committees attended briefings on the 'terrorist surveillance program' at the White House." The Washington Times (5/18, Bellantoni, 90K) notes the list "showed 31 of the 535 voting members of Congress have been 'briefed in' to the program." The AP (5/18, Shrader) adds that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "has pushed for the list's disclosure because the administration repeatedly has said that the appropriate lawmakers were briefed. Just who was included in those sessions was previously unknown."

NSA Scrapped Pilot Communications Analysis Program With Legal Safeguards In 1990s. The Baltimore Sun (5/18, Gorman, 296K) reports NSA "developed a pilot program in the late 1990s that would have enabled it to gather and analyze massive amounts of communications data without running afoul of privacy laws. But after the Sept. 11 attacks, it shelved the project -- not because it failed to work -- but because of bureaucratic infighting and a sudden White House expansion of the agency's surveillance powers, according to several intelligence officials." The agency "opted instead to adopt only one component of the program, which produced a far less capable and rigorous program. It remains the backbone of the NSA's warrantless surveillance efforts, tracking domestic and overseas communications from a vast databank of information, and monitoring selected calls."

The agency "opted instead to adopt only one component of the program, which produced a far less capable and rigorous program. It remains the backbone of the NSA's warrantless surveillance efforts, tracking domestic and overseas communications from a vast databank of information, and monitoring selected calls."

Kondracke Says Phone Companies Should Be Praised. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/18) that ideological conflict and partisan politics are "threatening our national survival. … In Congress and in much of the media, the immediate reaction to news that the National Security Agency was intercepting international terrorist communications" was "to scream about a 'domestic spying' scandal, as though Richard Nixon were back in the White House and tapping the telephone of Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. … The phone companies that are cooperating with the government ought to be congratulated for participating in the war on terrorism — as they would have been in WWII. Instead, they are being hauled before the Senate Judiciary Committee as though they were criminals."

Roberts Says Intelligence Committees Are Doing Oversight Job. In a USA Today op-ed (5/18), Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts says, "It's the job of the Senate Intelligence Committee to oversee the intelligence community, ensuring that it's protecting Americans against a vicious enemy while respecting civil liberties. With respect to the National Security Agency's Terrorist Surveillance Program, the committee is doing its job. It's very secret, and oversight must be conducted in a closed environment."

USA Today Says Congress Failing In Oversight Responsibility. USA Today (5/18, 2.31M) says in an editorial, "Congress is supposed to oversee the executive branch's intelligence operations. From all indications, however, that oversight is badly broken. Information is dribbled out to a handful of lawmakers. Briefing turns into political cover. Consultation becomes more like inform-and-gag. Republicans act like cheerleaders for the White House. Democrats feign surprise and outrage when dubious programs become public." It is "not supposed to be this way," but the "system has become so weak, Congress might as well be deaf and blind."

LATimes Says Administration Only Briefing Lawmakers To Secure Hayden's Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, 958K) says in an editorial that in "suddenly agreeing to inform all members of the House and Senate intelligence committees about its warrantless domestic wiretapping activities, the Bush administration is doing the right thing for the wrong reason. The administration had resisted such briefings but changed course on the eve of today's first confirmation hearing before the Senate panel for Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the president's nominee to head the CIA." Easing Hayden's "confirmation, apparently, is more of an inducement to openness for the administration than are legitimate questions in Congress and among U.S. citizens about the NSA's surveillance of Americans."

Judge Rules Sealed Documents In Class Action Lawsuit Against AT&T Can Be Used. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Solomon, Searcey, 2.11M) reports a Federal judge in San Francisco "ruled that sealed documents filed by a privacy-rights group can be used in its class-action lawsuit against AT&T Inc." The documents "in the suit filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation include statements from retired AT&T technician Mark Klein as well as other internal AT&T documents. It is unclear what information is contained in the documents, but Mr. Klein has issued a statement saying he saw the NSA set up a room in AT&T's San Francisco office that tapped into one of AT&T's major networks." USA Today (5/18, Iwata, 2.31M) adds that the foundation "praised the action Wednesday" by US District Judge Vaughn Walker. But "AT&T also scored an early win, when the judge rebuffed requests by the plaintiffs, joined by media companies including the Associated Press, Bloomberg News and USA TODAY, to unseal the documents for the public." The Washington Post (5/18, D5, Gullo, Rosenblatt, 744K) notes, "Even if the documents remain secret and the suit is thrown out, the case ties AT&T to a program that has troubled politicians and privacy groups, said Steven Aftergood, director of the Project on Government Secrecy."

Statements Appear To Indicate Government Wanted Long-Distance Records. The New York Times (5/18, Richtel, Belson, 1.19M) reports, "Government efforts to obtain data from the nation's largest phone companies for a national security database appear to have focused on long-distance carriers, not local ones, statements by company officials indicate." The statements have "come in the week since USA Today reported that the National Security Agency had collected local and long-distance phone records on tens of millions of Americans from Verizon, BellSouth and AT&T in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks." The responses "by the companies suggest that the agency, in an effort to find patterns that could identify terrorists, sought records from major long-distance providers like the former MCI (now part of Verizon), AT&T and Qwest, but did not ask for data on local calls."

Hayden To Face Tough Questions On NSA Tenure. Knight Ridder (5/18, Kuhnhenn) reports Gen. Michael Hayden "might seem to be a fine candidate for Senate confirmation as director of central intelligence," but he will "testify Thursday at his Senate confirmation hearing amid intense congressional interest in the National Security Agency's warrantless spying program, which began while Hayden headed it. And some lawmakers also chafe at the way President Bush is changing the guard at the CIA." The Senate is "expected to confirm Hayden eventually, but first he'll face tough questions about the NSA's secret eavesdropping and phone-record collection programs." USA Today (5/18, Brook, Stone, 2.31M) adds that DNI John Negroponte's "view of Hayden as an independent thinker is shared by a variety of former colleagues. They describe Hayden, deputy director of national intelligence, as a forceful, objective and fair-minded intelligence officer who's not cowed by political pressure." Still, Democratic senators "such as Carl Levin of Michigan, say they want to know whether he maintained that independence when the Bush administration wanted to create two NSA programs," the "surveillance without court warrants," and the "phone call database."

The Washington Post (5/18, A5, Linzer, Babington, 744K) reports senators "will face an array of questions, loose ends and seeming contradictions about the administration's domestic surveillance techniques. The first mystery they must unravel, however, is the nominee himself…who pitched the eavesdropping program after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and has become its most forceful defender." Hayden's "message and independence made him a favorite on Capitol Hill, where he was viewed as a champion of national security, privacy rights and press freedoms. But recent revelations about the nature of Hayden's highly classified world -- in the Air Force, at the NSA and most recently in the office of the director of national intelligence -- are forcing lawmakers to reexamine a man many of them have known for years." Their questions "are driven largely by what appear to be inconsistencies between the scale of the surveillance program and administration assertions about its limits." The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Solomon, Searcey, 2.11M) notes Democrats yesterday "outlined what they said will be the wide scope of questions they will put to Gen. Hayden during the hearings…which will include an extensive focus on the NSA. They also said they will question Gen. Hayden on his plans to keep the CIA's operations independent of the Pentagon's, as well as to reduce what they say has been the Bush administration's politicization of intelligence activities."

GOP Leaders Aim To Let Hayden Keep Rank, Independence. Roll Call (5/18, Stanton) reports GOP leaders and the Bush Administration "have agreed to take a series of unusual steps aimed at allowing Hayden to maintain his rank as a four-star general while suspending Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's authority over Hayden as a military officer while he serves as CIA director." Democrats and "some Republicans have expressed concerns that if Hayden remains on active military duty, technically he'll be under Rumsfeld's command. At the very least, they say, this would create an impression that the strict lines dividing the military and civilian branches of government since the nation's founding were being blurred."

Hayden To Emphasize CIA's Unique Humint Role To Help Rebuild Morale. The Washington Post (5/18, A4, Pincus, 744K) reports Gen. Michael Hayden "would work to rebuild morale at the agency in part by emphasizing its central role in managing the collection of human intelligence overseas, including by agencies other than his own, according to active and retired senior intelligence officials." Hayden has "told colleagues that he expects to act as the intelligence community's manager for human collection, coordinating and overseeing clandestine efforts abroad of the CIA, Defense Department and other government agencies. That would be similar to a role he played for intelligence collected by electronic intercepts when he ran the National Security Agency. In that role, and more recently as Negroponte's deputy, he has clashed with some senior defense officials." Hayden has also said "he would emphasize the CIA's importance as home to the largest number of 'all-source' analysts within the U.S. intelligence community. He plans to remind them, an associate said, that the 'CIA's primary customer remains the president' and they are still the 'major,' if not the only, contributor to the PDB, the President's Daily Brief, the highly classified intelligence report provided to Bush each morning."

Critics Say Hayden Had Mixed Record At NSA. The New York Times (5/18, Shane, 1.19M) reports that last year, "when Gen. Michael V. Hayden last sought Senate confirmation to a new job, protecting Americans' privacy from the global eavesdropping system he had overseen for six years at the National Security Agency was almost an afterthought on Capitol Hill." Hayden "assured senators then that the agency acted 'absolutely in compliance with all U.S. law and the Constitution,' and sailed to easy confirmation in April 2005 as principal deputy director of national intelligence." But now, the "question of whether General Hayden misled the committee last year is only one of several that could, in theory, cause trouble. Senators could press him on his role in costly, floundering modernization programs at the N.S.A., or his views on the C.I.A.'s secret prisons for terrorism suspects." But there "is also a pronounced minority view, expressed by some former senior N.S.A. officials and advisers: that General Hayden is better at public relations than at management, and that his record at the agency was far more mixed than his many admirers realize."

Hearings To Highlight Pentagon's Increased Intelligence Role. The Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Sappenfield, 61K) reports, "Experts widely agree that Hayden is independent and not likely to be bullied by the Department of Defense. But the issue points to how the war on terror is reshaping the US intelligence structure - and whether it is wise for the Pentagon to take more of the nation's spying needs upon itself."

Gates Says Hayden Should Be Confirmed. In a Washington Post op-ed (5/18, A23), Robert M. Gates, deputy director of central intelligence under President Ronald Reagan and director of central intelligence under President George H.W. Bush, says, "As the last career intelligence officer to serve as director of central intelligence, I believe Gen. Mike Hayden should be confirmed as director of the CIA. Hayden is an intelligence professional and widely regarded as one of the very best."

Novak Says Goss Ouster "Enraged" Hastert. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (5/18) writes that "according to Capitol Hill sources," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "engaged in a high decibel rant last week when he met with Vice President Dick Cheney. The speaker was enraged by the sacking of his friend and former colleague, Porter Goss." Hastert's "wrath reflects the feeling in the House Republican cloakroom that" Goss "is being made a scapegoat for the government's intelligence mess."

Kondracke Says Phone Companies Should Be Praised. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/18) that ideological conflict and partisan politics are "threatening our national survival. … In Congress and in much of the media, the immediate reaction to news that the National Security Agency was intercepting international terrorist communications" was "to scream about a 'domestic spying' scandal, as though Richard Nixon were back in the White House and tapping the telephone of Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. … The phone companies that are cooperating with the government ought to be congratulated for participating in the war on terrorism — as they would have been in WWII. More Commentary. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (5/18) editorializes, "When news broke about the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretaps of telephone calls, conducted in seeming contravention of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, President Bush insisted the nation's spymasters were targeting only persons with possible terrorist ties. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asserted that the agency was interested only in calls reaching beyond America's borders, and that while the administration might someday want to turn its attention to strictly domestic calls, it had not done so yet. Comes now word that major telephone companies have turned over to the NSA the domestic telephone records of… millions of innocent Americans."

Foggo Lawyer Says FBI Agents Seized Items Relating To Vacations With Wilkes. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Schmitt, 958K) reports, "Federal agents who raided the home and office of former top CIA official Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo were looking for evidence about trips that he and his family took with the family of San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes and whether Foggo paid his fair share," Foggo attorney William G. Hundley said yesterday. "In addition to other material collected in the raids, FBI agents seized family vacation photos, bank records and Cuban cigars from Foggo's home," Hundley said. He added that "the government appears to view the trips as a potential 'quid pro quo' for the water contract that Wilkes won while Foggo was heading a logistics unit for the CIA in Germany. Hundley said that Foggo 'never knowingly awarded a contract' to Wilkes, and that the cost of the trips was shared appropriately."

Undercover NYPD Officer Testifies Siraj Hoped For Terror Attacks On US. The New York Times (5/18, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "An undercover police officer testified yesterday that a Pakistani immigrant charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004 had said two years earlier that he hoped Al Qaeda operatives would blow up New York City and 'the American people.' Prosecutors called the officer as a witness…in an effort to undermine the case" of Shahawar Matin Siraj, "who testified in his own defense over the last two and a half days, and his lawyers have argued that he was entrapped by a paid police informant. … But yesterday, the officer…testified about a series of conversations he had with Mr. Siraj between 2002 and early 2003 in which he said the young man talked supportively about terrorism." The AP (5/18, Hays) adds that the officer, who used "his street name, Kamil Pasha, because he's still involved in active investigations," testified "Siraj declared in December 2002 that, 'The mission was not complete on 9/11 because it did not hit Wall Street.'" The New York Post (5/18, Haberman, 624K) notes Pasha testified Siraj "caught the terror bug well before he ever met the NYPD informant he claims urged him to carry out an attack." The New York Daily News (5/18, Marzulli, 729K) and New York Sun (5/18, Goldstein) also report on Pasha's testimony.

Man Charged With Making Bomb Threat Against Philippine Embassy. The AP (5/17, Ritter) reports, "A Nevada man was arrested and charged Wednesday with making a false bomb threat against the U.S. Embassy in the Philippines. Apolinar Agelio Tiu, 62, of Las Vegas, pleaded not guilty in federal court to one count of conveying false information relating to explosive materials and one count of making a false statement involving terrorism."

Poll Finds Americans More Concerned About Weather Than Terrorism. The Washington Times (5/18, Harper, 90K) reports that a Harris poll released Tuesday finds that 72% rank hurricanes as the most destructive disaster, followed by earthquakes and tornadoes, each cited by 53 percent, and terrorism, cited by 43 percent. The Times adds, "Floods (37 percent), wildfires (19 percent) and drought (16 percent) followed. But Americans don't seem particularly concerned by sloppy soil and blizzards. … When asked whether the federal government was prepared to deal with the nine types of disasters, almost half -- 47 percent -- said agencies would not be able to cope with any of them. Only a quarter said the government could cope with a terrorist attack, while 20 percent said it could respond to a wildfire. The numbers go downhill from there: Only 2 percent said the government could deal with a mudslide. … The poll of 3,979 adults was conducted online April 12 to 20 and had a margin of error of two percentage points."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Panel Delivers "Tongue-Lashing" To DHS, But Boosts Agency's Budget. In an article appearing on at least 58 news websites, the AP (5/17, Taylor) reports that the House Appropriations Committee approved a $32.1 billion spending plan for the "troubled" Department of Homeland Security yesterday, but not before giving the agency "a tongue-lashing" over what Rep. Martin Sabo called a "bureaucratic mess." The bill was approved following the defeat of "Democratic proposals to boost funding for port and border security and grants to emergency first-responders" and "registers about $200 million less than Bush sought, since the Appropriations panel rejected for the second year in a row a Bush administration plan to raise airline ticket taxes." Though the budget provides a 6 percent increase over current levels, Rep. Hal Rogers said "excuses and delays due to reorganizations, personnel shortages, and poor financial management" will no longer be tolerated.

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that as part of the budget, "an estimated $4.18 billion is provided for government-port and cargo-security agencies, a $448 million increase over this year. And for the first time, the panel endorsed language authorizing Secretary Michael Chertoff to issue regulations establishing minimum security requirements for U.S. chemical facilities."

Administration Cites Reservations Over Changes To Foreign-Deal Rules. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A13, Hitt, 2.11M) reports speaking before a House Financial Services subcommittee yesterday, Clay Lowery, Treasury's assistant secretary of international affairs, said the Bush Administration is "ready to embrace modest proposals to improve communications with Congress over foreign-investment reviews and raise accountability within the administration." However, he expressed "concerns with several proposals written into the bill, including measures to require the secretaries of Treasury and Homeland Security to sign off on all deals," which he said "would lengthen and delay the process, presenting an unnecessary impediment to legitimate investment." Lowery also said that requiring extended 45-day investigations for all cases involving foreign government-owned entities "would require the administration to devote attention to cases that don't raise security concerns, and potentially could divert 'critical resources away from examination of acquisitions that do pose potential hazards.'"

Columnist Proposes Independent Homeland Security Board. Harlan Ullman, in his column for the Washington Times (5/18, 90K) writes, "The nation's security is…in need of a fix" and the "appropriate assignment of responsibility, authority and accountability among our security agencies" is the "fundamental issue." Ullman continues that Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte must integrate "the intelligence community into a more effective and cohesive operation." In an assessment of DHS, Ullman writes that having merged "an eclectic menage of dozens of disparate agencies and differing bureaucratic cultures totaling nearly 180,000 people, …perhaps it is amazing the department functions at all." Ullman states that due to "the principles of federalism and checks and balances," it is impossible for any "single person or organization" to be is "in charge of homeland security." He proposes the creation of "an independent Homeland Security Board to function along the lines of the Fed and the SEC" that would "regulate and set homeland security standards and policies, and, with DHS, to ensure compliance."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Acknowledges Divisions Over Interrogation Techniques. The AP (5/18, Baldor) reports Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld "said for the first time Wednesday that officials are at odds over whether a new Army manual should endorse different interrogation techniques for enemy insurgents than are allowed for regular prisoners of war." The debate "hinges on whether suspected terrorists or other insurgents can be treated more severely than captured members of an enemy army. There are concerns such a distinction could fly in the face of a law enacted last year, pressed by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that explicitly banned cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners by U.S. troops." Rumsfeld told the Senate Appropriations Committee's defense subcommittee, "There is a debate over the difference between a prisoner of war under the Geneva Convention and an unlawful combatant in a situation that is different from the situation envisioned by the Geneva Convention. And those issues are being wrestled with at the present time." Rumsfeld "did not say whether there would be one uniform standard. But he said the manual, which will guide troops on the handling of detainees, 'will comply with U.S. law.'"

US To Return 16 Detainees To Saudi Arabia. The New York Times (5/18, Weisman, 1.19M) reports that US officials and the Saudi foreign minister said yesterday that the US plans to turn over 16 Saudis suspected of terrorist activities and held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to Saudi Arabian authorities. The decision "came after months of wrangling over American demands for guarantees that they would be treated humanely once in Saudi custody, but it was not entirely clear what sort of agreement had been reached. … The Defense Department, which runs the prison camp at Guantánamo, declined to confirm that the Saudis would be repatriated soon."

Rumsfeld Can't "Promise" Substantial US Troop Pullouts This Year. The Washington Post (5/18, A3, Ricks, 744K) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he cannot guarantee that there will be substantial withdrawals of US troops from Iraq this year, and warned instead that leaving that country precipitously could create a sanctuary for al-Qaeda and other terrorists." Rumsfeld "told a Senate panel yesterday that he still hopes a big troop cut will occur this year but added, 'I can't promise it.'" Rumsfeld also "reprised some of his past optimism about the war in Iraq, which has grown increasingly unpopular with the public and dragged down President Bush's poll ratings in recent months. With the formation of a new government almost complete, Rumsfeld said, Iraq has 'entered a hopeful new phase in what has been a long and difficult journey.'"

Murtha Says Marines Killed Innocent Iraqi Civilians "In Cold Blood." Rep. John Murtha, the hawkish Democrat and retired Marine who broke character to call for the immediate withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, yesterday there is evidence US Marines killed civilians in the town of Haditha. The story was covered by NBC in a full segment. NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 3, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported Rep. Murtha is "accusing US Marines of killing innocent civilians in cold blood." NBC (Miklaszewski) added that last November, Iraqis "in the town of Haditha claimed US Marines deliberately killed at least 15 unarmed Iraqi civilians, including 7 women and three children." In "a remarkable statement in Washington, Democratic Congressman John Murtha claims it's true." Rep. John Murtha, Pennsylvania: "There was no firefight. There was no IED that killed these innocent people. Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood." Miklaszewski: "Military officials today tell NBC News the Marine Corps' own evidence appears to show Murtha is right."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Rogers, Phillips, 2.11M) reports "the Marines announced last month that three officers were relieved of command after the battalion involved in the Nov. 19 incident in Haditha ended its tour of Iraq and returned to the US." Those relieved "included both the commander of the rifle company involved in the events under investigation and his direct superior. Neither of the two was willing to comment Wednesday, according to a Marine Corps spokesman at their base, Camp Pendleton, in Southern California." The Washington Times (5/18, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Murtha Says Marines Killed Innocent Iraqis."

Iraqi Cabinet To Be Announced Saturday. The New York Times (5/18, Tavernise, Mizher, 1.19M) reports government statements that Iraqi's political leadership "struck tentative agreements on candidates for several cabinet ministries on Wednesday and said a complete list of names would be announced on Saturday. Leaders have been negotiating for weeks over what will be Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein, and, under Iraqi law, have until Monday to finish." Hussein Shahristani, a nuclear scientist jailed by Saddam for ten years for refusing to design a nuclear weapons program, appears to be the consensus candidate for oil minister, while Interior Minister appears to be a three-way race between Ahmad Chalabi, Mowaffak al-Rubaie and Nasir al-Feyadh. Hoshyar Zebari seems likely to remain Foreign Minister, while Thamir Sultan al-Tikriti and Muhammad Baraa al-Rubaie are said to be the leading candidates to lead the Defense Ministry.

USA Today/AP (5/18) says Saturday's announcements will be "the first sign that the country may finally be moving ahead with a national unity government after weeks of wrangling. There are hopes that sharing power successfully will help heal the sectarian rift underlying the relentless wave of violence that has swept Iraq since the US-led invasion three years ago and open the way for American troops to begin returning home." Knight Ridder (5/18, Fadel), among other sources, runs a similar story this morning.

US Military Developing Laser To Blind Drivers Temporarily. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Rainey, 958K) reported on its web site, "The U.S. military is deploying a laser device in Iraq that would temporarily blind drivers who fail to heed warnings at checkpoints, in an attempt to stem shootings of innocent Iraqis. The pilot project would equip thousands of M-4 rifles with the 10 1/2-inch-long weapon, which projects an intense beam of green light to 'dazzle the vision of oncoming drivers."

Baghdad Neighborhood Residents Scramble To Save Mosque. The Washington Post (5/18, A16, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports on an attack on a mosque in the Zayuna neighborhood of Baghdad. According to the Post as the attack began, the mosque's imam shouted, "God is great" over a loud speaker. "The imam's cry was the alarm recognized in all neighborhoods -- Sunni or Shiite -- across Baghdad. The mosque was under attack." The Post adds, "Across that pocket of Zayuna, a neighborhood originally created for army officers in the 1960s, the largely middle-class and heavily secular population of retired colonels, shop owners and professionals slammed their drinks down on coffee tables or lurched upright from their sleep. Though some could count the months, even years, since they last attended prayers, they knew that if the mosque was under attack, Zayuna might be under attack."

Canadian Lawmakers Vote To Extend Afghanistan Deployment. The New York Times (5/18, Krauss, 1.19M) reports that Canada's House of Commons last night voted t extend Canada's military deployment in Afghanistan by two years. The Times notes that the vote givers Prime Minister Stephen Harper "a foreign policy victory but only after an emotional and deeply partisan debate."

Pakistani Official Says Afghanistan's Problems Are Internal. Mansoor Suhail, Press Minister for the Pakistan Mission to the United Nations, writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (5/18, 2.11M) , "Afghanistan's security problems are internal, not external, and arise from religious extremism, warlordism, narcotics trade and local rivalries. The Taliban originated from and continue to be based in Afghanistan. Failure to address the country's complex security challenges cannot be externalized."

Afghan TV Channel Draws Fire For Reporting On Taliban. The Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Montero, 61K) reports that Afghanistan's top television channel, Tolo TV, "finds Afghanistan's hot buttons -- and pushes them. … Now, in an indication of how security is surpassing Westernization as a major preoccupation in this country, the station is angering the government with dogged reporting on the Taliban. As Tolo's team of reporters digs deeper into the insurgency, it faces increasing challenges from the central government, Tolo reporters and analysts say. Covering the Taliban, they explain, means delving into the reasons driving the rebels, and that often requires investigating allegations of corruption and abuse within the central government."

US House Of Representatives Urges Russia To Continue Klebnikov Investigation. Russia's RIA Novosti (5/17) reported on its English-language Web site, "The U.S. House of Representatives passed a resolution Tuesday urging Russia to continue an inquiry into the murder of American journalist Paul Klebnikov. … 'The House of Representatives ... urges the Government of Russia to take appropriate action to protect the independence and freedom of the Russian media and all visiting members of the media,' the House resolution said. … The House said 'a group of United States investigative journalists who doubt the Russian Government's claim has launched its own inquiry into the death of Mr. Klebnikov' and voiced concern about press freedom in Russia."

DOJ:

"Suspicious Package" Removed From DOJ Mailroom. The AP (5/17) reports, "Authorities removed a suspicious package from the Justice Department mailroom Wednesday in downtown Washington after initial testing indicated it was not dangerous. The building was not evacuated, but emergency workers in hazardous materials suits were sent to investigate."

Anonymous Letter Renews FBI Probe Of Seattle US Attorney's Murder. ABC's Good Morning America (5/17, Sullivan) reported that in the stalled investigation into the murder of Seattle US Attorney Thomas Wales four years ago, "a mysterious letter has surfaced, giving the FBI new clues, kick starting a real-life CSI investigation." ABC (Shipman) added, "The FBI is making this case a huge priority, offering an unprecedented $1 million reward to anybody who has information that might help solve it. … Law enforcement suspect the culprit is somebody with a grudge against Wales from his years as a tough prosecutor and ardent gun control activist." FBI Special Agent Gary Schoenlein: "We have to consider strongly the possibility that this homicide was connected to his professional duties." Shipman: "We went behind the scenes with FBI forensic experts as they performed rigorous tests to extract fingerprints and other residue which might yield clues. … But maybe the most telling clues can be found in the letter itself. … It reads like a dime store crime novel," and "the FBI says the murder plot detailed in the letter is highly uncharacteristic of a professional hit man." FBI Supervisory Special Agent Shawn Vanslyke: "This letter was a very sophomoric and unsophisticated attempt to throw us off course." Shipman: They do believe, though, the writer of the letter is connected to the crime and will lead them closer to an arrest." FBI Seattle SAC Laura Laughlen: "I would hope that the public would see this and be willing to come forward with any piece of information no Matter how small they might think it is." Additionally, ABC News (5/17) posts a version of the story on its Web site.

MSNBC's Abrams Report (5/17) also reported on the letter and the FBI investigation, interviewing Seattle Times reporter Steve Miletich and Northeastern University criminologist Jack Levin. Miletich said that the FBI is "treating the letter seriously, because it came out of nowhere four years plus into this investigation. And it would be highly unlikely that someone would sit down and write a letter like this unless that person had some interest in the case, a connection to the case or is the killer." Levin said of the letter, "A serial killer might be motivated to write a letter like this, send it to the FBI in order to taunt them or become big shot celebrities. A professional hit man would not feel pains of conscience, certainly wouldn't confess years later…so I really don't see the motivation for the killer to write this letter." Host Dan Abrams said at the end of the interviews, "If you have got any information, please contact the FBI, toll free, 866-322-7009 -- I believe there's a $1 million reward."

Financial Times Puzzled By Luttig Resignation, But Sees Benefit For Boeing. The Financial Times (5/18) asks, "Just why did Judge Michael Luttig, once considered a top contender to join the Supreme Court, step down from the bench last week to become general counsel of Boeing? The day after his resignation was made public, The Wall Street Journal linked the departure to Luttig's fury over the government's handling of the case of José Padilla, the American who had been held without charge for two years as an enemy combatant. Two months after Luttig handed the administration a significant victory, the justice department reversed course, keeping the case from going before the Supreme Court." Luttig has denied that. The Times continues, "While Observer has no reason to doubt Luttig's sincerity, it is surely good news for Boeing that the former judge has clarified the mix-up with the justice department. After all, Boeing has just tentatively agreed to pay $615m to settle various government allegations. A new tiff between their general counsel and the Bush administration is the last thing the company needs."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Deliberations Begin In Trial Of Ex-Enron Chiefs. NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 8, 0:10, Williams) reported, "In Houston tonight, the jury has the case now in the Enron trial. The company's founder, Ken Lay, and former chief executive Jeff Skilling face multiple counts of fraud and conspiracy in the case." The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Mulligan) reports the jury got the case "after the government launched its final attempt to bolster its charges."

USA Today (5/18, 3B, Farrell) reports "all the talk from lawyers ended Wednesday morning at 10:35, when prosecutor Sean Berkowitz summed up the government's case against the defendants with a simple maneuver. Berkowitz pulled out a large poster, which he displayed on an easel. On the one side, in big, capital letters, was the word, 'TRUTH,' and on the other, 'LIES.' After all the intricately detailed testimony that came before the jury about 'dirty hedges,' 'goodwill write-downs,' 'monetizations' and 'dark fiber sales,' the black-and-white chart boiled it down to those two words." Berkowitz said, "These men lied. They withheld the truth. They put themselves ahead of the investors. I'm asking you to send them a message, that it's not all right. You can't buy justice. You have to earn it."

The New York Times (5/18, Romero, Barrionuevo) adds Berkowitz " reserved specific but quietly stated ire for what he called the 'ranting and yelling' of Chip Lewis, a lawyer for Mr. Lay, who in one of the testiest moments of the trial, shouted in the direction of prosecutors on Tuesday, 'Don't come to Houston, Tex., and lie to us!'" The Financial Times (5/18, McNulty) adds that Berkowitz "rejected the defence's warnings that any hesitation in reaching a decision over who told the truth meant jurors had to acquit the defendants. He urged jurors to go through the multitude of documents, and video and audio tapes."

The Washington Post (5/18, D1, Johnson) reports that following Berkowitz's two-hour presentation, "rhe eight-woman, four-man panel recessed to a private room at mid-morning to consider 28 charges against Skilling and six more against Lay." As jurors "filed out of the courtroom, Skilling took deep breaths and struggled to contain his emotions while his lawyer squeezed his neck. Lay looked solemn as he watched the jurors walk by."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C2, McWilliams) writes that the "start of jury deliberations won't give Mr. Lay much of a break. He begins a trial here Thursday in a separate case in which he is accused of bank fraud. The four charges will be heard without a jury before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, the same judge overseeing the conspiracy-and-fraud trial." Lay is "accused of borrowing $75 million from Bank of America, Compass Bank and Chase Bank and improperly using the money to carry or buy stocks on credit. The trial is expected to last several days."

HealthSouth Says It Has Reached Non-Prosecution Deal With DOJ. The Birmingham Business Journal (5/17) reports HealthSouth "announced Wednesday evening it has reached a non-prosecution agreement with the Department of Justice. Negotations were conducted through the U.S. Attorney's Office in Birmingham. The agreement 'removes the threat of an indictment of HealthSouth by the United States government for the accounting fraud committed against the company by members of its former management,' the company states in a news release."

Scrushy, HealthSouth Tangle Over Bylaws Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C2, Brooks) reports HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy and the "management team still cleaning up the mess left by the massive accounting fraud that occurred while he was in charge" sparred Wednesday over a Scrushy attempt to "put an unusual proposal before shareholders at today's annual meeting." His effort, "which concerned bylaw changes to give shareholders the power to set the size of the board and fill any vacant director slots, sparked a technical debate on whether it was one proposal or two." The SEC "was called in to referee," and Scrushy's efforts eventually failed. The Journal writes, "HealthSouth has spent $495 million on outside help to reconstruct its books as part of its recovery from the fraud the company has said inflated profits by almost $4 billion. So it is little surprise that HealthSouth's current bosses weren't interested in Mr. Scrushy's idea."

Leslie Scrushy Profiled. The Washington Post (5/18, D1, Guyon) runs a profile of Scrushy's wife Leslie Scrushy entitled "Richard Scrushy's Chief Believer." The piece runs more than 2,600 words.

Delaware Judge Could Boot Milberg Weiss From Class-Action Suit Role. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A2, Brickley, Plitch) reports Vice Chancellor Stephen Lamb of Delaware's "influential" Court of Chancery says he is not inclined to let Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP maintain the lead counsel slot in a shareholder class-action case regarding Russia's OAO Lukoil Holdings and its proposed takeover of a Kazakhstan company. Lamb cited the possibility that Milberg Weiss "could be indicted for allegedly paying kickbacks to lure lead plaintiffs." While the Lukoil lawsuit "isn't one of those believed to be at issue in the kickback probe," Lamb said the "chance that Milberg Weiss as well as some partners could face indictment argued against keeping it in charge of the case."

Federal Prosecutors Probing UnitedHealth Options Practices. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C1, Bandler, Forelle, Hechinger) reports Manhattan federal prosecutors have opened a criminal probe into the options-granting practices of UnitedHealth. The Minnesota-based health insurer "disclosed late yesterday that it had received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York. People familiar with the matter say that least one other company besides UnitedHealth has received a subpoena, and that the probe by the Southern District appears to be broad." UnitedHealth also said the IRS "had made a request for documents, suggesting that the agency may be looking at the tax implications of possibly misdated stock options." The AP (5/17) reports UnitedHealth "said it is cooperating fully" with the government requests.

Tenet Healthcare Settles Federal Case. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A13, Rundle) reports Tenet Healthcare "agreed to pay $21 million and divest its San Diego hospital in a federal settlement that ends a three-year criminal case. The deal potentially clears the way for Tenet to reach a wider resolution of its government investigations." The settlement between San Diego US Attorney Carol Lam and the company "averts a potential third criminal trial against Alvarado Hospital Medical Center, its former Chief Executive Officer Barry Weinbaum and a Tenet unit. The defendants were charged with paying kickbacks to doctors in exchange for patient referrals to the hospital." The Journal says the settlement "was a victory of sorts" for Lam "after her failure to obtain conviction of the defendants in two lengthy criminal trials."

The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Yi) quotes a Tenet spokesman saying, "We are optimistic that with the resolution of the Alvarado case, we can reach agreement soon with the federal government." The Los Angeles Business (5/18) reports Tenet "has long contended that it is innocent, and that overzealous prosecutors are taking advantage of vague federal regulations that are open to interpretation."

SEC Will Not Exempt Small Firms From Sarbanes-Oxley Audit Rules. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C4, Reilly, Scannell) reports the SEC has declined to exempt small companies from rules contained in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act that "would require them to prove they have adequate safeguards in place to catch accounting mistakes and fraud." The SEC "defied the wishes of its own small-business advisory panel" in the decision; the panel had said the internal control rules "are too costly for small companies and offer little benefit to investors."

The New York Times (5/18, Norris) writes that the SEC did move to make the rules "easier and less expensive to apply. But despite political pressure, the commission said smaller companies would eventually have to comply with rules governing their internal controls." SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said, "The basic message is the SEC is saying that there is no ultimate postponement for smaller companies." The Washington Post (5/18, D2, Day) writes that the SEC "will not issue proposed final rules for public comment for several months because of their complexity. But Cox said the agency took the unusual step of outlining the general form the rules will take to alert companies that an exemption will not be in the picture."

Ex-Musicland CEO Testifies At Teo Insider Trading Trial. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (5/18, Voreacos) reports Musicland Stores investor Alfred Teo "was told in 2000 that a pending acquisition of the company was a secret," according to ex-Musicland CEO Jack Eugster in testimony at Teo's insider trading trial. Eugster said he told Teo at the time that the offer by Best Buy "was confidential. Prosecutors say Teo illegally tipped eight friends to buy

Musicland stock and bought 25,000 shares himself before the transaction was announced on Dec. 7, 2000."

FBI, Miami Police Arrest Former Atlanta Hedge Fund Manager. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, McDonald, 2.11M) reports Kirk S. Wright, "a former Atlanta hedge-fund manager whose funds are missing more than $100 million in client assets," was "arrested in a Miami hotel yesterday by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Miami Beach police." Wright, "founder and Chief Executive of International Management Associates LLC, was apprehended at a Miami hotel after authorities received 'numerous leads from across the country,' said Stephen Emmett, a spokesman in the FBI's Atlanta office."

Professor Argues CEOs Are Not Overpaid. Tyler Cowen a professor of economics at George Mason University, writes in the New York Times (5/18), "Not surprisingly, many people think the American executives are overpaid." But in a new paper, "economists Xavier Gabaix of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Augustin Landier of the Stern School of Business at New York University offer a contrarian view. They suggest that the higher salaries for chief executives can largely be explained by increases in the value of the stock market. Viewed as a whole, these salaries are a result of competitive pressures rather than the exploitation of shareholders. … The growth in executive compensation reflects how much more is at stake in American companies. Is not the real question which policies and institutions have led to this explosion of value?"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Announces Creation Of Nationwide Anti-Web Predator Campaign. The Washington Times (5/18, Seper) reports Attorney General Gonzales "yesterday put into motion a nationwide program to protect children from online exploitation and abuse." Project Safe Childhood will "enhance the national response to a 'growing threat' to America's youths, and will allow U.S. attorneys nationwide to partner with a national network of 46 regional task forces to target online predators," Gonzales said. He also warned that, "at any given time, 50,000 predators are on the Internet 'prowling' for children." Gonzales continued, "Just this morning, I visited the FBI's Innocent Images Unit in Maryland, where I observed some of the aggressive behavior and graphic language used by these online pedophiles as they solicit our children. It is not an exaggeration to say that we are in the midst of an epidemic of sexual abuse and exploitation of our children."

Bloomberg TV (5/17, 4:54 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the start of a nationwide program called Project Safe Childhood designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse. The Attorney General toured a Justice Department computer center in Maryland where authorities track online predators. It's been estimated that at any given time there are some 50,000 predators on the Internet who are, in Gonzales's words, 'prowling' for children."

The AP (5/17) reports the project "calls for each U.S. attorney's office in the country to partner with state and local law enforcement to target internet predators. They will also try to find the children whose images have been found on the computers of those arrested. Project Safe Childhood will also provide training for investigators and prosecutors working cases involving computer crimes against children."

KATC-TV Lafayette, Louisiana (5/17, David) reports on its website that Gonzales "announced a new project to protect children from online abuse." The channel followed with a locally focused report on the impact of the program in the Lafayette area, where it "is already in place." US Attorney Donald Washington said, "The chances of you getting caught have gone up dramatically."

Sex Offender Charged In Child Porn Case. KTVB-TV Boise (5/18) reports on its website that convicted sex offender Jerry Banks has been charged producing and possessing child porn. Banks "is accused of producing and possessing child pornography. A federal grand jury charged 53-year-old Jerry Banks Sr. with producing a pornographic video of a baby boy, then taking those pictures and putting them on the Internet. The U.S. attorney's office says Banks is also charged with enticing a minor to engage in sexual activities."

Wisconsin Lawmakers Approve Satellite Monitoring Of Sex Offenders. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/18, Forster) reports that Wisconsin lawmakers voted Wednesday to require "lifetime global positioning system monitoring for certain child sex offenders." Gov. Jim Doyle said he intends to sign the measure. The "bill says that those who sexually assault a child under age 12, or use or threaten force or violence while molesting a child, would be subject to GPS tracking as a condition of parole, probation or extended supervision. The Legislative Fiscal Bureau estimated that such monitoring would cost $1.2 million for 285 offenders in the first year, and $2.3 million for 570 offenders in the second year."

DOJ Shuts Down Online Gambling Operation. The AP (5/17) reports that the Justice Department has dismantled a $2.5 billion offshore Internet gambling operation and charged two fugitives and their companies with laundering gambling proceeds from Internet casino games and sporting events. According to the AP, "A newly unsealed 12-count indictment filed in April 2005 accuses William Scott and Jessica Davis of illegally enticing gamblers to send funds from the United States to the Caribbean island of Antigua for wagers over the past eight years."

FBI Official Warns Of Offshoring's Intellectual Property Risks. In his Computerworld.com (5/17) blog, Robert L. Mitchell writes, "A few years back Boston-based FBI special agent Nenette Day busted a rogue programmer in India who had stolen the source code to SolidWorks Corp's CAD program. The sting, which took place in India, was a success in that SolidWorks was able to recover its software." But if "you think the perpetrator is rotting in jail, however, you'd be sadly mistaken." The case is "still dragging on in court, and it's unlikely that the defendant will ever serve jail time due to weak laws, Day says."

Pennsylvania Gambling Kingpin Returned To Prison. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (5/18, Cato) reports that John Francis "Duffy" Conley, the former kingpin of Western Pennsylvania's largest video poker empire, "was sent back to federal prison Wednesday for returning to his old ways -- running an illegal gambling operation and associating with known felons." Conley "was sentenced to four years by U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab for violating the conditions of his supervised release from previous gambling convictions. … State investigators say wiretaps from the investigation showed that Conley handled $3 million in bets in less than a month late last year and was employing people with felony convictions. He also hired people who have known ties to organized crime, investigators say."

House Ethics Committee Launches Ney, Jefferson, Cunningham Investigations. In a front-page story, The Washington Post (5/18, Weisman, 744K) reports, "After 16 months of inactivity and partisan infighting, the House ethics committee launched investigations last night into bribery allegations against Reps. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and William Jefferson (D-La.) and a separate inquiry into the widening scandal surrounding former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The probes "come after the Justice Department intensified corruption investigations of Ney and Jefferson, and after Cunningham pleaded guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes and was sent to prison." The Post adds that the committee "logjam was broken last month when Rep. Alan B. Mollohan…was forced to leave the panel amid accusations that he used his congressional position to funnel money to his own home-state foundations, possibly enriching himself." The New York Times (5/18, Shenon, 1.19M) notes that former Ney and Jefferson aides "have pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges" and "suggested in court papers that they were prepared to testify that their former bosses accepted bribes or other illegal gifts from government contractors or lobbyists. In a separate brief statement, the ethics committee…said that it would have investigated Representative Tom DeLay…but that the inquiry was short-circuited by Mr. DeLay's announcement that he would retire from the House." The AP (5/18, Margasak), Wall Street Journal (5/18, Mullins, 2.11M) and Roll Call (5/18, Bresnahan) also report on the ethics committee probes and the allegations against Ney and Jefferson.

Illinois Governor Accused Of Maintaining A Political "Favors List." WLS-TV Chicago (5/17, Goudie) reports on its website, "Allegations of lawbreaking have emerged in the race for governor of Illinois. Republican candidate Judy Barr Topinka says Democratic Governor Rod Blagoejvich doled out political favors to supporters. … According to Republican State Treasurer Judy Barr Topinka, Blagojevich was keeping an illegal 'favors list.'" … The so-called favors list includes 291 names and the names of their references, from ward bosses to political moguls to influential associates, even Blagojevich's now estranged father-in-law, Chicago Alderman Richard Mell, who Wednesday acknowledged making hiring recommendations to his son-in-law governor."

Senate Panel's Report On Abramoff Expected In June. Roll Call (5/18, Kane) reports Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) "said Wednesday that their staffs were close to finishing a final report on the Indian Affairs Committee investigation into ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff's bilking of his tribal clients." The Senators "said that the final report has been delayed because of the sheer amount of work involved in compiling a single narrative that attempts to wrap up the committee's roughly two-year probe into what the Justice Department has concluded was an Abramoff-led operation that stole at least $40 million from a handful of tribes." It "now appears likely that the report won't be completed until sometime in June at the earliest, with the Senate adjourning for the week-long Memorial Day recess late next week."

Safavian Defense Dealt Setbacks As Trial Approaches. Roll Call (5/18, Bresnahan) reports that with his "trial set to begin next week, David Safavian, the former Bush administration official accused of lying about his relationship with ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff, was dealt a series of setbacks by a federal judge Wednesday." US District Judge Paul L. Friedman "has ruled against an effort by Safavian to keep jurors from hearing allegations that he gave Abramoff confidential government information about one of Abramoff's clients." Friedman also "ordered that jurors can be told the full cost of a controversial Scotland golf junket that Safavian took part in during August 2002."

Former Chicago Official Testifies City Employees Forced To Work Campaigns. The Chicago Tribune (5/18, Mihalopoulos, Higgins, 643K) reports, "In a meeting at his City Hall office, the patronage chief for Mayor Richard Daley directed Mary Jo Falcon and her group of Asian city workers to help the mayor's re-election effort, Falcon testified Wednesday" at he corruption trial of the former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and three codefendants. Falcon "vividly detailed how she recruited her underlings in the city's Sewers and Water Management Departments for hands-on, street-level campaigning." The Tribune notes, "She said when the FBI searched her city office last year, she did not think she had committed a crime, although she 'thought there was something wrong with what I was doing.' Falcon conceded that Sorich never told her to falsify records to get favored job candidates on the payroll." The AP (5/18, Robinson) notes, "Prosecutors wanted the jurors to hear about the campaigning to give substance to the charge that the employees were hired because of their willingness to do political work -- in direct violation of a court order. The idea was to show how a so-called patronage army, banned by the court and subsidized by taxpayers, was put on the street to propel candidates to victory. Falcon testified that some of the campaigning was arranged in her office on city time. But there was no testimony that city workers hit the streets to ring doorbells on taxpayers' time."

Under the headline "Altering, Lying On City Forms 'Was My Job'," The Chicago Sun-Times (5/18, Steve, Korecki) reports, "Sorich's attorney, Thomas Durkin, gently tried to put Falcon's credibility in question as he had her acknowledge that she cooperated with federal investigators because she didn't want to go to jail. Falcon is testifying under immunity."

Illinois Supreme Court Disbars Former City Clerk. The Chicago Sun-Times (5/18, Herman) reports, "The Illinois Supreme Court took away former Chicago City Clerk James Laski's law license -- a penalty for his role in a bribery scandal. Laski pleaded guilty in March to taking bribes and trying to block an investigation into his role in the city's Hired Truck Program. The case triggered a probe by the Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission, the disciplinary arm of the Supreme Court."

Ryan Juror Brought Outside Research Not Related To Evidence Into Deliberations. The Chicago Tribune (5/18, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "A juror in former Gov. George Ryan's trial acknowledged bringing outside legal research into deliberations out of what she described as frustration over another juror's refusal to discuss testimony, according to a newly unsealed transcript. Under oath during a private telephone interview by a federal judge, the juror, Denise Peterson, emphasized that her limited research on the Internet had nothing to do with evidence in the case and played no part in the ultimate guilty verdict. U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer called Peterson's move an 'innocent mistake,' according to the transcript." The Tribune adds, "Peterson said she did a Google search about deliberating and printed out two pages from the American Judicature Society, a legal group. She also found an article about 'Dealing with Difficult People,' according to the transcript." The AP (5/18, Robinson) adds, "Defense attorneys argued the documents might be prejudicial enough to warrant throwing out the guilty verdict and ordering a new trial," but Pallmeyer "spoke with Peterson and another juror by phone May 5 and then allowed the verdict to stand."

Prosecutors Say Race Not Factor In Tennessee Waltz Targets. The AP (5/18) reports, "Prosecutors deny targeting black lawmakers in the Tennessee Waltz investigation and say transcripts a defendant is using to make such a claim show racial bias by one of the accused, not government agents. Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon, in seeking to get his bribery and extortion indictment dismissed, argues he is a victim of selective prosecution because he is black. … But prosecutors say a recorded conversation with a government informant shows that a Dixon associate tried to direct bribes to black lawmakers while blocking white legislators from getting at what appeared to be a rich pool of payoff cash. 'All racial discussion is initiated not by the government informant but by the co-defendant and agent for the defendant Dixon,' prosecutors say in opposition to Dixon's petition for dismissal of charges."

Former RNC Official Gets 10 Months In Prison For Phone Jamming Scheme. The AP (5/18, Saunders) reports, "Former Republican National Committee official James Tobin was sentenced to 10 months in prison Wednesday for his role in an Election Day phone-jamming plot against New Hampshire Democrats. … He also was fined $10,000, followed by two years probation. Prosecutors had asked for a two-year prison sentence." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Steven McAuliffe said Wednesday he was impressed by character witnesses who testified on Tobin's behalf, but wished Tobin 'had a better sense of how serious this was.'"

Muhammad Jurors View Alleged "Sniper's Nest" Car. The Washington Post (5/18, B5, Rich, Londoño) reports jurors in the Montgomery County, Maryland, trial of sniper John Allen Muhammad "were escorted to a secure loading dock in the courthouse building yesterday to see the modified Chevrolet Caprice that was allegedly used as a sniper's nest during the attacks that claimed 10 lives in the Washington area in October 2002." The Washington Times (5/18, Manning) says the " beaten-up former police car" is the "key to the prosecution's case against Muhammad -- the Bushmaster rifle used in the killings was in the Caprice when he and Lee Boyd Malvo were arrested Oct. 24, 2002. A hole was bored in the trunk, for a rifle barrel. Investigators also found two-way radios, a scrap of paper with the sniper task force tip-line phone number and paper with a list of schools in the Baltimore area."

Muhammad Underwent "Metamorphosis" Before Current Trial. The Washington Post (5/18, Rich) runs a front-page feature on what it calls "Muhammad's metamorphosis." He no longer is clad in "the orange jumpsuit he wore in Virginia when he was sentenced to death. Gone, too, is the hair that towered over him as he prepared for trial in Maryland." Looking "every bit the lawyer," he now "wears suits and ties. He carries with him a stack of legal papers, shuffling them purposefully at the defense table. He speaks the language of law, begging the 'court's indulgence' and asking that a 'continuous objection' be noted for the record." Because Muhammad is acting as his own attorney, the Maryland trial "has showcased Muhammad's personality and demeanor to a degree that his Virginia trial did not."

Virginia Police Officer Dies Of Gunshot Wounds From Attack. The Washington Times (5/18, Cella, Emerling) reports Fairfax County, Virginia, Master Police Officer Michael Garbarino died early Wednesday, a week after he was shot five times by Michael Kennedy in an "ambush" on a police station in Chantilly. Fairfax County Police Detective Vicky Armel was also killed in the incident, as was Kennedy.

The Washington Post (5/18, A22) editorializes that it "remains unclear" why Kennedy "was free to go on such a rampage. The details of his psychiatric history are still unknown to the public. Everything that is known, however, suggests that he was in desperate need of help he did not get. … Society pays in so many ways for failing to take the problem of mental illness seriously. One of those ways is tragic killings, like those of Detective Armel and Officer Garbarino."

Case Against Austin Cop Dismissed. KXAN-TV Austin, Texas (5/17) reports on its website, "An Austin police officer-involved shooting case has been thrown out of court, just before it was supposed to go to trial. Officer Scott Glasgow shot Jesse Owens Jr. five times back in 2003." Glasgow "shot 20-year-old Owens during a traffic stop where Glasgow pulled Owens over because he believed he was driving a stolen car. Glasgow then says Owens pulled him in through the window and drove off. That's when Glasgow shot and killed the young man. … The judge decided Glasgow was justified in using deadly force because there was no dispute Owens dragged him with his car."

Both Sides Of Duke Rape Case Playing To Public. The Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Jonsson) reports that legal analysts say both sides in the Duke sexual assault case "are going to new heights in playing to the public. … Going public is a strategy that has succeeded in the past, especially for defense teams who want the accuser's sexual history to be part of the trial, but who have been impeded in that aim by state shield laws intended to protect rape victims."

Federal Investigators Looking In To Connecticut Priest's Activities. The AP (5/17, Christoffersen) reports the Rev. Michael Jude Fay, a priest at St. John Roman Catholic Church in Darien, Connecticut, resigned "amid suspicions of financial wrongdoing and questions about his 'suitability for priestly ministry,'" according to Diocese of Bridgeport officials. The announcement "came the same day a private investigator gave results of his investigation to Darien police. Investigator Vito Colucci Jr. said he documented at least $200,000 in church money used to pay for Fay's lifestyle with a male companion." A spokesman for the US Attorney's office said federal authorities are also investigating.

Gargiulo Convicted Of Murder. The New York Times (5/18, Brick) reports that reputed organized crime figure Andrew Gargiulo was convicted of murder yesterday for killing his brother in law during a fight at a Brooklyn restaurant. Gargiulo "faces 25 years to life in prison when sentenced."

Washington-Area Bank Robber Gets Life Plus 95 Years. The Washington Post (5/18, B1, Weiss) reports that 29 year old Miquel Morrow yesterday was sentenced to life in prison plus 95 years on racketeering, conspiracy and other federal charges stemming from his in assaulting six banks, "terrifying employees and customers, spraying machine gun fire at a pursuing Prince George's County police officer." US District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly "was not about to be lenient, noting that Morrow 'terrorized' the community to satisfy his lust for money and a violent lifestyle."

Man Gets 14 Years For Swindling Scheme. Newsday (5/18, Kessler) reports that John Surgent, a convicted confidence man, was sentenced to 14 years in prison, "probably the stiffest sentence for a nonviolent, white-collar crime in the history of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District." Surgent "was sentenced Friday following conviction in July on charges of swindling hundreds of people around the country out of millions of dollars. A jury in Brooklyn deliberated for less than two hours before convicting Surgent of conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering. Many of the victims were elderly. Some lost all their retirement savings after being conned into investing in a shell company, Orex Mining, that Surgent set up in Plandome Manor, which he claimed could extract gold efficiently from very low-grade ore, officials said."

Witnesses In Lakin Case Make Courthouse Appearance. The Belleville (IL) News-Democrat (5/18) reports, "Lawyer Ed Unsell was at the federal courthouse Wednesday morning with witnesses who entered the federal grand jury room. Unsell filed and then dismissed a suit against prominent Madison County attorney L. Thomas Lakin, alleging Lakin sexually abuse minors and that the Lakin law firm tried to cover it up. Brad Lakin now runs the law practice and said the allegations are lies by people who tried to get $50 million from the firm."

Three Fugitives Arrested In Tallahassee. The Tallahassee Democrat (5/18) reports, "Two men wanted on warrants out of Maryland -- along with another man with a warrant out of Jacksonville -- were arrested in Tallahassee today the North Florida Violent Fugitives Task Force, Frank Chiumento, U.S. Marshals supervisor, said." Clinton Frie was wanted by Montgomery County, Maryland, "on warrants for home invasion, armed robbery, burglary, kidnapping, four counts of conspiracy, and possession of a firearm during a felony," while the county sought Deandre Goodrich "for two counts of violation of probation." The third man, Reginald Williams, "was wanted by the Jacksonville Sheriff's Office for forgery."

Former HBO Executive Jailed For Probation Violation. Brandweek.com (5/17, Edwards) reports, "Michele Rios-Nicosia Komack, the former director of print services at HBO who used her position to illegally obtain free designer shoes, foreign trips and parties at The Plaza Hotel, has been sentenced to seven months in federal prison for violating the terms of her probation. Komack pled guilty last year to charges of bid rigging, anti-trust conspiracy and tax evasion and was sentenced to five years' probation and 37 months of house arrest with electronic monitoring." Komack "violated the terms of that probation, which led to her being sentenced anew at U.S. Southern District Court in Manhattan on May 11."

CIVIL LAW:

Lawyers Will Seek To Postpone Depositions In UCI Medical Center Case. The Orange County (CA) Register (5/18) reports, "Attorneys for the former chief executive officer of UCI Medical Center will ask a judge today to halt next week's scheduled deposition by lawyers representing former patients suing over the now-shut liver transplant program. The hearing was sought by attorneys for Dr. Ralph Cygan, the first official placed on administrative leave when the program closed amid allegations of mismanagement. … More than 35 people have sued over the failure of the program. A subpoena for records was served on the UC Regents by the U.S. Justice Department in April, but federal authorities have declined to comment on what they are focusing on."

ITC Says Qualcomm Infringed On Broadcom Patents. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A9, Cheng) reports, "The U.S. International Trade Commission filed an opinion saying Qualcomm Inc. infringed on some of Broadcom Corp.'s patents -- a negative sign for Qualcomm in the two companies' ongoing legal dispute." The ITC report "said that two of Broadcom's patents were valid and that the protected technology was used illegally in several Qualcomm semiconductor sets, which go into cellphones. The two patents cover wireless telecommunications systems relating to power management and the maintenance of network integrity and optimal efficiency."

ACLU To Sue Black Jack, Missouri, Over Housing Law. USA Today (5/18, 3A, Moore) reports that the ACLU plans to sue the city of Black Jack, Missouri, which voted not to broaden a regulation on how many unrelated people can live together. … The federal Department of Housing and Urban Development is investigating whether Black Jack is violating fair housing law, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of family status or the number of children. The ACLU plans to sue the city whether or not HUD finds a violation."

Jurors In Bias Attack Case Asked About Use Of Racial Slur. The New York Times (5/18, Kilgannon) reports, "Potential jurors for the trial of a 19-year-old charged in a bias attack in Howard Beach last summer have been asked some unusual questions during jury selection: Do they listen to rap music? Are they familiar with hip-hop culture? Yesterday, the prosecution and defense asked them how they feel about a certain longstanding epithet denigrating black people. The epithet — or "the N-word," as the lawyer representing the defendant, Nicholas Minucci, repeatedly described it in court — may well be the crux of this high-profile case."

FBI Investigating Racist Graffiti At Kansas City Citgo Station. KSDK-TV Kansas City, MO (5/17) reports on its Web site, "Words of hate stunned motorists pulling into the Citgo station at exit 170" near Kansas City. "Investigators say sometime between 11:15 Tuesday night and 6 a.m. Wednesday morning, vandals with spray paint left their mark on walls, cars, and even gas pumps. One message believed to be directed to the owner and his clerk read, "Go back home to the Middle Eeast (sic)." … 'Pretty ignorant. We're not even from the Middle East, so just because we're kind of colored,' says Soofia Ahmed with a sigh. The clerk and her boss, store owner Andy Haroon, were both born in America, but they're of Pakistani heritage." KDKA notes FBI Kansas City SAC Thomas Noble said, "The reporting of hate crimes has increased significantly," and that the "are the number one priority for the civil rights unit." Noble added, "Primarily, the things we see are individuals doing dumb things that just express their own prejudice, bias against certain groups or people, which is unfortunate."

Wisconsin Elections Board Reverses Ruling On Voter IDs. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/18, Johnson) reports that the Wisconsin elections board has ruled that people who register to vote at the polls on election day won't be prohibited from casting ballots if they fail to produce their driver's licenses as long as they provide the last four digits of their Social Security number. The move "reverses the board's January decision that said people registering to vote on the day of an election must show their licenses or provide the license numbers. Under the rule, if people were issued a license but forgot to bring it, they would not have been allowed to vote until they showed it or provided the numbers."

ANTITRUST:

Judge Approves Extension Of Microsoft Antitrust Settlement Through 2009. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, B2, Anderson) reports US District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly said she will let DOJ extend portions of Microsoft's 2002 antitrust settlement "for at least two years until the end of 2009." Kollar-Kotelly said, "It sounds like at least on paper this is the way to go." She agreed with antitrust regulators and Microsoft officials that the extension "is needed while Microsoft improves the technology information it must give to software companies seeking to make products compatible with Microsoft operating software." The New York Times (5/18) reports Kollar-Kotelly "urged" Microsoft "to do all it could to expedite the process." She said, "I want to make sure we have the resources to get things done. I want to make sure we are not shortchanged." The Los Angeles Times (5/18) and the technology news service ZDNet (5/18, Broache) also report on the approval of the extension.

DOJ Says IE7 Does Not Violate Microsoft's Antitrust Agreement. The NewsFactor Network (5/17, Haskins), an online technology-related news service, reports that the Justice Department has concluded that "Internet Explorer 7 defaulting to the MSN search engine does not violate the conditions of Microsoft's antitrust agreement with federal and state governments. Google brought the Internet Explorer 7 search feature to the attention of Justice Department regulators and the European Commission earlier this month. In the informal complaint, Google alleged that the default setting was biased and would give Microsoft an unfair advantage. Rejecting Microsoft's contention that users simply could change the setting, Google said its research showed that picking a new default engine would be difficult, requiring multiple steps."

McClatchy Considers Bids For Philadelphia Newspapers. The AP (5/17, Sutel) reports, "McClatchy Co. on Wednesday began considering bids from several parties for two newspapers in Philadelphia, the latest to be sold as part of McClatchy's acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc. The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News are among 12 Knight Ridder newspapers that McClatchy doesn't plan to keep. … The bidders for the two Philadelphia papers included Mortimer B. Zuckerman, owner of the New York Daily News; Black Press Group Ltd., a Victoria, Canada-based newspaper publisher; and Yucaipa Cos., an investment firm that is working with a newspaper union. The bids were due late Tuesday."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

American Indian Arguments For Hemp Farming Rejected By South Dakota Appeals Court. In Sioux Falls, a federal appeals court has turned down American Indian arguments for hemp farming. The AP (5/18) reports the court said, "An American Indian treaty and U.S. law do not allow industrial hemp to be grown on an Indian reservation. … Alex White Plume, vice president of the Oglala Sioux tribe, and members of his family planted hemp three times on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation from 2000 to 2002, but it was confiscated by federal agents. … The family's lawyer...argued that the family had a right to grow hemp without a permit because of an 1868 treaty that encouraged Indian farming." According to the AP, a prosecutor argued that the family could have asked the DEA for permission to grow the crop on the reservation in South Dakota.

Nevada Company Charged With Clean Water Act Violation. The AP (5/18) reports that a federal grand jury has indicted Nevada-based Greg Street Plating Inc., with violating the Clean Water Act by dumping contaminated wastewater into a municipal sewer system in 2003. The one-count indictment "charges that late on the night of April 12, 2003, or early on April 13, 2003, an unknown employee dumped highly acidic waste into the sewer system leading to the Truckee Meadows Sewage Treatment Facility, serving the Reno-Sparks metropolitan area."

FBI Says Texas Environmental Activist Not Terrorist. The Corpus Christi Caller-Times (5/17, Martinez) reported, "Corpus Christi port and refinery officials know environmental activist Suzie Canales by sight. They say they've become accustomed to her standing outside their facilities, snapping photos and catching air samples in buckets. That's why the visit to her apartment by the FBI came as such a surprise, she said. 'My work is well-documented,' she said. 'I'm no terrorist.' The FBI agreed, after checking out a report from Citgo Petroleum Corp. to the National Response Center of suspicious activity outside its refinery April 1." The Caller-Times adds, "Albert Holl, supervisory senior resident agent with the FBI Corpus Christi office, confirmed that agents interviewed Canales at her apartment two weeks ago about the report from Citgo. 'Most of the time, when we approach people, we try to make it clear that it's pretty routine now,' Holl said."

FDA Seeks Possession Of Eggs From Disease Cure Case. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/18, Templeton) reports, "The U.S. Food and Drug Administration and U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan are scrambling to get possession of eggs -- 24.75 tons of powdered ones -- that were the focus of an FDA case against claims the eggs cure disease. The FDA case against Dr. Marilyn Coleman, 60, of Richwood, Ohio, and Mitchell Kaminski, whose business address is Northfield, Ill., and their company, Ovlmmune Inc., led to convictions against both and the corporation on charges the egg powder was mislabeled as a treatment or cure for diseases, including AIDS and cancer, without FDA approval."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Florida Pipe Bomb Suspect Pleads Not Guilty. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/18, Gardiner) reports Sean Britnell of Broward County, Florida, who allegedly sold pipe bombs to an undercover ATF agent, "pleaded not guilty Wednesday in Fort Lauderdale federal court to charges of possessing a destructive device." Last month, a restaurant co-worker of Britnell's overheard him talking about making pipe bombs and notified ATF. An undercover agent "arranged to meet with Britnell on April 19 in the restaurant's parking lot. Saying that he wanted to scare someone who owed him money, the agent asked Britnell if he could buy some pipe bombs from him, according to court records. Britnell told the agent the bombs cost $75 each. The agent ordered 10 of them, the records said." One week later, the agent met Britnell in a strip mall, where Britnell "delivered the 18-inch pipes filled with gunpowder, authorities said. A green fuse stuck out of one end of the capped pipes, court records said. The next day, ATF agents obtained records from Home Depot showing that on April 25, Britnell bought 10 pipes, a drill and end caps. He was arrested May 3. Britnell has been ordered held on $300,000 bond."

Woman Angered By ATF Raid Of Home. WDTN-TV Dayton (5/17, D'Marko) reports on its website that ATF agents "raided a Dayton home and arrested a man for dealing firearms illegally. Now the woman who lives there said they got the wrong man, and she's upset about the damage they did during the raid." Latisha Haynes said she and her boyfriend James Lamar Gober "got a rude awakening" when the ATF entered their home "with guns drawn about six o'clock Wednesday morning." Gober was arrested on charges of dealing firearms without a license and distribution of crack cocaine. Haynes said the agents "broke the lock, emptied drawers and closets, even ripped open her couch cushions. But the most frightening part for her was the wake-up call." Haynes said, "They come in with guns pointed at me, and I'm naked in the bed, me and my dude."

FBI Searches For Hoffa's Remains On Michigan Farm. Following up on new leads, FBI agents yesterday searched a farm in Milford, Michigan, for the remains of Jimmy Hoffa. The story received heavy press coverage, particularly on TV news programs last night.

ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 4, 1:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "It's been more than 30 years since the former Teamsters Union boss disappeared under very suspicious circumstances." ABC (Thomas) added, "A source familiar with the investigation, tell us that recent leads appear to corroborate earlier tips that Hoffa may have been buried at a horse farm just outside of Detroit." Vargas: "Now, this is the latest in a long string of searches that have been thus far, fruitless." Thomas: "The FBI has been down this road many times before. In each case, failing to find Hoffa's remains. … This is the third time in the last three years that the FBI has been digging in the Detroit area." Vargas: "But clearly they think they there's enough merit to this tip to go forward and dig, in fact." Thomas: "Yes, I spoke to a senior FBI official a little while ago who said we have reached the threshold that we have to go out there and take a look."

USA Today (5/18, 3A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "FBI Special Agent Terry Booth said he hoped the dig would end up differently than several unsuccessful excavations from the past. 'We're hoping to put this to bed after 30 years,' Booth said. … 'This is one we felt we needed to follow up on,' FBI agent Dawn Clenney said of the tip that led them to Milford Township." In a very widely-distributed story, the AP (5/18, Martin) adds Clenney said that "investigators are looking for 'evidence of criminal activity that may have occurred under previous ownership' on the property," but "asked if they were looking for Hoffa's remains, she said, 'Could be,' but declined to comment further. A law enforcement source in Washington, D.C., said Wednesday's search was based on information developed several years ago and verified more recently. … Organized crime figures had used the area for meetings, but the location was never used again after Hoffa disappeared, the source said."

The Detroit News (5/18, Shepardson) reports Clenney said that the search "was based on one of numerous leads the FBI has received and declined to say if the search would continue into the night. The search could take several days. … Unlike previous excavations in recent years by local police, this is the first by the FBI and approved by federal prosecutors -- suggesting it might have more credibility than other efforts. But one senior federal official downplayed the search, saying the odds of finding Hoffa's body were '30 percent at best.'" The Detroit Free Press (5/18, Ashenfelter) notes Clenney's comments to the AP and adds, "Oakland County Prosecutor David Gorcyca said Bloomfield Township police, who the FBI called in for assistance, told him that the FBI had received a promising tip in the case." WDIV-TV reported Wednesday that "agents planned to return Thursday morning with heavy equipment to dig."

In last night's broadcasts, CNN's Situation Room, CNN's Paula Zahn Now, CNN's Anderson Cooper 360, MSNBC's Rita Cosby Live and Direct, MSNBC's Hardball with Chris Matthews, MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olbermann, FOX News' Fox Report with Shepard Smith and FOX News' On the Record with Greta Van Susteren also reported on the FBI search.

Colorado FBI Agent Indicted For Allegedly Falsifying Travel Expenses. The Denver Post (5/18, Caldwell) reports, "An FBI agent based in Colorado Springs was indicted today by a federal grand jury, accused of falsifying $6,832 in travel expenses." Douglas V. Brennan "was staying in a Denver hotel for nine weeks in 2003 as he testified in a federal trial, according to a news release from the U.S. Department of Justice. The DOJ paid for his lodging. But according to the indictment, Brennan also submitted bills and was reimbursed by the FBI for hotel costs. … 'He billed the FBI for lodging expenses knowing full well that they had not been incurred by him,' said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah." The AP (5/18) adds, "He has been placed on paid administrative leave, said FBI spokeswoman Monique Kelso. … Federal prosecutors in Utah were assigned the case to avoid a conflict of interest for prosecutors in Colorado. Court documents said Brennan had not been arrested and that prosecutors would not ask that he be jailed pending a trial." The Rocky Mountain News (5/18) notes, "A summons was issued for Brennan to appear in federal court on June 2 before Magistrate Judge Craig B. Shaffer."

Florida FBI Employee Arrested On Housing Subsidy Fraud Charges. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/17, Blum, 249K) reported, "Prosecutors say Raquel Bonifacio of Davie received valuable housing subsidies from the federal government for three years by lying about her income. That she may have gotten away with it until recently is particularly surprising given her place of employment -- the FBI." Bonifacio, an FBI administrative assistant who earned more than $40,000 a year, "was arrested Tuesday on charges she stole money from taxpayers by collecting almost $25,000 in Section 8 housing assistance that she was not entitled to receive." The Sun-Sentinel noted, "The FBI suspended Bonifacio without pay and revoked her top-secret security clearance as a result of the criminal charges, FBI spokeswoman Judith Orihuela said. Bonifacio has worked for the FBI for approximately three years."

Pennsylvania Felon Faces Gun Possession Charge. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (5/18) reports that Desmond Ham "has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Pittsburgh on a charge of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. … According to the indictment, Ham possessed a .357 Smith & Wesson handgun on or about May 13, 2005. A person convicted of a felony is prohibited by federal law from possessing a firearm. Ham has a prior felony conviction for aggravated assault."

Activists Call For Stricter Enforcement Against Gun Trafficking. The AP (5/17, Pfister) reports that New Jersey legislators, law enforcement officials and gun control advocates "renewed their call for stricter enforcement against illegal gun trafficking across state lines. Trenton Mayor Doug Palmer and activists from Ceasefire NJ and the Million Mom March said Wednesday that many violent crimes are committed with firearms purchased by 'straw purchasers.'"

FBI Arrests Alabama Sheriff's Deputy On Weapons Charge. WTVY-TV Dothan, AL (5/17) reports on its Web site, "The FBI arrested a member of the Houston County sheriff's department." Michael Shawn Campbell "is charged with selling a firearm to a convicted felon. Campbell, a member of the sheriff's narcotics unit, is also charged with possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute. He was arrested by FBI agents just before reporting to work Wednesday."

FBI Agent Testifies Gambino Capo Pressed DJ To Promote Mob-Owned Restaurant. The New York Daily News (5/18, Zambito, 729K) reports, "Reputed mobster Greg DePalma allegedly tried to pressure WKTU-FM (103.5 FM) morning show host Goumba Johnny and deejay Johnny Rocks into plugging a Harlem restaurant owned by another reputed wiseguy. 'He wanted to promote the restaurant because it was owned by [Louis] Filipelli,' FBI agent Joaquin Manuel Garcia testified yesterday during DePalma's racketeering trial in Manhattan Federal Court. … The 49-year-old radio host, whose real name is John Sialiano, served five months in prison in 2000 for cheating on his taxes while managing the Manhattan strip club Scores in the mid-1990s. DePalma and his son were snared in the same FBI probe." The New York Post (5/18, Cornell, 624K) adds, "But the agent said DePalma was only partly successful because Goumba Johnny refused to plug the restaurant. 'He was angry at Greg,' Garcia told defense attorney Martin Geduldig during cross-examination. 'I think Johnny Rocks did it.'"

FBI Seeks Interviews With GOP Convention Protesters In NYPD Civil Rights Probe. As The New York Times reported yesterday, he AP (5/18, Neumeister) reports in a widely-distributed story, "The FBI is investigating whether police violated the rights of protesters at the 2004 Republican National Convention, according to a letter sent by the bureau to the New York Civil Liberties Union. In the letter…the FBI asked the civil rights group for help, saying it believed the organization's lawyers had represented people arrested at the convention." The AP adds, "The NYCLU was prepared to provide the FBI with videos showing that officers of the New York Police Department failed to properly warn hundreds of protesters before they were arrested, said Chris Dunn, the group's legal director. FBI spokesman James Margolin on Wednesday said only that he did not deny the letter had been sent to the NYCLU."

Protesters' Lawyer Says FBI Should Investigate Former NYPD Attorney. The New York Sun (5/18, Hope) reports, "A former top lawyer for the New York Police Department, Stephen Hammerman, who was commended by Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly for his role in handling the protests at the 2004 Republican convention, may soon have the FBI knocking on his door" in the civil rights investigation. "A lawyer for several protesters, Gideon Oliver, said yesterday he would push to have the former deputy commissioner of legal affairs investigated for his role in the arrests, based on Mr. Hammerman's actions as documented in video evidence." The Sun adds, "Mr. Hammerman said yesterday that allegations that he acted inappropriately were 'nonsense.' A spokesman for the police department, Paul Browne, said in a statement that the NYPD is cooperating with the FBI investigation."

NYDaily News Criticizes NYCLU, Conyers For Pushing Probe On FBI. Under the headline "The FBI Has Better Things To Do," The New York Daily News (5/18, 729K) editorializes, "The very long list of duties assigned to the FBI's New York office starts with counterterrorism investigations and is fully subscribed after that by more traditional, pressing criminal matters like the mob, Internet fraud and political corruption. The city's G-men and G-women have their hands full." Now, "thanks to the New York Civil Liberties Union and Rep. John Conyers, a Michigan Democrat and inveterate police basher, the bureau's targets in the city have been expanded…to include one Officer Matthew Wohl, who is alleged to have sworn falsely in connection with the arrest of a convention protester or three." The Daily News adds that the FBI letter to the NYCLU "was in its own way comforting and funny. If you know of anybody whose rights may have been violated, give us a call, the FBI said. An agent will answer the phone, and that's all the effort this case deserves."

Plea Agreements End 10-Year FBI Probe Of Vegas Nightclub. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (5/17, Knapp) reports on its Web site, "A ten-year FBI investigation into the Crazy Horse Too adult nightclub is over. A deal was reached Wednesday between the club and federal prosecutors, and it will avoid a lengthy trial for 18 defendants." Nightclub owner Rick Rizzolo "agreed to get out of the adult business forever and could serve a maximum of 16 months in prison with half of that as house arrest." His lawyer "says he will ask for probation. For Rizzolo, the deciding factor might have been the government's promise that it would not indict his father, sister, and brother."

FBI, Coast Guard Say Missing Cruise Passenger Fell Overboard. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/18, Kay) reports Royal Caribbean passenger Daniel DiPiero of Canfield, Ohio, "fell overboard after a night of heavy drinking with friends, authorities said Wednesday as Coast Guard crews suspended their search for the man. … Investigators from the FBI and the Coast Guard interviewed DiPiero's companions, other travelers and crew members Wednesday aboard the ship, the company said. They found that DiPiero and his friends concealed liquor in mouthwash bottles and brought a bottle of rum in their luggage." WPLG-TV Miami (5/17) adds on its Web site, "The FBI and Coast Guard thoroughly reviewed the digital video recording captured by the ship's security systems, which recorded the young man alone on an outside portion of deck four…between 12:12 a.m. and 2:16 a.m. Monday. The FBI and Coast Guard indicated to family members that the young man went overboard at 2:16 a.m. Monday and that he was alone at the time."

FBI, Texas Police Searching For Bank Robber. KGBT-TV Harlingen, TX (5/17, Cavazos) reports on its Web site, "The FBI and Brownsville police are searching for the man involved in a bank robbery in Brownsville. Investigators are hoping someone can recognize the thief from this surveillance video taken at the bank. … The man reportedly stood in line to talk to a clerk, then gave her a note with directions to hand over the money. He then calmly walked out of the bank with $3500 in cash."

Philadelphia On Way To Record Number Of Bank Robberies. WPVI-TV Philadelphia (5/17) reports on its Web site, "The number of bank robberies is up 123% from last year. That's because numbers in 2005 were down. The FBI says if things don't change, we could see a new record and this is concerning to law enforcement. It is quick to carry out and difficult to prevent."

Man Among World's "Most Hunted" Drug Traffickers Arrested In Brazil. The arrest of accused drug trafficker Pablo Rayo Montano received wide media coverage, with news outlets making more than 200 references to his capture. For example, the AP (5/18, Goodman) reports, "One of the world's most hunted drug traffickers _ accused of shipping more than 70 tons of cocaine to the United States _ has been arrested in Brazil as part of an international crackdown. Colombian-born Pablo Rayo Montano, who had been on the run for a decade, was captured Tuesday in Sao Paulo as part of an operation coordinated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and involving anti-drug police in eight other countries. … 'The Rayo-Montano organization had its own private, rogue navy to run a drug business that was nearly as sophisticated as a small nation,' said DEA administrator Karen P. Tandy in a press release." The AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of CBS News, the New York Times, Washington Post, USA Today, Forbes, San Diego Union Tribune, Houston Chronicle, San Jose Mercury News, the UK's Guardian, and the China Post.

The Washington Times/ UPI (5/17) reports, "An international team of drug investigators has seized 52 tons of cocaine and three islands off Panama in breaking up an alleged drug-trafficking ring. … U.S. federal indictments in the case were returned in Florida and Washington, charging members of the RAYO-Montano operation with money laundering and conspiracy and possession with intent to distribute cocaine."

According to AFP (5/17), "Thirty-two people were indicted in Miami, and three islands as well as yachts and art work were seized in a 10-nation operation against a Colombian drug trafficking ring. The Twin Oceans operation dismantled the cartel led by Colombian Pablo Rayo-Montano, considered one of the world's leading drug dealers. … The US Justice Department said another 70 million dollars worth of assets, including yachts, fishing trawlers, art galleries and other businesses would be seized."

The Washington Times (5/18, Seper) reports, "DEA spokesman Steven Robertson said the investigation revealed a far-reaching cocaine trafficking and money laundering organization based in Colombia. Mr. Robertson said arrests were made in Colombia, Brazil, Panama, Ecuador and Costa Rica. He said four gang suspects also were arrested in Miami and one was taken into custody in Indianapolis. In Los Angeles, he said, DEA agents tracked down one suspect to an apartment complex, where he was taken into custody after answering a knock on his door by a DEA agent posing as a pizza delivery man."

Operation Twin Oceans was a three-year multi-agency probe, according to the Miami Herald (5/17, Yanez, Weaver), which adds that the operation "snared Pablo Rayo-Montano, one of the U.S. government's most-wanted drug traffickers, along with 100 associates." The Herald reports that in a press release, Karen Tandy said, "As well-equipped and complex as this enterprise was, it was a matter of time before law enforcement caught on, and now Rayo-Montano's decadent, drug-funded lifestyle has caught up with him. … His real estate holdings went from three islands to one jail cell."

Knight Ridder (5/18) reports, "New York City-based DEA agents involved in 'Operation Twin Oceans' helped identify Rayo-Montano's associates, and an investigation was continuing to run down his city connections, a DEA spokeswoman said. Rayo-Montano used the small islands off Panama's Pacific coast as shipment points for his fleet of cargo vessels outfitted with underwater lines to tow submersibles packed with cocaine, DEA officials said." The Knight Ridder story was used by New York Daily News and Florida's Bradenton Herald.

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/17, Blum) reports, "Law enforcement officials said Rayo-Montano's cartel smuggled more than 15 tons of Colombian cocaine per month into the United States. The enterprise was involved in the production, transport, distribution, and sale of drugs, officials said. Thirty-two individuals associated with the drug ring face charges in South Florida." DEA agent Mark Trouville in Miami "said the effort was dubbed Operation Twin Oceans because the Rayo-Montano organization shipped drugs from both the west and north coasts of Colombia using a variety of vessels." The Sun-Sentinel story also was used by the Kansas City Star and Contra Costa Times.

On its Web site, CNN (5/17) reports, "The DEA said Rayo-Montano, who is in his late 40s, has been involved in drug trafficking for almost two decades. He is the 42nd person arrested on the U.S. list of alleged drug traffickers designated as 'consolidated priority organization targets.'"

According to the FOX News (5/17) Web site, the DEA "says 'Don Pablo' RAYO-Montano was the chief of a crime organization that used highly sophisticated technological methods to coordinate the movement of cocaine north and illegal drug proceeds south. The RAYO-Montano organization also has been associated with Colombian narco-terrorist groups such as the Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC), the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC) and the Norte del Valle Cartel."

Local TV Coverage. WSCV-TV, Telemundo Miami-Ft. Lauderdale (5/17, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Colombian drug lord Pablo Rayo Montano was captured in Sao Paulo, Brazil, with [another] 31 people [in a] DEA coordinated operation. Montano is accused of moving 70 tons of cocaine into the US."

WRGB-TV, Albany-Schenectady-Troy, New York (5/17, 5:30) reported, "The Drug Enforcement Administration says Operation Twin Oceans was a success, arresting 100 people, seizing 52 tons of cocaine and 70-million dollars in assets. The DEA along with officers from Brazil, Panama and Colombia brought down Pablo Rayo-Montano's drug trafficking organization. Which was responsible for smuggling more than 15 tons of cocaine per month into the US and Europe."

WCTV-TV, Tallahassee-Thomasville, Florida (5/17, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "One of the world's most hunted drug traffickers arrested in Brazil. Colombian-born Pablo Rayo Montano, on the run for a decade [was] captured yesterday in Sao Paulo as part of an operation coordinated by the US Drug Enforcement Administration."

Customs Agents In New York Make $1 Million Marijuana Seizure. The AP (5/17) reports from Lewiston, New York, that a truck driver "tried to smuggle nearly 340 pounds of hydroponic marijuana worth more than $1 million into the United States," according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection. "Amarjit Singh, 35, a citizen of India with resident status in Canada, applied for entry into the United States at the Lewiston Bridge Sunday, saying he was hauling a commercial shipment of bales of grow mix destined for Alabama."

Sixteen Indicted In Drug Ring Investigation Linked To Bloods Street Gang. The Sunbury (PA) Daily Item (5/18) reports, "Sixteen more people were indicted on federal drug charges Wednesday morning in the second day of a drug sweep targeting the Bloods, a New York City-based gang allegedly selling crack cocaine in Northumberland, Snyder and Union counties. Thirteen of those indicted were in custody Wednesday morning with officials searching for three more. All were connected to the Bloods with 14 of the 16 from the New York City area. Two were from Sunbury."

Texas Police Find MS-13 Members Among Group Of Illegals. KRG-TV Harlingen, TX (5/17) reported on its website, "Sheriff's investigators were looking for robbery suspects but stumbled across MS-13 gang members instead. Officers found 84 illegal immigrants in an apartment complex in Granjeno. Two of them were discovered to be members of the Mara Salvatruchas, the notoriously violent gang from El Salvador. Officers sent 83 of the illegals, including the MS-13 gang members, to the Border Patrol. They are being processed for deportation."

Reporting On Project Mas Dinero Continues. Canada's YorkRegion.com (5/17) writes, "Cops on both sides of the border helped put the sting on a multi-million dollar drug smuggling ring last week, accused of shipping dope by land and lake. Dubbed Project Masdinero…the joint forces initiative lead to more than 250 charges against 24 people, including 11 York Region residents from Richmond Hill, Markham and Vaughan. … The Canada Border Security Agency also played a role, and as the investigation progressed, assistance was provided by the Windsor OPP drug squad, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and Detroit law enforcement agencies."

$1.6 Million In Cocaine Seized In New Jersey Bust. NorthJersey.com (5/17) reports detectives descended on a house in West Paterson Tuesday, arrested two people and seized 180 pounds of cocaine worth about $1.6 million. "The arrests resulted from a six-month investigation by a team of 10 detectives assigned to the county's anti-drug task force. They were assisted by officers from Paterson and West Paterson and agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration."

Accused Gang Members Face Drug Conspiracy Charges In New Jersey. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/18) reports, "Rashad Smith and 19 other people who authorities say belong to a South Camden drug gang called the M.O.B. Boys were charged with drug conspiracy in a criminal complaint unsealed yesterday in federal court. … The M.O.B. Boys sold at least $20,000 worth of cocaine and crack each week in the 1200 block of Morton Street, where they sometimes operated 24 hours a day, authorities said."

The AP (5/17) reports, "A violent Camden cocaine-dealing operation was broken up Wednesday as authorities arrested 10 people in early-morning raids, officials said. In all, 20 alleged drug dealers, suppliers and bulk purchasers were charged in criminal complaints. Four were already in custody and six were fugitives, authorities said. Legal filings show the so-called 'M.O.B. Boys' organization killed a man…to protect its turf in March."

Cherry (NJ) Hill Courier-Post (5/18) writes, "Drug peddlers whose violent, sometimes deadly influence stretched from Camden to Atlantic City were in jail or on the run Wednesday at the conclusion of a three-year investigation," according to federal authorities.

DEA Assists In Rhode Island Cocaine Investigation. The Providence (RI) Journal (5/18) reports from Newport that police "say they arrested four major suppliers of crack cocaine and a slew of street-level dealers Tuesday, capping an eight-month investigation that focused on local public-housing projects. One of the prime suspects was subdued with a Taser stun gun when he tried to escape during the drug sweep, according to Lt. Michael Brennan. … Brennan said that the department requested the assistance of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration because of the amount of drugs being moved and because some of the suspects had extensive criminal records for dealing drugs."

DEA Agents Help Capture Carjacking Suspect In Florida. Florida Today (5/17) reports DEA agents "conducting surveillance in Orange County, Fla., [yesterday] spotted a carjacking in progress and helped police capture a suspect. Police said a 20-year-old man carjacked a vehicle near…the Florida Mall. … DEA agents helped police get a quick jump on the crime as it was happening."

Two Men Sentenced In Illinois In Cocaine, Gun-Possession Cases. The Benton (IL) Evening News (5/17) reports on the sentencing of two Mt. Vernon men in unrelated federal cases that involved the DEA. "Jason R. Myers, 26, was sentenced May 10 to 292 months of imprisonment after he had pleaded guilty to a three-count superseding indictment charging conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine and two counts of distribution of crack cocaine. … Deondery L. Chambers Jr., May 12 was sentenced to 188 months in prison after he had pleaded guilty to one count of being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm."

Sentence Expected In Meth Case Following Colorado Man's Guilty Plea. The Brighton (CO) Standard-Blade (5/17) reports, "A 26-year-old Brighton man is scheduled to be sentenced Thursday, May 18, in U.S. District Court for his role in a drug ring that led to federal charges against seven men following an eight-month, multijurisdiction investigation. Kenneth F. Fuqua, 26, of Brighton pleaded guilty March 9 to one count of conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine. … Fuqua was one of seven men charged with felony drug violations following an investigation that involved the Drug Enforcement Administration and Boulder County Drug Task Force."

IMMIGRATION:

Gonzales Comments On Grandparents' Immigration Get Attention. CNN (5/17, 10:48 a.m., Kagan) reported, "A startling admission by one of the President's most trusted insiders. Here now is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a candid exchange with CNN's Wolf Blitzer during 'The Situation Room.'" Gonzales: "Three of my grandparents were born in Mexico. They came to Texas. My parents, both my parents, were born in Texas. Extremely poor. My mother had--" Blitzer: "But when they came to Texas, were they legally documented, were they unlegally documented?" Gonzales: "You know, it's unclear. It's unclear. And I've looked at this issue, I've talked to my parents about it, and it's just not clear." Kagan: "Gonzales says that those humble beginnings gave him the route to the American Dream. His father had only a second grade education. Gonzales has gone on to become the government's top lawyer."

The Washington Post (5/18, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts) "Reliable Source" also runs the quote, and writes that "in the midst of the fierce congressional debate about immigration reform," Gonzales "says he's not sure whether his Mexican grandparents entered the country legally."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Tax Cut Extension Bill. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 2, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush was bullish on the economy today. He predicted a strong lift from the $70 billion tax cut package he signed into law. He said the cuts originally passed in 2003, have helped expand the economy and create jobs. The major provisions extend tax breaks on dividends and capital gains for two years. And protect 15 million taxpayers for the minimum tax for one more year."

NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 2, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported the President "said tax cuts have spurred economic growth in this country, but Democrats said today that cuts mainly help the very wealthy and have ballooned that Federal deficit number." The CBS Evening News (5/17, lead story, 2:05, Mason, 7.66M), in a story about stock market losses yesterday, showed Bush saying, "The American economy is powerful, productive, and prosperous and we're going to keep it this way."

In a story about the budget resolution debate in the House, the New York Times (5/18, Andrews, 1.19M) reports "the $70 billion bill that Mr. Bush signed would extend his 2003 tax cuts on stock dividends and capital gains for an extra two years, to 2010, and shield 15 million taxpayers for one more year from a big increase in the Alternative Minimum Tax."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/17, Quijano) reported, "The White House and Republicans believe that by highlighting this victory on tax cuts, that can help on a number of fronts, particularly at a time when there is such a deep divide within the GOP on the issue of immigration. … This is also coming at a time when the President has of course been trying to boost his approval ratings, which are now hovering in the low 30s and at a time when Republicans are trying to keep control of Congress. So now President Bush can put these tax cuts in his win column, and Republicans will be able to tout the cuts this election year." The AP (5/18, Riechmann) also says the GOP "sees the extensions as a chance to raise approval ratings for the president and the Republican-controlled Congress. Public opinion surveys put the ratings at their lowest points in the Bush presidency. … Voters will not feel the impact before the November election; for investors, it will be until the next president is about to take office, in 2009." Democrats "say the cuts favor the wealthy and even oil companies."

The Washington Times (5/18, Dinan, 90K) reports the National Republican Senatorial Committee "issued press releases accusing Democratic candidates in swing states of having voted for a tax increase." But Sen. Charles E. Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, "said the vote will 'stay with the president and stay with every Republican member who voted for this bill from now until November 6.'"

House Expected To Approve Budget Resolution Today. The Washington Times (5/18, Fagan, 90K) reports, "The House was expected to approve a $2.7 trillion budget blueprint early this morning, after Republican leaders promised the more liberal wing of their party some increase in health and education spending. 'We have the votes, and we expect to pass it late evening or early morning,' said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican." The Times adds, "Approval of the nonbinding blueprint for 2007 spending comes after weeks of negotiations between Republican leaders and their members."

The AP (5/18, Taylor) says "House Republican leaders seemed confident they would be able to pass" the measure. They "became more optimistic Wednesday afternoon after promising to insert into the bill nonbinding language endorsing a 5 percent increase over President Bush's $138 billion request for a popular measure funding the departments of Labor, Health and Human Services and Education."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Rogers, 2.11M), however, says that "as lawmakers worked late into last night, the outcome remained uncertain on final passage." But "having pulled back twice before, the leadership could no longer postpone action on what has been a signature responsibility for decades for whichever party rules the House." The Journal adds that "final changes, approved on a 226-193 vote last evening would create a new 'deficit neutral' $3.1 billion reserve fund dedicated to increase resources for health and education programs. Together with money already shifted from defense and foreign-aid accounts, the resolution pledges that at least $7.16 billion more will be added to what Mr. Bush allowed for the departments of Labor, Education and Health and Human Services."

The New York Times (5/18, Andrews, 1.19M) reports "the measure calls for increasing military spending by 7 percent, to nearly $558 billion in 2007, a figure that includes $50 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan." The package "would essentially freeze or cut spending on most domestic discretionary programs, including education, energy and national parks, and it calls for trimming $6.8 billion over five years from entitlement programs like Medicaid and farm subsidies." The plan "would raise the debt ceiling by $653 billion, to $9.6 trillion, and it assumes that the shortfall next year will be $348 billion, about what it is likely to be in 2006."

Boehner Warns Incumbents Could Lose Committee Assignments If They Oppose Resolution. The Hill (5/18, Bolton) reports, "House Majority Leader John Boehner issued a veiled threat to GOP incumbents yesterday that they could be stripped of plum committee assignments if they voted against his budget resolution. Three and a half months into his job, Boehner flexed his authority at a closed-door meeting, saying those lawmakers who do not face difficult races in November's midterm election have no reason to vote against the budget, according to people who attended the conference session."

Cost Of Retirement Programs To Balloon Soon. USA Today (5/18, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Taxpayers will soon get a surprise bill that could exceed $1 trillion for the cost of paying future medical benefits for state and local workers who retire. Retiree medical costs are the biggest long-term challenge that state and local governments face. By comparison, state and local pensions have an unfunded liability of about $500 billion." State and local governments "have set aside $2.5 trillion to help pay pension benefits for 19 million civil servants and 7 million retirees. But they have set aside almost nothing to pay for retiree medical benefits." USA Today adds, "New accounting rules require that governments, starting next year, put a price tag on the value of medical benefits promised to civil servants when they retire. New York City's liability, for example, approaches $50 billion. The city's total budget last year was $53 billion." The Federal government also "has a $2.3 trillion unfunded liability for medical and disability benefits promised to civil servants and military personnel who retire. The costs are not the nation's biggest financial problem. Medicare has a $33.4 trillion unfunded liability. Social Security has a $4.6 trillion shortfall."

White House Threatens Veto Over Agriculture Subsidies. The AP (5/18, Quaid) reports, "Giving money to farmers, traditionally a popular election-year idea, is growing less popular in this election year." The Senate "wants to spend nearly $4 billion to help farmers cope with high fuel prices and damage from severe weather. House leaders object to the aid, saying Congress spends money too freely. President Bush is threatening a veto." The White House "dislikes the farm aid because it raises the price of a spending bill for the Iraq war and hurricane recovery. Beyond that, the farm money would not give energy relief to every farmer, said Bush's agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns."

White House Considers Commerce's Gutierrez For Treasury. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/17) reports, "Unable so far to find any takers on Wall Street for the Treasury secretary's post, administration officials say that the White House is more open to considering Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez as John Snow's replacement. 'They can't find anyone for the job,' said one Bush associate of the drawn out search for a new Treasury secretary. 'They like Gutierrez,' he added." The Bulletin adds it has "been long expected that Snow would leave this spring or summer, serving out the normal three years in the post. Officials emphasized that Snow is not being pushed out. As the Administration has failed to find a Wall Street executive to take the post, it has looked inside its ranks for a replacement and is focusing on Gutierrez, said the insiders. The Cuban immigrant who ran Kellogg's has fast become a favorite in the West Wing because of his tireless salesmanship of the Administration's agenda, his strong congressional relations, and his ability to bring a businessman's perspective to government actions."

Congressional Republicans Fear Bush May Be Using "Triangulation" Strategy. Roll Call (5/18, Ben Pershing, Billings) reports with Republicans "desperate to pass big-ticket legislative items to reverse their slide in the polls, the House and Senate have increasingly moved in opposite directions as the White House has played each chamber off the other to achieve its own goals." On the supplemental spending bill, President Bush "has teamed up with House Republicans against the Senate's more expensive plan. And on immigration, Bush has sided more with the Senate — particularly some Senate Democrats — against the House's stricter position, raising fears among some GOP lawmakers and aides that 'triangulation' is back." To "some House Republicans, Bush's tactics on immigration are reminiscent of those used by President Bill Clinton to pass welfare reform in the mid-1990's. In that case, Clinton joined forces with Republicans to support a bill much of his own party detested." Bush has "used the tactic of moving to the center and teaming up with Democrats rarely since he came into office, and in 2003 Rove specifically told House GOP leaders at their retreat that the White House had sworn off triangulation."

Bush Vows Vigorous Campaign To Maintain GOP Control Of Congress. The New York Times (5/18, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports that President Bush "vowed Wednesday to lead an aggressive campaign this fall to maintain Republican control of Congress, saying there was a 'stark difference' between the two parties." Speaking at an RNC fundraiser, Bush "left little doubt that the White House would return to the same themes it used over the past six years, portraying Democrats as weak on terrorism and committed to higher taxes and government spending. … 'It's a stark choice,' Mr. Bush said. 'And I'm going to keep talking about it because we have a record to run on.' 'We are the party of the future, and our candidates will be running against the party of the past -- a party that offers no new ideas like the Republican Party, a party that can only offer opposition,' Mr. Bush said." He "also offered a strong defense of the war in Iraq," saying, "The enemy can't defeat us in Iraq -- and they can't defeat us anywhere else in the world. The only way we can be defeated is if we lose our nerve -- and the Republican Party will not lose its nerve." The president "also argued strongly to the crowd of 800 Republican donors in support of the changes in immigration law he proposed in a speech to the nation on Monday night," and touted the new Medicare prescription drug benefit program, saying, "We reformed Medicare."

Bush Helps Raise Record $17 Million For RNC. The AP (5/18, Loven) reports that President Bush "helped raise $17 million for the" RNC on Wednesday at its annual spring gala, "a welcome financial boost amid GOP gloom over the possible loss of majority control of Congress in November." Bush "repeatedly voiced optimism and signaled a no-holds-barred effort against Democrats, whom he argued would 'run up your taxes,' increase the deficit, enact shortsighted isolationist policies and fail to protect family values and national security." The $17 million raised for the RNC represented a record "for a nonpresidential election year since campaign finance law changes. The gala raised $15 million last year and $14 million in 2003. In 2004, when Bush was seeking re-election, the dinner brought in a record $38.5 million."

Conyers Says Impeachment Premature, Wants Bipartisan Probe Of Bush "Abuses." In a Washington Post op-ed titled "No Rush to Impeachment" (5/18, A23), Rep. John Conyers says, "As Republicans have become increasingly nervous about whether they will be able to maintain control of the House in the midterm elections, they have resorted to the straw-man strategy of identifying a parade of horrors to come if Democrats gain the majority. Among these is the assertion that I, as the new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, would immediately begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush." But Conyers adds, "I will not do that. I readily admit that I have been quite vigorous, if not relentless, in questioning the administration. The allegations I have raised are grave, serious, well known, and based on reliable media reports and the accounts of former administration officials. … So, rather than seeking impeachment, I have chosen to propose comprehensive oversight of these alleged abuses. The oversight I have suggested would be performed by a select committee made up equally of Democrats and Republicans and chosen by the House speaker and the minority leader. The committee's job would be to obtain answers -- finally. At the end of the process, if -- and only if -- the select committee, acting on a bipartisan basis, finds evidence of potentially impeachable offenses, it would forward that information to the Judiciary Committee. This threshold of bipartisanship is appropriate, I believe, when dealing with an issue of this magnitude."

Social Conservatives Want Stronger Bush Support For Gay Marriage Amendment. The Washington Times (5/18, Dinan, 90K) reports social conservatives "say President Bush must work harder before next month's scheduled Senate vote to pass the Federal Marriage Amendment that would define marriage as between a man and a woman, and some even say the White House is sending all the wrong signals on the issue." Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council said, "The only thing we're hearing now from the administration are either comments that are totally opposed to the amendment or those that appear to be opposed to the amendment. The president needs to speak to the issue just as passionately as he did in the campaign." The Times adds conservatives "said Mr. Bush could stand to push the Federal Marriage Amendment, especially given his faltering support among his base and the widespread support for defining marriage as the union of a man and a women."

Senate Democrats Propose Energy Independence Strategy. The New York Times (5/18, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports Senate Democrats "on Wednesday fueled the debate over rising gas prices by introducing an energy bill they said would do more to wean the country off foreign oil than the plan advanced three weeks ago by Republicans." The bill "would cut domestic oil consumption to 12 million barrels a day in 2020 from about 20 million barrels, its supporters say. It calls for expanding the use of alternative fuels for vehicles, in part by requiring more federally owned vehicles to use them, and by ensuring that more service stations sell them." Sen. Harry Reid said, "We need lower gas prices and energy independence. Republican leaders have proposed the same old solution: drill, drill, drill. But drill, drill, drill is not going to deliver the results we need."

In an interview with Bloomberg's After Hours (5/17, 5:12 PM), Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-ND), one of the bill's sponsors, said the US is "always going to use fossil fuels in this country—oil, natural gas and coal," but at the same time, the government should also "encourage all of the biofuels — ethanol, biodiesel and others — and in the long term, we also are very interested in the issue of hydrogen and fuel cells." Dorgan said the Democrat's plan aims "to make the government a leader in this area. … They, of course, purchase a lot of vehicles and use a lot of fuel, to be moving in the direction of flex-fuel vehicles and hybrid vehicles and use of biofuels." Asked about the release Monday of the Federal Trade Commission's report on gas price gouging, Dorgan said the FTC has "been deceased from the shoulders up for a long while," and he has "very little hope that the Federal Trade Commission will really dig into this."

Talent, Moran Seek To Add More Ethanol Fuel Stations. The AP (5/18, Hananel) reports that a group of Midwestern lawmakers Wednesday proposed legislation aimed at "getting more gas stations to carry ethanol-based fuel—known as E-85." Sens. Jim Talent (R-MO), John Thune (R-SD) and Barack Obama (D-IL) seek to "reimburse gas station owners for 30 percent of the cost—up to $30,000—of replacing regular gas tanks with tanks for alternative fuel, such as E-85 and biodiesel." Lawmakers touted the measure as a "way to reduce reliance on foreign oil and, at the same time, use cleaner fuels."

Coleman's Gasoline Bill Attracts GOP Critics. The Hill (5/18, Allen) reports Republican Sen. Norm Coleman "wants to raise taxes on oil companies to subsidize gas costs for low- and middle-income drivers, but the idea is attracting criticism from other GOP lawmakers." Coleman unveiled his proposal Wednesday, "but some lawmakers were quick to criticize the offering, saying either that it does too much or too little both on the tax and spending sides of the ledger." The bill would "raise $4.3 billion through a retroactive revaluation of oil companies' inventory," and "the money would then be disbursed to the states through a block-grant program that would defray prices at the pump for low- and middle-income drivers." Sen. John Sununu (R-NH) called Coleman's plan "a dangerous precedent and a foolish idea." Sununu said Congress "should not legislate accounting standards that are regulated by the Financial Accounting Standards Board."

Chevron CEO Says Oil, Gas Exploration Should Be Part Of Strategy. As part of an hour-long show dedicated to the energy debate, Chevron CEO, David O'Reilly, told CNN's Larry King Live (5/17, 9:23 PM) that now "is the time to debate energy supply. Certainly, we should be pursuing ethanol. And when we're importing in increasing amounts why not open up gas and oil exploration? We ought to be…getting the message out we need to value energy and conservative energy, be more prudent how we use it." Similarly, Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchinson told Larry King that the US has "to diversify our energy sources," increase our refinery capacity, and "drill more in our own country for our own resources…so we're not dependent on foreign sources for our energy needs." At the same time, she said Americans "need to conserve and have renewable energy."

Administration Plans For Extra Bonneville Power Revenue Draws Northwest Opposition. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Fialka, 2.11M) reports that last December, the Bush Administration "tucked a proposal into its 2007 budget to raise $1 billion over the next decade by squeezing more money out of one of the federal government's few cash cows: The Bonneville Power Administration." But the "plan is being fiercely resisted by Northwest lawmakers and other critics. Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Washington Democrat who has vowed to fight the proposal 'every step of the way,' has the backing of the entire Northwest congressional delegation -- a rare bipartisan show of unanimity on an energy issue this year." Bonneville, a "federal agency in Portland, Ore., sells about half the electricity used in the Northwest at relatively low cost." A surplus of snow means the utility, "which usually earns $3.2 billion a year, could make as much as $250 million extra this year by selling excess power mainly to California, where electricity rates are high." The Administration "wants to divert some of those profits to the federal Treasury by accelerating BPA's federal debt repayments. Critics of the plan say as long as Bonneville pays its debts, the utility should follow its traditional practice of using profits, or what it calls 'secondary revenue,' to reduce its wholesale electricity rates in the Northwest."

Taylor Says He'll Back Pelosi For Speaker If Necessary For Democratic Control. Roll Call (5/18, Kornacki) reports, "He hasn't voted with his party in an election for Speaker since 1999, but Rep. Gene Taylor, an iconoclastic Mississippi Democrat, is prepared to break with his recent tradition -- if it would ensure Democratic control of the House." Taylor, who "possesses the most conservative voting record of the House's 202 Democrats," said, "I'm not going to vote against my own self-interest. .. And I think I'd make a good subcommittee chairman." Taylor "figures to be the fourth most senior of the 28 Armed Services Committee Democrats when the 110th Congress opens next year. That puts him in line to chair the projection forces subcommittee if his party reclaims the majority."

Pelosi Angling To Remove Harman From Intelligence Committee. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Miller, Simon, 958K) reports Rep. Jane Harman, "who has gained national prominence as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, is fighting to hold on to the job amid indications she will be rotated off the panel next year." The dispute "pits the Venice lawmaker against House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco. Its outcome could determine what role Harman, who once ran for California governor and is one of the most quoted Democrats on intelligence matters, will play in the next Congress — if she is reelected." Pelosi has "informed colleagues that she intends to force Harman to step down, replacing her with Rep. Alcee L. Hastings of Florida, the second most senior Democrat on the intelligence panel." Democratic leadership aides "described the move as a routine rotation. But other congressional officials attribute the anticipated assignment change to internal party politics, including concern among Democrats that Harman is too moderate and inclined to accommodate the Republican agenda."

Tuesday's Primary Results Said To Signal Anti-Incumbency Mood Brewing. The Washington Post (5/18, A3, Balz, Cillizza, 744K) reports, "Pennsylvania voters dumped two Republican leaders in the state Senate and scared a GOP member of Congress, while Oregon voters sent a warning they are unhappy with" Democratic Gov. Ted Kulongoski, who "won his primary election but claimed just 54 percent of the vote." Taken together, "the results Tuesday were the latest signals of brewing unrest that could threaten incumbents of both parties in the November elections." The Post relates, "The defeats of Pennsylvania Senate President Pro Tempore Robert C. Jubelirer, Majority Leader David J. Brightbill and at least a dozen other state legislators there stunned the political establishment. Grass-roots protests brought primary challenges to 61 incumbent legislators, the most since 1980, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer." The Times adds, "More than a dozen legislators in Pennsylvania lost their jobs in a revolt over a pay raise for lawmakers that was enacted and later repealed but which provoked outrage among the electorate." Meanwhile, PA10 Rep. Don Sherwood's (R) "primary victory with 56 percent of the vote over a little-known and underfunded opponent signaled that his admission of an extramarital affair had damaged his standing and makes him vulnerable to a Democrat in November."

Defeat Of Two GOP Pennsylvania State Senate Leaders Enthuses, Concerns Conservatives. The New York Times (5/18, DeParle, 1.19M) reports, "A revolt among Pennsylvania conservatives gained national attention on Wednesday after challengers toppled at least 12 state lawmakers they deemed insufficiently committed to small government and fiscal restraint." The defeats of "the two State Senate leaders," Republicans Jubelirer and Brightbill, "drew cheers from conservatives nationally, many of whom voice similar criticisms of Republican incumbents in Washington and have threatened their own revolts. The Fiscal Restraint Coalition, a network of organizations calling for smaller government, sent out an e-mail message saying the election showed 'that the fiscal restraint message is a winner.'" However, "others, while celebrating the results, saw danger for the party. 'It shows a very worrisome, elevated level of anger and frustration on the part of Republicans,' said Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, which supports low taxes and small government. 'In a primary, they can vent that by voting for challengers. The problem is, in a general election they stay home. It's a very worrisome sign for Republicans in Washington.'"

WSJournal Says Pennsylvania Primary Results Should Send Message To National GOP. Citing Tuesday's primary results in Pennsylvania, an editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/18, A14, 2.11M) relates, "If Republican leaders in Washington still think their break-the-bank spending won't cause trouble with voters in November, they'd better pay attention to what just happened in the Quaker State's elections," in which "the two top senate leaders were thrown out and 13 incumbent House members bit the dust." The Journal notes, "Over the past three years the GOP majorities in the House and Senate have expanded the budget by twice the inflation rate and rubber-stamped an unpopular Rendell income tax hike. The final straw for voters…was that, in an act of remarkable arrogance, the Republicans violated the state constitution against a midterm pay raise by voting at 2 a.m. to hike their own salaries as much as 50%." The Journal adds, "We hope the tremors are felt by Republicans in Congress and in state capitols around the country. It seems this is a message GOP politicians have to relearn over and over: When they run as Reagan Republicans they win; when they run as big government Democrats they lose."

Specter Says Santorum's Reelection Is His Top Priority. The Hill (5/18, Kaplan) reports that during a tough 2004 primary race with Rep. Pat Toomey (R), Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter (R) "called on Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania's conservative junior senator, to help extend his political career." Santorum responded by reassuring "Republican voters that Specter would be a reliable vote for conservative issues." He "also raised money, appeared in television advertisements and direct-mail pieces and blocked Toomey from getting help from the state GOP." Now, with Santorum facing a difficult reelection challenge from Pennsylvania State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D), Specter "is stepping in to help his GOP colleague. 'His reelection is my No. 1 priority this year,' Specter told The Hill." Specter "has helped Santorum rake in campaign cash this cycle. He held two fundraisers last year in Washington, including one at his condominium, and another in Philadelphia. Specter said he has also written letters to potential donors. Perhaps most important, Specter has leveraged his perch as a subcommittee chairman on the Appropriations Committee to deliver federal dollars to Pennsylvania to help Santorum."

Political Analyst Critical Of Reasoning Behind Primary Challenge To Lieberman. In a piece in Roll Call (5/18), Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Political Report, discusses the primary challenge Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman (D) is facing from businessman Ned Lamont. Rothenberg relates that Lamont is "running against Lieberman -- and drawing attention from local Democrats, the 'netroots' and members of the national media -- primarily because of the Senator's relatively hawkish position on Iraq. … It doesn't seem to matter to those angry Democrats, or to Lamont, that Lieberman is widely respected for his thoughtfulness, integrity, civility and intellect. Or his overall voting record." Rothenberg notes, "Ironically, most of the House and Senate Democratic challengers that I have interviewed this cycle have decried their opponents' party-line voting and promise to be an 'independent' voice for their state or district. … Well, somebody better tell those candidates I'm interviewing that if they are 'independent,' they may well draw a primary opponent who, like Lamont, thinks that they aren't 'real Democrats' if they don't toe the party line." Rothenberg adds that "there certainly ought to be a place in our political system for someone like Lieberman. His defeat, unlikely as it may be, would be a sad, sad chapter in American politics."

Steele Criticizes Bush Education Policies. The Washington Times (5/18, Ward, 90K) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) "yesterday announced his U.S. Senate campaign's education platform by criticizing the federal government's implementation of the No Child Left Behind Act and President Bush's recommendation of cutting financial aid for low-income college students." Steele said that NCLB "has fallen short of expectations" and causes teachers to "teach to the test." Steele also said, "It was wrong for President Bush to call for eliminating" Perkins loans. Maryland students have "almost $19 million" in the low-interest loans for low-income college students. Steele further said that "the U.S. education system is 'fundamentally unequal,' describing it as 'cumbersome,' 'often myopic' and 'immoral.'"

Stock Markets Fall Dramatically On Inflation Fears. Inflation fears spooked stock traders, who sold on news the Consumer Price Index rose by a more-than-expected 0.6% in April, and that the core CPI, excluding volatile food and energy prices, also rose by 0.3%. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell by 214.28 or 1.88 percent to close at 11,205.61; on broader indexes, the S&P 500 fell 21.76 or 1.68 to 1,270.32 and the Nasdaq fell 33.33 or 1.5% to close at 2,195.80. The story was the lead on all three networks. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, lead story, 3:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "What a difference a week makes. Last Wednesday, the stock market was poised to break records. Investors were expecting an end to interest rate hikes and they were ready to spend. But in a matter of days, new signs of inflation have appeared and stocks have taken an enormous tumble." The CBS Evening News (5/17, lead story, 2:05, Mason, 7.66M) said the Dow "had its worst day in more than three years. It came as they were rolling out a cake on the floor of the stock exchange, but inflation spoiled the party. The New York Stock Exchange threw a birthday celebration, but the bulls were not on the guest list." NBC Nightly News (5/17, lead story, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight, the stock market dramatically has reversed course. Late today, it became clear the closing bell today would bring bad news and it did."

The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Petruno, 958K) says "the markets' sudden turmoil is shaping up to be the first major test faced by new Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke. … Many Fed officials have continued to declare in recent months that inflation was 'contained,' despite the surge in energy costs over the last year." But "the core inflation figure suggested that energy cost pressures could be bleeding into prices overall." That "could dash widespread hopes that the Fed was nearly done with its two-year-long credit-tightening campaign."

The Washington Times (5/18, Hill, 90K) reports "analysts said the surge in inflation ensures the Federal Reserve will remain wary and keep raising interest rates," while the New York Times (5/18, Uchitelle, 1.19M) says "the sudden unwinding in the market began on May 11, the day after Fed policy makers raised interest rates another quarter-point, to 5 percent, and left open the prospect that more interest rate increases 'might yet be needed to address inflation risks.'" USA Today (5/18, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) runs a similar report under the headline "Inflation Renews Pressure On Fed," and the Wall Street Journal (5/18, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports on the "worries…that the Federal Reserve could face a tough battle with inflation in coming months." The Washington Post (5/18, D1, Henderson, 744K), Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Trumbull, 61K), Knight Ridder (5/18, Hall) and Financial Times (5/18, Atkins, Hughes, Chisholm, Tsui), among other sources, also run stories on inflation fears. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, McKay, 2.11M) and USA Today (5/18, 2.31M), meanwhile, run separate stores on the stock numbers.

New College Graduates Seen As Entering Stellar Job Market. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 6, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported it is the "best hiring market for newly-minted college graduates in years. The economy has added 700,000 jobs just since January. And the unemployment rate has fallen to 4.7%, the lowest in five years. It is an extraordinary time to be graduating into the work force." ABC (Harris) added graduates are "waltzing out of academia and into what one career counselor is calling the best job market for college grads since the dotcom boom." Career counselors "at colleges and universities across the country say they saw real increases in the numbers of job recruiters on campus this year. Today, ABC News learned of increases of up to 30% at Georgetown, Rutgers, Rice, Stanford, Duke, and the University of Chicago."

North Carolina, Tennessee Given New Flexibility Under No Child Left Behind Act. The AP (5/18, Feller) reports U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings announced yesterday at a lunch with reporters that North Carolina and Tennessee have been chosen as "the only two states" that will be "allowed to change the way they measure student progress" under No Child Left Behind. The states will track individual students' math and reading tests scores rather than "comparing the scores of different groups of children from one year to the next." The change is regarded as "hugely important." 13 states applied to be part of the pilot program, but the two selected "have data systems to track individual students" and "committed to closing achievement gaps between whites and minorities."

The New York Times (5/18, Schemo, 1.19M) reports the program is a response to "years of hearing state officials appeal for more flexibility in judging schools." The change is "critical" and will allow the states "to count students as meeting the goals of the law if the students are judged to be on a trajectory toward proficiency in reading and math in three or four years." Spellings said that "the change did not amount to a weakening of the law's demands for student achievement."

The Washington Post (5/18, Romano, 744K) reports Spellings said that "those states were selected because they have a sophisticated data-collection system already in place for assessing students." Some "prefer the growth model to the current policy because they believe it gives them more flexibility to meet the standards." Spellings "dismissed the suggestion the new model would leave room for lax assessments."

Flood Insurance Becoming More Costly. The CBS Evening News (5/17, story 2, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Many homeowners are discovering this week that they will be paying more for flood insurance. That is, if they can get it at all." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "Flooding is the most common natural disaster in all 50 states. And despite last year's epic hurricane season, most homeowners in high-risk areas still don't have flood insurance. And almost no one is covered in low-risk areas. The problem, as the rain showed us this weekend in New England, low risk doesn't exist anymore." The "proof is in Pennsylvania. It's nowhere near the ocean, but residents filed more insurance claims for floods in 2004 than any state except Florida. Emergency officials are worried the Northeast is overdue for a major storm, so FEMA is urging homeowners everywhere to shell out more money for flood insurance."

NYTimes Says Greater Oversight Needed For Army Corps, Flood Insurance Reform. The New York Times (5/18, 1.19M) editorializes that as the situation in New England has provided a reminder "that the destructive force of floodwaters" is not a threat specific to the Gulf Coast, "The Army Corps of Engineers must learn, or be compelled, to place a higher priority on safety projects than on Congressional pork. At the same time, the government should use its federal flood insurance to encourage safe building, not to subsidize irresponsible development." The Times goes on to tout a measure sponsored by Sens. Russell Feingold and John McCain "that would bring more accountability to the corps' multibillion-dollar construction budget" and "require greater independent review of project designs to head off engineering failures like the ones that led to the breach in the New Orleans levees." Meanwhile, changes to the Federal flood insurance program should start with the exclusion of "vacation homes from…subsidized rates."

Race Likely To Be Key Factor In New Orleans Mayoral Contest. The New York Times (5/18, Nossiter, 1.19M) profiles New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin (D), who is facing Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D) in Saturday's election. The Times notes that Nagin's calm demeanor "has not dispelled a question haunting" his "tenure since Hurricane Katrina. Is he up to what has become one of the toughest mayoral jobs in the country? Lingering fleets of flooded-out cars parked under the elevated freeways, piles of garbage on the streets, and ever-shifting policies at City Hall: all these are constants in postflood New Orleans, and have only amplified the question." But "on Election Day…these details may not matter because so much of the vote will turn instead on the matter of race." Nagin "commands sympathetic allegiance from most of the city's remaining African-Americans, who supported him overwhelmingly in the primary. Many black voters say they do not blame the mayor for the limping recovery, accepting his assertion that Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, or FEMA, or President Bush, or Mr. Landrieu, are responsible."

Columnist Says Hillary Clinton Not Shoo-In For '08 Democratic Nomination. In a piece in the New York Times (5/18, 1.19M), columnist Bob Herbert writes that while New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) is widely viewed as the frontrunner for the '08 Democratic presidential nomination by people in both the Republican and Democratic parties, "I wouldn't crown the candidate yet. There are ominous stirrings in the tea leaves. A WNBC/Marist Poll released this week found that 60 percent of registered voters in" New York "believe that she will make a run for the White House. But 66 percent of the voters do not think she will be elected president. … Fifty-seven percent of the Democrats surveyed said it was 'not very likely' or 'not likely at all' that she would be elected." Also, Herbert notes, Democratic activists are unhappy with Clinton's co-sponsorship of "a bill that would criminalize the burning of the American flag," her "support for President Bush's war in Iraq," and the news that Rupert Murdoch will be holding a fundraiser for Clinton. Clinton also may be "handicapped by her gender," says Herbert, who concludes that "while the strategists may claim that this or that development is inevitable, the only thing we can really be sure of is that history is full of surprises."

Daschle To Test Presidential Waters In Key States Next Month. The AP (5/18, Jalonick) reports that ex-Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle "will gauge potential support for a 2008 presidential bid with stops in Iowa, New Hampshire and Michigan next month. 'It's just taking the next step to a more thoughtful consideration of a presidential campaign,' Daschle said in an interview with The Associated Press. Daschle said he will be traveling to states to 'sound out presidential themes, talk to voters and get a sense of what kind of a reception I might be getting.' He also will be campaigning for local candidates." Daschle "said he would decide by the end of this year, maybe sooner, if he will run for president."

McCain Attends Sinking Of USS Oriskany Off Florida Coast. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 8, 2:00, Cochran, 8.78M) reported the Navy yesterday sank the 1950's era aircraft carrier USS Oriskany off Florida to form an artificial barrier. ABC (Cochran) added, "It was hard for Navy veterans to take. To see the Oriskany, the ship known as the Big 'O,' sunk not by the enemy, but by the Navy itself, to create an artificial reef. Today, one of the best-known veterans was thinking about the Big 'O.'" Sen. John McCain: "It was a very gallant ship. And those of us that had the honor of serving on it loved it very much." Cochran: "Lieutenant Commander, now Senator John McCain, was on the ship during the Vietnam War." Sen. McCain: "That air wing had the highest losses of any air win in the war. So I lost a lot of friends. At the same time, some of the bravest men I've ever knew, I was privileged to fly with, who were obviously better pilots than I was. They didn't get shot down." Cochran: "McCain remembers his final takeoff from the carrier in 1967, the day he was shot down. The start of five years of captivity." Sen. McCain: "I remember that last takeoff, as if it happened five minutes ago. It was a very vivid memory because my entire life changed. Your entire life changes when you go from a free member of the Armed Forces to a captive of the enemy. It is a rather traumatic experience."

NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 11, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Among the Navy vets who served onboard, Senator John McCain, who today called her a brave ship and said he would someday like to dive down to visit his old quarters."

Clegg Invitation Withdrawn By EEOC. The Washington Times' (5/18, McCaslin) "Inside The Beltway" reports that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) chairwoman, Cari M. Dominguez, "decided to withdraw" an invitation to be part of a panel discussion extended to the president and general counsel of the Center for Equal Opportunity, Roger Clegg. Clegg later "learned from an unnamed source that career staff at the EEOC threatened 'mutiny' if he were to participate; not to mention that several 'establishment civil rights groups' had called to object to his testimony.

NRA To Target Local Officials Over Fears Of Gun Confiscation During Disasters. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 5, 2:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "ABC News has learned the National Rifle Association is about to launch a very aggressive and very controversial new campaign." ABC (Tapper) added, "ABC News has learned that the NRA's new campaign targets mayors and chiefs of police. At issue -- when can law enforcement confiscate weapons? The NRA is fired up, saying after Hurricane Katrina, law enforcement officers in Louisiana confiscated firearms from law-abiding citizens." In "this ad to appear in tomorrow's paper, the powerful gun lobby demands a pledge from every police chief and mayor in the country to never confiscate guns after emergencies." NRA executive vice president Wayne LaPierre: "We can't allow these local tyrannies to exist after disaster hits. Where they throw the Constitution out the window. And that's what the police chief in New Orleans did." Tapper: "The NRA will likely also demand that Congress make it a felony to order widespread confiscation of weapons. Louisiana law enforcement officials say, in the chaos after Katrina, some guns were confiscated in the interest of preserving order. But they argue the NRA overestimates how many guns were taken." The NRA is "confident the new message will resonate with its members and the public. Its opponents feel the NRA is overreaching and exploiting the Hurricane Katrina tragedy."

Promising AIDS Prevention Drug Is Long Delayed. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A1, Hamilton, Chase, 2.11M) reports on the political and economic delays to introducing a drug as an AIDS preventative. Currently, tenofovir is sold only as a drug for treatment rather than prevention. The Journal writes, "The failure of [tenofovir] to get more rapid attention as a preventive step partly reflects the contentious politics of AIDS. Since 2004 protests and other issues have forced researchers to scrap trials in four nations in Asia and Africa." Furthermore, "regulatory hurdles to approval are lower when the people taking a drug are already sick, and so are legal risks. The company has sought to avoid being dragged into culture wars over whether an AIDS-prevention pill might encourage unsafe sex."

Kenya Said To Have Lessons For Fighting AIDS. The New York Times (5/18, Dugger, 1.19M) reports that Kenya "has become a hunting ground of a different sort, attracting policy makers and researchers looking for keys to slowing the relentless spread of AIDS elsewhere on the continent." Researchers have found that, besides the loss of HIV-positive people to death, useful "behavioral change" has helped reduce the incidence of AIDS.

Former President Clinton To Focus On Activism, Service In New Book. The New York Times (5/18, Rich, 1.19M) reports that ex-President Bill Clinton "is following up his best-selling 2004 memoir, 'My Life,' with a book on citizen activism and service, to be published by Alfred A. Knopf sometime late next year or early in 2008. Mr. Clinton was paid more than $10 million for 'My Life,'" but "neither Knopf executives nor Robert Barnett, the lawyer who negotiated both of Mr. Clinton's deals, would comment yesterday on the financial terms of the new book. But one industry veteran with knowledge of the deal estimated that Knopf is paying an advance of around $5 million. The new book will cover the work of the Clinton Foundation, the nonprofit group the president set up to work on issues including AIDS, poverty, women's empowerment and religious and racial reconciliation, Mr. Barnett said."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, B4, 2.11M) notes that the new Clinton book will also touch on "the public service work of private citizens, some famous, some not. The book will likely contain chapters that detail how readers can personally become involved with specific causes. 'President Clinton remains a leader on the global stage, someone with an ability to inspire citizens all over the world,' said Paul Bogaards, a spokesman for Knopf."

Tony Blair's Son Ends Hill Internship. Roll Call's (5/18, Akers) "HoH" reports that Euan Blair's, eldest son of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, internship with Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) came to a mysteriously abrupt halt" after about two weeks. "Sources contend that it's because the 22-year-old lad was a wee bit on the spoiled side" and "seemed 'bored' and uninterested in doing the work of other interns."

Oklahoma Medicaid Reform Touted. In the Wall Street Journal (5/18, 2.11M), Sen. Tom Coburn and Prof. Regina Herzlinger write, "[The Oklahoma legislature] is working to finalize an agreement for Medicaid reform legislation creating personal health accounts (PHAs) for Medicaid enrollees … Are we on the verge of a consumer revolution in health care?" Rather than trim costs by reducing enrollment or benefits, Coburn and Herzlinger argue that Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Florida have chosen a "less draconian" Medicaid reform by "permitting Medicaid enrollees to choose health services and providers for themselves." The results are that "health costs remain low, government outlays stable and state finances healthy."

Will Says Term "Value Voter" Is Meaningless. In the Washington Post (5/18, 744K), George Will calls "value voter" an "aggressively annoying new phrase" currently monopolized by "social conservatives." He argues that the term applies to any voter, since liberals "vote their values" too. He concludes that Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain "will remain busy courting only values voters, since there is no other kind."

Scholar Says Title IX Should Not Be "Misused" Against Science Programs. In USA Today (5/18, 2.31M), American Enterprise Institute scholar Christina Hoff Sommers argues against the prospect of using Title IX to conduct "a review of math, physics and engineering programs at selected universities to root out supposed bias against women and girls." Since males are underrepresented in increasingly many fields, Sommers says, the perception of universities as hostile to women is clearly outdated. She warns, "If the Education Department and National Science Foundation were strictly to impose Title IX compliance standards on academic science, we could see men's participation in math, physics, technology and engineering capped at the level of female interest. That would wreak havoc in fields that drive the economy and where the USA already lags other countries."

Renewal Of US Commitment To High-Energy Physics Urged. In the New York Times (5/18, 1.19M), scientist Verlyn Klinkenborg endorses the conclusion of the National Research Council "that the United States should make a determined effort to build the International Linear Collider in this country as part of an international consortium." He warns, "The overwhelming risk, the panel concluded, is that without this project, the thrust of high-energy physics in this country will simply die away. This country desperately needs to recommit itself to basic research."

WPost Says Free Trade In Services Is Beneficial To US. The Washington Post (5/18, 744K) writes in an editorial, "So far, rather few service jobs have been 'offshored.'" But "if a teenager in Potomac can learn geometry from a tutor in Cochin, India, there's no reason why many other U.S. service jobs can't be done from abroad." Princeton University's Alan S. Blinder "estimates that as many as 42 million U.S. jobs are potentially at risk." That suggests "the future of trade politics looks grim." But "the case for trade in services is as sound as the case for trade in manufactures." And "Indian math tutors may boost U.S. high school math scores, fixing a much lamented weak spot in the nation's competitive outlook."

LATimes Criticizes Bill To Give DC Voting Member In US House. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, 958K) says in an editorial, "Since the adoption of the 23rd Amendment to the Constitution in 1961, the almost 600,000 residents of the District of Columbia have been allowed to vote for president, but otherwise they have no say in the federal government that is their hometown's biggest tourist attraction. Residents of the nation's capital would finally get a vote in Congress under the D.C. Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act proposed by Eleanor Holmes Norton, the Democrat who serves as the district's nonvoting 'delegate' in the House of Representatives, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican and chairman of the Government Reform Committee." The "selling point of the bill is that it deals only with representation in the House — historically the 'people's chamber' — and not with the more problematic question of whether the district should become a state with two votes in the Senate." The "real problem with the bill, however, is that it also bakes a little bread for Utah, which would get a fourth House member because it came the closest of any state to achieving an additional seat in the 2000 census. Not so coincidentally, that additional Utah representative — who would be elected statewide until after the 2010 census — probably would be a Republican, balancing the Democrat who surely would be elected to represent D.C. Partisan horse-trading is a venerable part of the legislative process, of course, but the Utah add-on is an unseemly gimmick in a bill designed to redress a long-standing grievance."

Judges Urged To "Get Serious" About Ethics. The New York Times (5/18, 1.19M) editorializes that installing an inspector general to investigate federal judges "would pose a threat to the independence of the judiciary." To forestall this possibility, it says, "is for judges to finally get serious about holding themselves to high ethical standards."

Net Neutrality Called Web's "Worst New Idea." The Wall Street Journal (5/18, 2.11M) editorializes that the Internet's progress was "accomplished with a light regulatory touch." It argues that the predominantly liberal backers of net neutrality would introduce a stifling "federal regulatory apparatus."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Defends Termination Of Probe Of Into Surveillance Program. In its report on today's hearings on CIA director nominee Gen. Michael Hayden, Washington Post (5/18, A5, Linzer, Babington) reports senators "will face an array of questions, loose ends and seeming contradictions about the administration's domestic surveillance techniques." Regarding National Security Agency surveillance, "an internal Justice Department investigation tried to determine whether lawyers who authorized the program may have acted improperly." But Attorney General Gonzales "suggested yesterday that secrecy concerns shut down the inquiry. The department's Office of Professional Responsibility notified lawmakers last week that it was forced to end its investigation because the office was denied security clearances to access information on the NSA program. Gonzales defended that decision yesterday and suggested that the probe was unnecessary because Justice issued a legal analysis supporting the effort." Gonzales said, "It's a very important program to the United States, and so certain decisions are made in terms of…how much information should be shared throughout the federal government. We don't want to be talking so much about the program that we compromise the effectiveness." Gonzales "declined to discuss who denied security clearances to OPR investigators or whether he was consulted on the issue."

Fox News (5/17, 3:35 p.m.) reported, "The White House says it is taking legal and vital steps to win the war on terror. … One of those steps is collecting millions of private phone conversations. Attorney General Gonzales came on this newscast and said he will not confirm or deny the existence of that program, but the average American would be safer because of it." Gonzales: "Let me just say that winning the war on terror requires winning the war on information. More information we have about what terrorists may be potentially doing is going to make America safer. And again, our intelligence activities are not focused on the communications of innocent Americans. We are focused on what al Qaeda is doing."

DOJ Motion To Dismiss EFF Suit Against AT&T Gets Coverage. The Boston Phoenix (5/18, Miliard) writes, "As we learn more and more about the scope and extent of the National Security Agency's (NSA) warrantless wiretapping program, we're also learning -- to the surprise of precisely no one -- how difficult it will be to challenge such domestic espionage in court." In January, Electronic Frontier Foundation "brought a class-action suit against AT&T, accusing the telecom giant of offering the NSA unfettered access to key facilities and databases, and of continuing to assist the government in the surveillance of phone and Internet communications among millions of Americans. Last Saturday, in the wee hours of the morning, lawyers from the Justice Department filed a motion in San Francisco federal court seeking to dismiss the suit, claiming that a trial would reveal state secrets and compromise national security."

NSA Director Briefs Intelligence Committees About Surveillance Program. NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander yesterday briefed the full House and Senate intelligence committees about the agency's domestic surveillance program. The CBS Evening News (5/17, story 4, 1:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Why is the Administration suddenly so forthcoming, at least with Congress?" CBS (Borger) added, "Well, of course the timing of this is absolutely no coincidence. Tomorrow on Capitol Hill, General Michael Hayden will come up for his confirmation hearings to head the CIA." Gen. Hayden was "was in charge of those controversial eavesdropping programs. So, what they really want to do is diffuse that controversy before he starts testifying on Capitol Hill. And one other thing, if you ask questions in a private classified briefing, you can't ask them again in an open hearing. So it'll probably ease the tension for him tomorrow." CNN's The Situation Room (5/17, Blitzer) also reported that the briefing "comes on the day before the confirmation hearings for the CIA Director nominee General Michael Hayden. He's expected to be grilled about his leading role in the NSA secret spying program." CNN's The Situation Room (5/17, Ensor) noted that Sen. Pat Roberts "said it's going well. But whether Senate Democrats and even some Republicans agree they're learning what they want to know, will it become clear at the hearings on the nomination of General Michael Hayden, former NSA director, to be director of the CIA? And based on past comments by senators, the probable answer to that is no."

The Washington Times (5/18, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Senators "would not disclose the particulars of the briefing," but Roberts "said the discussion allowed members to move past the 'very awkward' position of having just half the committee familiar with the program." Without "getting into specifics, Mr. Roberts said newspapers have printed misinformation about the top-secret program, which he said has prevented terrorist attacks." The New York Times (5/18, A1, Mazzetti, Stolberg, 1.19M) adds that White House press secretary Tony Snow "sought to play down the significance of the tactical shift. He said" Roberts "argued that the briefings were necessary 'to have a full and appropriate confirmation hearing for General Hayden, and we agreed with it.' But Republicans as well as Democrats said the White House had blundered by waiting until the last minute to share information on the spying program with members of the intelligence panel."

Administration Has Briefed Members Of Congress On NSA Program 30 Times Since 9/11. USA Today (5/18, Stone, 2.31M) reports the Bush Administration "briefed select members of Congress 30 times on the National Security Agency's surveillance programs since the Sept. 11 attacks, according to a declassified list released Wednesday." National Intelligence Director John Negroponte "released the document on the eve of today's confirmation hearings for Gen. Michael Hayden to lead the CIA." The "declassified list shows that half the secret briefings were held in the past five months, after The New York Times revealed the NSA was spying on international calls in the USA without court warrants. Until then, only party leaders and senior members of the intelligence committees attended briefings on the 'terrorist surveillance program' at the White House." The Washington Times (5/18, Bellantoni, 90K) notes the list "showed 31 of the 535 voting members of Congress have been 'briefed in' to the program." The AP (5/18, Shrader) adds that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "has pushed for the list's disclosure because the administration repeatedly has said that the appropriate lawmakers were briefed. Just who was included in those sessions was previously unknown."

NSA Scrapped Pilot Communications Analysis Program With Legal Safeguards In 1990s. The Baltimore Sun (5/18, Gorman, 296K) reports NSA "developed a pilot program in the late 1990s that would have enabled it to gather and analyze massive amounts of communications data without running afoul of privacy laws. But after the Sept. 11 attacks, it shelved the project -- not because it failed to work -- but because of bureaucratic infighting and a sudden White House expansion of the agency's surveillance powers, according to several intelligence officials." The agency "opted instead to adopt only one component of the program, which produced a far less capable and rigorous program. It remains the backbone of the NSA's warrantless surveillance efforts, tracking domestic and overseas communications from a vast databank of information, and monitoring selected calls."

NSA Director Briefs Intelligence Committees About Surveillance Program. NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith B. It remains the backbone of the NSA's warrantless surveillance efforts, tracking domestic and overseas communications from a vast databank of information, and monitoring selected calls."

Kondracke Says Phone Companies Should Be Praised. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/18) that ideological conflict and partisan politics are "threatening our national survival. … In Congress and in much of the media, the immediate reaction to news that the National Security Agency was intercepting international terrorist communications" was "to scream about a 'domestic spying' scandal, as though Richard Nixon were back in the White House and tapping the telephone of Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. … The phone companies that are cooperating with the government ought to be congratulated for participating in the war on terrorism — as they would have been in WWII. Instead, they are being hauled before the Senate Judiciary Committee as though they were criminals."

Roberts Says Intelligence Committees Are Doing Oversight Job. In a USA Today op-ed (5/18), Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts says, "It's the job of the Senate Intelligence Committee to oversee the intelligence community, ensuring that it's protecting Americans against a vicious enemy while respecting civil liberties. With respect to the National Security Agency's Terrorist Surveillance Program, the committee is doing its job. It's very secret, and oversight must be conducted in a closed environment."

USA Today Says Congress Failing In Oversight Responsibility. USA Today (5/18, 2.31M) says in an editorial, "Congress is supposed to oversee the executive branch's intelligence operations. From all indications, however, that oversight is badly broken. Information is dribbled out to a handful of lawmakers. Briefing turns into political cover. Consultation becomes more like inform-and-gag. Republicans act like cheerleaders for the White House. Democrats feign surprise and outrage when dubious programs become public." It is "not supposed to be this way," but the "system has become so weak, Congress might as well be deaf and blind."

LATimes Says Administration Only Briefing Lawmakers To Secure Hayden's Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, 958K) says in an editorial that in "suddenly agreeing to inform all members of the House and Senate intelligence committees about its warrantless domestic wiretapping activities, the Bush administration is doing the right thing for the wrong reason. The administration had resisted such briefings but changed course on the eve of today's first confirmation hearing before the Senate panel for Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the president's nominee to head the CIA." Easing Hayden's "confirmation, apparently, is more of an inducement to openness for the administration than are legitimate questions in Congress and among U.S. citizens about the NSA's surveillance of Americans."

Judge Rules Sealed Documents In Class Action Lawsuit Against AT&T Can Be Used. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Solomon, Searcey, 2.11M) reports a Federal judge in San Francisco "ruled that sealed documents filed by a privacy-rights group can be used in its class-action lawsuit against AT&T Inc." The documents "in the suit filed by the Electronic Frontier Foundation include statements from retired AT&T technician Mark Klein as well as other internal AT&T documents. It is unclear what information is contained in the documents, but Mr. Klein has issued a statement saying he saw the NSA set up a room in AT&T's San Francisco office that tapped into one of AT&T's major networks." USA Today (5/18, Iwata, 2.31M) adds that the foundation "praised the action Wednesday" by US District Judge Vaughn Walker. But "AT&T also scored an early win, when the judge rebuffed requests by the plaintiffs, joined by media companies including the Associated Press, Bloomberg News and USA TODAY, to unseal the documents for the public." The Washington Post (5/18, D5, Gullo, Rosenblatt, 744K) notes, "Even if the documents remain secret and the suit is thrown out, the case ties AT&T to a program that has troubled politicians and privacy groups, said Steven Aftergood, director of the Project on Government Secrecy."

Statements Appear To Indicate Government Wanted Long-Distance Records. The New York Times (5/18, Richtel, Belson, 1.19M) reports, "Government efforts to obtain data from the nation's largest phone companies for a national security database appear to have focused on long-distance carriers, not local ones, statements by company officials indicate." The statements have "come in the week since USA Today reported that the National Security Agency had collected local and long-distance phone records on tens of millions of Americans from Verizon, BellSouth and AT&T in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks." The responses "by the companies suggest that the agency, in an effort to find patterns that could identify terrorists, sought records from major long-distance providers like the former MCI (now part of Verizon), AT&T and Qwest, but did not ask for data on local calls."

Hayden To Face Tough Questions On NSA Tenure. Knight Ridder (5/18, Kuhnhenn) reports Gen. Michael Hayden "might seem to be a fine candidate for Senate confirmation as director of central intelligence," but he will "testify Thursday at his Senate confirmation hearing amid intense congressional interest in the National Security Agency's warrantless spying program, which began while Hayden headed it. And some lawmakers also chafe at the way President Bush is changing the guard at the CIA." The Senate is "expected to confirm Hayden eventually, but first he'll face tough questions about the NSA's secret eavesdropping and phone-record collection programs." USA Today (5/18, Brook, Stone, 2.31M) adds that DNI John Negroponte's "view of Hayden as an independent thinker is shared by a variety of former colleagues. They describe Hayden, deputy director of national intelligence, as a forceful, objective and fair-minded intelligence officer who's not cowed by political pressure." Still, Democratic senators "such as Carl Levin of Michigan, say they want to know whether he maintained that independence when the Bush administration wanted to create two NSA programs," the "surveillance without court warrants," and the "phone call database."

The Washington Post (5/18, A5, Linzer, Babington, 744K) reports senators "will face an array of questions, loose ends and seeming contradictions about the administration's domestic surveillance techniques. The first mystery they must unravel, however, is the nominee himself…who pitched the eavesdropping program after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and has become its most forceful defender." Hayden's "message and independence made him a favorite on Capitol Hill, where he was viewed as a champion of national security, privacy rights and press freedoms. But recent revelations about the nature of Hayden's highly classified world -- in the Air Force, at the NSA and most recently in the office of the director of national intelligence -- are forcing lawmakers to reexamine a man many of them have known for years." Their questions "are driven largely by what appear to be inconsistencies between the scale of the surveillance program and administration assertions about its limits." The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Solomon, Searcey, 2.11M) notes Democrats yesterday "outlined what they said will be the wide scope of questions they will put to Gen. Hayden during the hearings…which will include an extensive focus on the NSA. They also said they will question Gen. Hayden on his plans to keep the CIA's operations independent of the Pentagon's, as well as to reduce what they say has been the Bush administration's politicization of intelligence activities."

GOP Leaders Aim To Let Hayden Keep Rank, Independence. Roll Call (5/18, Stanton) reports GOP leaders and the Bush Administration "have agreed to take a series of unusual steps aimed at allowing Hayden to maintain his rank as a four-star general while suspending Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's authority over Hayden as a military officer while he serves as CIA director." Democrats and "some Republicans have expressed concerns that if Hayden remains on active military duty, technically he'll be under Rumsfeld's command. At the very least, they say, this would create an impression that the strict lines dividing the military and civilian branches of government since the nation's founding were being blurred."

Hayden To Emphasize CIA's Unique Humint Role To Help Rebuild Morale. The Washington Post (5/18, A4, Pincus, 744K) reports Gen. Michael Hayden "would work to rebuild morale at the agency in part by emphasizing its central role in managing the collection of human intelligence overseas, including by agencies other than his own, according to active and retired senior intelligence officials." Hayden has "told colleagues that he expects to act as the intelligence community's manager for human collection, coordinating and overseeing clandestine efforts abroad of the CIA, Defense Department and other government agencies. That would be similar to a role he played for intelligence collected by electronic intercepts when he ran the National Security Agency. In that role, and more recently as Negroponte's deputy, he has clashed with some senior defense officials." Hayden has also said "he would emphasize the CIA's importance as home to the largest number of 'all-source' analysts within the U.S. intelligence community. He plans to remind them, an associate said, that the 'CIA's primary customer remains the president' and they are still the 'major,' if not the only, contributor to the PDB, the President's Daily Brief, the highly classified intelligence report provided to Bush each morning."

Critics Say Hayden Had Mixed Record At NSA. The New York Times (5/18, Shane, 1.19M) reports that last year, "when Gen. Michael V. Hayden last sought Senate confirmation to a new job, protecting Americans' privacy from the global eavesdropping system he had overseen for six years at the National Security Agency was almost an afterthought on Capitol Hill." Hayden "assured senators then that the agency acted 'absolutely in compliance with all U.S. law and the Constitution,' and sailed to easy confirmation in April 2005 as principal deputy director of national intelligence." But now, the "question of whether General Hayden misled the committee last year is only one of several that could, in theory, cause trouble. Senators could press him on his role in costly, floundering modernization programs at the N.S.A., or his views on the C.I.A.'s secret prisons for terrorism suspects." But there "is also a pronounced minority view, expressed by some former senior N.S.A. officials and advisers: that General Hayden is better at public relations than at management, and that his record at the agency was far more mixed than his many admirers realize."

Hearings To Highlight Pentagon's Increased Intelligence Role. The Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Sappenfield, 61K) reports, "Experts widely agree that Hayden is independent and not likely to be bullied by the Department of Defense. But the issue points to how the war on terror is reshaping the US intelligence structure - and whether it is wise for the Pentagon to take more of the nation's spying needs upon itself."

Gates Says Hayden Should Be Confirmed. In a Washington Post op-ed (5/18, A23), Robert M. Gates, deputy director of central intelligence under President Ronald Reagan and director of central intelligence under President George H.W. Bush, says, "As the last career intelligence officer to serve as director of central intelligence, I believe Gen. Mike Hayden should be confirmed as director of the CIA. Hayden is an intelligence professional and widely regarded as one of the very best."

Novak Says Goss Ouster "Enraged" Hastert. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (5/18) writes that "according to Capitol Hill sources," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "engaged in a high decibel rant last week when he met with Vice President Dick Cheney. The speaker was enraged by the sacking of his friend and former colleague, Porter Goss." Hastert's "wrath reflects the feeling in the House Republican cloakroom that" Goss "is being made a scapegoat for the government's intelligence mess."

Kondracke Says Phone Companies Should Be Praised. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/18) that ideological conflict and partisan politics are "threatening our national survival. … In Congress and in much of the media, the immediate reaction to news that the National Security Agency was intercepting international terrorist communications" was "to scream about a 'domestic spying' scandal, as though Richard Nixon were back in the White House and tapping the telephone of Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. … The phone companies that are cooperating with the government ought to be congratulated for participating in the war on terrorism — as they would have been in WWII. More Commentary. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (5/18) editorializes, "When news broke about the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretaps of telephone calls, conducted in seeming contravention of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, President Bush insisted the nation's spymasters were targeting only persons with possible terrorist ties. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asserted that the agency was interested only in calls reaching beyond America's borders, and that while the administration might someday want to turn its attention to strictly domestic calls, it had not done so yet. Comes now word that major telephone companies have turned over to the NSA the domestic telephone records of… millions of innocent Americans."

Foggo Lawyer Says FBI Agents Seized Items Relating To Vacations With Wilkes. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Schmitt, 958K) reports, "Federal agents who raided the home and office of former top CIA official Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo were looking for evidence about trips that he and his family took with the family of San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes and whether Foggo paid his fair share," Foggo attorney William G. Hundley said yesterday. "In addition to other material collected in the raids, FBI agents seized family vacation photos, bank records and Cuban cigars from Foggo's home," Hundley said. He added that "the government appears to view the trips as a potential 'quid pro quo' for the water contract that Wilkes won while Foggo was heading a logistics unit for the CIA in Germany. Hundley said that Foggo 'never knowingly awarded a contract' to Wilkes, and that the cost of the trips was shared appropriately."

Undercover NYPD Officer Testifies Siraj Hoped For Terror Attacks On US. The New York Times (5/18, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "An undercover police officer testified yesterday that a Pakistani immigrant charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004 had said two years earlier that he hoped Al Qaeda operatives would blow up New York City and 'the American people.' Prosecutors called the officer as a witness…in an effort to undermine the case" of Shahawar Matin Siraj, "who testified in his own defense over the last two and a half days, and his lawyers have argued that he was entrapped by a paid police informant. … But yesterday, the officer…testified about a series of conversations he had with Mr. Siraj between 2002 and early 2003 in which he said the young man talked supportively about terrorism." The AP (5/18, Hays) adds that the officer, who used "his street name, Kamil Pasha, because he's still involved in active investigations," testified "Siraj declared in December 2002 that, 'The mission was not complete on 9/11 because it did not hit Wall Street.'" The New York Post (5/18, Haberman, 624K) notes Pasha testified Siraj "caught the terror bug well before he ever met the NYPD informant he claims urged him to carry out an attack." The New York Daily News (5/18, Marzulli, 729K) and New York Sun (5/18, Goldstein) also report on Pasha's testimony.

Man Charged With Making Bomb Threat Against Philippine Embassy. The AP (5/17, Ritter) reports, "A Nevada man was arrested and charged Wednesday with making a false bomb threat against the U.S. Embassy in the Philippines. Apolinar Agelio Tiu, 62, of Las Vegas, pleaded not guilty in federal court to one count of conveying false information relating to explosive materials and one count of making a false statement involving terrorism."

Poll Finds Americans More Concerned About Weather Than Terrorism. The Washington Times (5/18, Harper, 90K) reports that a Harris poll released Tuesday finds that 72% rank hurricanes as the most destructive disaster, followed by earthquakes and tornadoes, each cited by 53 percent, and terrorism, cited by 43 percent. The Times adds, "Floods (37 percent), wildfires (19 percent) and drought (16 percent) followed. But Americans don't seem particularly concerned by sloppy soil and blizzards. … When asked whether the federal government was prepared to deal with the nine types of disasters, almost half -- 47 percent -- said agencies would not be able to cope with any of them.

Only a quarter said the government could cope with a terrorist attack, while 20 percent said it could respond to a wildfire. The numbers go downhill from there: Only 2 percent said the government could deal with a mudslide. … The poll of 3,979 adults was conducted online April 12 to 20 and had a margin of error of two percentage points."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Panel Delivers "Tongue-Lashing" To DHS, But Boosts Agency's Budget. In an article appearing on at least 58 news websites, the AP (5/17, Taylor) reports that the House Appropriations Committee approved a $32.1 billion spending plan for the "troubled" Department of Homeland Security yesterday, but not before giving the agency "a tongue-lashing" over what Rep. Martin Sabo called a "bureaucratic mess." The bill was approved following the defeat of "Democratic proposals to boost funding for port and border security and grants to emergency first-responders" and "registers about $200 million less than Bush sought, since the Appropriations panel rejected for the second year in a row a Bush administration plan to raise airline ticket taxes." Though the budget provides a 6 percent increase over current levels, Rep. Hal Rogers said "excuses and delays due to reorganizations, personnel shortages, and poor financial management" will no longer be tolerated.

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that as part of the budget, "an estimated $4.18 billion is provided for government-port and cargo-security agencies, a $448 million increase over this year. And for the first time, the panel endorsed language authorizing Secretary Michael Chertoff to issue regulations establishing minimum security requirements for U.S. chemical facilities."

Administration Cites Reservations Over Changes To Foreign-Deal Rules. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A13, Hitt, 2.11M) reports speaking before a House Financial Services subcommittee yesterday, Clay Lowery, Treasury's assistant secretary of international affairs, said the Bush Administration is "ready to embrace modest proposals to improve communications with Congress over foreign-investment reviews and raise accountability within the administration." However, he expressed "concerns with several proposals written into the bill, including measures to require the secretaries of Treasury and Homeland Security to sign off on all deals," which he said "would lengthen and delay the process, presenting an unnecessary impediment to legitimate investment." Lowery also said that requiring extended 45-day investigations for all cases involving foreign government-owned entities "would require the administration to devote attention to cases that don't raise security concerns, and potentially could divert 'critical resources away from examination of acquisitions that do pose potential hazards.'"

Columnist Proposes Independent Homeland Security Board. Harlan Ullman, in his column for the Washington Times (5/18, 90K) writes, "The nation's security is…in need of a fix" and the "appropriate assignment of responsibility, authority and accountability among our security agencies" is the "fundamental issue." Ullman continues that Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte must integrate "the intelligence community into a more effective and cohesive operation." In an assessment of DHS, Ullman writes that having merged "an eclectic menage of dozens of disparate agencies and differing bureaucratic cultures totaling nearly 180,000 people, …perhaps it is amazing the department functions at all." Ullman states that due to "the principles of federalism and checks and balances," it is impossible for any "single person or organization" to be is "in charge of homeland security." He proposes the creation of "an independent Homeland Security Board to function along the lines of the Fed and the SEC" that would "regulate and set homeland security standards and policies, and, with DHS, to ensure compliance."

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld Acknowledges Divisions Over Interrogation Techniques. The AP (5/18, Baldor) reports Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld "said for the first time Wednesday that officials are at odds over whether a new Army manual should endorse different interrogation techniques for enemy insurgents than are allowed for regular prisoners of war." The debate "hinges on whether suspected terrorists or other insurgents can be treated more severely than captured members of an enemy army. There are concerns such a distinction could fly in the face of a law enacted last year, pressed by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that explicitly banned cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners by U.S. troops." Rumsfeld told the Senate Appropriations Committee's defense subcommittee, "There is a debate over the difference between a prisoner of war under the Geneva Convention and an unlawful combatant in a situation that is different from the situation envisioned by the Geneva Convention. And those issues are being wrestled with at the present time." Rumsfeld "did not say whether there would be one uniform standard. But he said the manual, which will guide troops on the handling of detainees, 'will comply with U.S. law.'"

US To Return 16 Detainees To Saudi Arabia. The New York Times (5/18, Weisman, 1.19M) reports that US officials and the Saudi foreign minister said yesterday that the US plans to turn over 16 Saudis suspected of terrorist activities and held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to Saudi Arabian authorities. The decision "came after months of wrangling over American demands for guarantees that they would be treated humanely once in Saudi custody, but it was not entirely clear what sort of agreement had been reached. … The Defense Department, which runs the prison camp at Guantánamo, declined to confirm that the Saudis would be repatriated soon."

Rumsfeld Can't "Promise" Substantial US Troop Pullouts This Year. The Washington Post (5/18, A3, Ricks, 744K) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he cannot guarantee that there will be substantial withdrawals of US troops from Iraq this year, and warned instead that leaving that country precipitously could create a sanctuary for al-Qaeda and other terrorists." Rumsfeld "told a Senate panel yesterday that he still hopes a big troop cut will occur this year but added, 'I can't promise it.'" Rumsfeld also "reprised some of his past optimism about the war in Iraq, which has grown increasingly unpopular with the public and dragged down President Bush's poll ratings in recent months. With the formation of a new government almost complete, Rumsfeld said, Iraq has 'entered a hopeful new phase in what has been a long and difficult journey.'"

Murtha Says Marines Killed Innocent Iraqi Civilians "In Cold Blood." Rep. John Murtha, the hawkish Democrat and retired Marine who broke character to call for the immediate withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, yesterday there is evidence US Marines killed civilians in the town of Haditha. The story was covered by NBC in a full segment. NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 3, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported Rep. Murtha is "accusing US Marines of killing innocent civilians in cold blood." NBC (Miklaszewski) added that last November, Iraqis "in the town of Haditha claimed US Marines deliberately killed at least 15 unarmed Iraqi civilians, including 7 women and three children." In "a remarkable statement in Washington, Democratic Congressman John Murtha claims it's true." Rep. John Murtha, Pennsylvania: "There was no firefight. There was no IED that killed these innocent people. Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood." Miklaszewski: "Military officials today tell NBC News the Marine Corps' own evidence appears to show Murtha is right."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Rogers, Phillips, 2.11M) reports "the Marines announced last month that three officers were relieved of command after the battalion involved in the Nov. 19 incident in Haditha ended its tour of Iraq and returned to the US." Those relieved "included both the commander of the rifle company involved in the events under investigation and his direct superior. Neither of the two was willing to comment Wednesday, according to a Marine Corps spokesman at their base, Camp Pendleton, in Southern California." The Washington Times (5/18, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Murtha Says Marines Killed Innocent Iraqis."

Iraqi Cabinet To Be Announced Saturday. The New York Times (5/18, Tavernise, Mizher, 1.19M) reports government statements that Iraqi's political leadership "struck tentative agreements on candidates for several cabinet ministries on Wednesday and said a complete list of names would be announced on Saturday. Leaders have been negotiating for weeks over what will be Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein, and, under Iraqi law, have until Monday to finish." Hussein Shahristani, a nuclear scientist jailed by Saddam for ten years for refusing to design a nuclear weapons program, appears to be the consensus candidate for oil minister, while Interior Minister appears to be a three-way race between Ahmad Chalabi, Mowaffak al-Rubaie and Nasir al-Feyadh. Hoshyar Zebari seems likely to remain Foreign Minister, while Thamir Sultan al-Tikriti and Muhammad Baraa al-Rubaie are said to be the leading candidates to lead the Defense Ministry.

USA Today/AP (5/18) says Saturday's announcements will be "the first sign that the country may finally be moving ahead with a national unity government after weeks of wrangling. There are hopes that sharing power successfully will help heal the sectarian rift underlying the relentless wave of violence that has swept Iraq since the US-led invasion three years ago and open the way for American troops to begin returning home." Knight Ridder (5/18, Fadel), among other sources, runs a similar story this morning.

US Military Developing Laser To Blind Drivers Temporarily. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Rainey, 958K) reported on its web site, "The U.S. military is deploying a laser device in Iraq that would temporarily blind drivers who fail to heed warnings at checkpoints, in an attempt to stem shootings of innocent Iraqis. The pilot project would equip thousands of M-4 rifles with the 10 1/2-inch-long weapon, which projects an intense beam of green light to 'dazzle the vision of oncoming drivers."

Baghdad Neighborhood Residents Scramble To Save Mosque. The Washington Post (5/18, A16, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports on an attack on a mosque in the Zayuna neighborhood of Baghdad. According to the Post as the attack began, the mosque's imam shouted, "God is great" over a loud speaker. "The imam's cry was the alarm recognized in all neighborhoods -- Sunni or Shiite -- across Baghdad. The mosque was under attack." The Post adds, "Across that pocket of Zayuna, a neighborhood originally created for army officers in the 1960s, the largely middle-class and heavily secular population of retired colonels, shop owners and professionals slammed their drinks down on coffee tables or lurched upright from their sleep. Though some could count the months, even years, since they last attended prayers, they knew that if the mosque was under attack, Zayuna might be under attack."

Canadian Lawmakers Vote To Extend Afghanistan Deployment. The New York Times (5/18, Krauss, 1.19M) reports that Canada's House of Commons last night voted t extend Canada's military deployment in Afghanistan by two years. The Times notes that the vote givers Prime Minister Stephen Harper "a foreign policy victory but only after an emotional and deeply partisan debate."

Pakistani Official Says Afghanistan's Problems Are Internal. Mansoor Suhail, Press Minister for the Pakistan Mission to the United Nations, writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (5/18, 2.11M) , "Afghanistan's security problems are internal, not external, and arise from religious extremism, warlordism, narcotics trade and local rivalries. The Taliban originated from and continue to be based in Afghanistan. Failure to address the country's complex security challenges cannot be externalized."

Afghan TV Channel Draws Fire For Reporting On Taliban. The Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Montero, 61K) reports that Afghanistan's top television channel, Tolo TV, "finds Afghanistan's hot buttons -- and pushes them. … Now, in an indication of how security is surpassing Westernization as a major preoccupation in this country, the station is angering the government with dogged reporting on the Taliban. As Tolo's team of reporters digs deeper into the insurgency, it faces increasing challenges from the central government, Tolo reporters and analysts say. Covering the Taliban, they explain, means delving into the reasons driving the rebels, and that often requires investigating allegations of corruption and abuse within the central government."

US House Of Representatives Urges Russia To Continue Klebnikov Investigation. Russia's RIA Novosti (5/17) reported on its English-language Web site, "The U.S. House of Representatives passed a resolution Tuesday urging Russia to continue an inquiry into the murder of American journalist Paul Klebnikov. … 'The House of Representatives ... urges the Government of Russia to take appropriate action to protect the independence and freedom of the Russian media and all visiting members of the media,' the House resolution said. … The House said 'a group of United States investigative journalists who doubt the Russian Government's claim has launched its own inquiry into the death of Mr. Klebnikov' and voiced concern about press freedom in Russia."

DOJ:

"Suspicious Package" Removed From DOJ Mailroom. The AP (5/17) reports, "Authorities removed a suspicious package from the Justice Department mailroom Wednesday in downtown Washington after initial testing indicated it was not dangerous. The building was not evacuated, but emergency workers in hazardous materials suits were sent to investigate."

Anonymous Letter Renews FBI Probe Of Seattle US Attorney's Murder. ABC's Good Morning America (5/17, Sullivan) reported that in the stalled investigation into the murder of Seattle US Attorney Thomas Wales four years ago, "a mysterious letter has surfaced, giving the FBI new clues, kick starting a real-life CSI investigation." ABC (Shipman) added, "The FBI is making this case a huge priority, offering an unprecedented $1 million reward to anybody who has information that might help solve it. … Law enforcement suspect the culprit is somebody with a grudge against Wales from his years as a tough prosecutor and ardent gun control activist." FBI Special Agent Gary Schoenlein: "We have to consider strongly the possibility that this homicide was connected to his professional duties." Shipman: "We went behind the scenes with FBI forensic experts as they performed rigorous tests to extract fingerprints and other residue which might yield clues. … But maybe the most telling clues can be found in the letter itself. … It reads like a dime store crime novel," and "the FBI says the murder plot detailed in the letter is highly uncharacteristic of a professional hit man." FBI Supervisory Special Agent Shawn Vanslyke: "This letter was a very sophomoric and unsophisticated attempt to throw us off course." Shipman: They do believe, though, the writer of the letter is connected to the crime and will lead them closer to an arrest." FBI Seattle SAC Laura Laughlen: "I would hope that the public would see this and be willing to come forward with any piece of information no Matter how small they might think it is." Additionally, ABC News (5/17) posts a version of the story on its Web site.

MSNBC's Abrams Report (5/17) also reported on the letter and the FBI investigation, interviewing Seattle Times reporter Steve Miletich and Northeastern University criminologist Jack Levin. Miletich said that the FBI is "treating the letter seriously, because it came out of nowhere four years plus into this investigation. And it would be highly unlikely that someone would sit down and write a letter like this unless that person had some interest in the case, a connection to the case or is the killer." Levin said of the letter,

"A serial killer might be motivated to write a letter like this, send it to the FBI in order to taunt them or become big shot celebrities. A professional hit man would not feel pains of conscience, certainly wouldn't confess years later…so I really don't see the motivation for the killer to write this letter." Host Dan Abrams said at the end of the interviews, "If you have got any information, please contact the FBI, toll free, 866-322-7009 -- I believe there's a $1 million reward."

Financial Times Puzzled By Luttig Resignation, But Sees Benefit For Boeing. The Financial Times (5/18) asks, "Just why did Judge Michael Luttig, once considered a top contender to join the Supreme Court, step down from the bench last week to become general counsel of Boeing? The day after his resignation was made public, The Wall Street Journal linked the departure to Luttig's fury over the government's handling of the case of José Padilla, the American who had been held without charge for two years as an enemy combatant. Two months after Luttig handed the administration a significant victory, the justice department reversed course, keeping the case from going before the Supreme Court." Luttig has denied that. The Times continues, "While Observer has no reason to doubt Luttig's sincerity, it is surely good news for Boeing that the former judge has clarified the mix-up with the justice department. After all, Boeing has just tentatively agreed to pay $615m to settle various government allegations. A new tiff between their general counsel and the Bush administration is the last thing the company needs."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jury Deliberations Begin In Trial Of Ex-Enron Chiefs. NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 8, 0:10, Williams) reported, "In Houston tonight, the jury has the case now in the Enron trial. The company's founder, Ken Lay, and former chief executive Jeff Skilling face multiple counts of fraud and conspiracy in the case." The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Mulligan) reports the jury got the case "after the government launched its final attempt to bolster its charges."

USA Today (5/18, 3B, Farrell) reports "all the talk from lawyers ended Wednesday morning at 10:35, when prosecutor Sean Berkowitz summed up the government's case against the defendants with a simple maneuver. Berkowitz pulled out a large poster, which he displayed on an easel. On the one side, in big, capital letters, was the word, 'TRUTH,' and on the other, 'LIES.' After all the intricately detailed testimony that came before the jury about 'dirty hedges,' 'goodwill write-downs,' 'monetizations' and 'dark fiber sales,' the black-and-white chart boiled it down to those two words." Berkowitz said, "These men lied. They withheld the truth. They put themselves ahead of the investors. I'm asking you to send them a message, that it's not all right. You can't buy justice. You have to earn it."

The New York Times (5/18, Romero, Barrionuevo) adds Berkowitz " reserved specific but quietly stated ire for what he called the 'ranting and yelling' of Chip Lewis, a lawyer for Mr. Lay, who in one of the testiest moments of the trial, shouted in the direction of prosecutors on Tuesday, 'Don't come to Houston, Tex., and lie to us!'" The Financial Times (5/18, McNulty) adds that Berkowitz "rejected the defence's warnings that any hesitation in reaching a decision over who told the truth meant jurors had to acquit the defendants. He urged jurors to go through the multitude of documents, and video and audio tapes."

The Washington Post (5/18, D1, Johnson) reports that following Berkowitz's two-hour presentation, "rhe eight-woman, four-man panel recessed to a private room at mid-morning to consider 28 charges against Skilling and six more against Lay." As jurors "filed out of the courtroom, Skilling took deep breaths and struggled to contain his emotions while his lawyer squeezed his neck. Lay looked solemn as he watched the jurors walk by."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C2, McWilliams) writes that the "start of jury deliberations won't give Mr. Lay much of a break. He begins a trial here Thursday in a separate case in which he is accused of bank fraud. The four charges will be heard without a jury before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, the same judge overseeing the conspiracy-and-fraud trial." Lay is "accused of borrowing $75 million from Bank of America, Compass Bank and Chase Bank and improperly using the money to carry or buy stocks on credit. The trial is expected to last several days."

HealthSouth Says It Has Reached Non-Prosecution Deal With DOJ. The Birmingham Business Journal (5/17) reports HealthSouth "announced Wednesday evening it has reached a non-prosecution agreement with the Department of Justice. Negotations were conducted through the U.S. Attorney's Office in Birmingham. The agreement 'removes the threat of an indictment of HealthSouth by the United States government for the accounting fraud committed against the company by members of its former management,' the company states in a news release."

Scrushy, HealthSouth Tangle Over Bylaws Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C2, Brooks) reports HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy and the "management team still cleaning up the mess left by the massive accounting fraud that occurred while he was in charge" sparred Wednesday over a Scrushy attempt to "put an unusual proposal before shareholders at today's annual meeting." His effort, "which concerned bylaw changes to give shareholders the power to set the size of the board and fill any vacant director slots, sparked a technical debate on whether it was one proposal or two." The SEC "was called in to referee," and Scrushy's efforts eventually failed. The Journal writes, "HealthSouth has spent $495 million on outside help to reconstruct its books as part of its recovery from the fraud the company has said inflated profits by almost $4 billion. So it is little surprise that HealthSouth's current bosses weren't interested in Mr. Scrushy's idea."

Leslie Scrushy Profiled. The Washington Post (5/18, D1, Guyon) runs a profile of Scrushy's wife Leslie Scrushy entitled "Richard Scrushy's Chief Believer." The piece runs more than 2,600 words.

Delaware Judge Could Boot Milberg Weiss From Class-Action Suit Role. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A2, Brickley, Plitch) reports Vice Chancellor Stephen Lamb of Delaware's "influential" Court of Chancery says he is not inclined to let Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP maintain the lead counsel slot in a shareholder class-action case regarding Russia's OAO Lukoil Holdings and its proposed takeover of a Kazakhstan company. Lamb cited the possibility that Milberg Weiss "could be indicted for allegedly paying kickbacks to lure lead plaintiffs." While the Lukoil lawsuit "isn't one of those believed to be at issue in the kickback probe," Lamb said the "chance that Milberg Weiss as well as some partners could face indictment argued against keeping it in charge of the case."

Federal Prosecutors Probing UnitedHealth Options Practices. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C1, Bandler, Forelle, Hechinger) reports Manhattan federal prosecutors have opened a criminal probe into the options-granting practices of UnitedHealth. The Minnesota-based health insurer "disclosed late yesterday that it had received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York. People familiar with the matter say that least one other company besides UnitedHealth has received a subpoena, and that the probe by the Southern District appears to be broad." UnitedHealth also said the IRS "had made a request for documents, suggesting that the agency may be looking at the tax implications of possibly misdated stock options." The AP (5/17) reports UnitedHealth "said it is cooperating fully" with the government requests.

Tenet Healthcare Settles Federal Case. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A13, Rundle) reports Tenet Healthcare "agreed to pay $21 million and divest its San Diego hospital in a federal settlement that ends a three-year criminal case. The deal potentially clears the way for Tenet to reach a wider resolution of its government investigations." The settlement between San Diego US Attorney Carol Lam and the company "averts a potential third criminal trial against Alvarado Hospital Medical Center, its former Chief Executive Officer Barry Weinbaum and a Tenet unit. The defendants were charged with paying kickbacks to doctors in exchange for patient referrals to the hospital." The Journal says the settlement "was a victory of sorts" for Lam "after her failure to obtain conviction of the defendants in two lengthy criminal trials."

The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Yi) quotes a Tenet spokesman saying, "We are optimistic that with the resolution of the Alvarado case, we can reach agreement soon with the federal government." The Los Angeles Business (5/18) reports Tenet "has long contended that it is innocent, and that overzealous prosecutors are taking advantage of vague federal regulations that are open to interpretation."

SEC Will Not Exempt Small Firms From Sarbanes-Oxley Audit Rules. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, C4, Reilly, Scannell) reports the SEC has declined to exempt small companies from rules contained in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act that "would require them to prove they have adequate safeguards in place to catch accounting mistakes and fraud." The SEC "defied the wishes of its own small-business advisory panel" in the decision; the panel had said the internal control rules "are too costly for small companies and offer little benefit to investors."

The New York Times (5/18, Norris) writes that the SEC did move to make the rules "easier and less expensive to apply. But despite political pressure, the commission said smaller companies would eventually have to comply with rules governing their internal controls." SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said, "The basic message is the SEC is saying that there is no ultimate postponement for smaller companies." The Washington Post (5/18, D2, Day) writes that the SEC "will not issue proposed final rules for public comment for several months because of their complexity. But Cox said the agency took the unusual step of outlining the general form the rules will take to alert companies that an exemption will not be in the picture."

Ex-Musicland CEO Testifies At Teo Insider Trading Trial. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (5/18, Voreacos) reports Musicland Stores investor Alfred Teo "was told in 2000 that a pending acquisition of the company was a secret," according to ex-Musicland CEO Jack Eugster in testimony at Teo's insider trading trial. Eugster said he told Teo at the time that the offer by Best Buy "was confidential. Prosecutors say Teo illegally tipped eight friends to buy Musicland stock and bought 25,000 shares himself before the transaction was announced on Dec. 7, 2000."

FBI, Miami Police Arrest Former Atlanta Hedge Fund Manager. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, McDonald, 2.11M) reports Kirk S. Wright, "a former Atlanta hedge-fund manager whose funds are missing more than $100 million in client assets," was "arrested in a Miami hotel yesterday by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Miami Beach police." Wright, "founder and Chief Executive of International Management Associates LLC, was apprehended at a Miami hotel after authorities received 'numerous leads from across the country,' said Stephen Emmett, a spokesman in the FBI's Atlanta office."

Professor Argues CEOs Are Not Overpaid. Tyler Cowen a professor of economics at George Mason University, writes in the New York Times (5/18), "Not surprisingly, many people think the American executives are overpaid." But in a new paper, "economists Xavier Gabaix of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Augustin Landier of the Stern School of Business at New York University offer a contrarian view. They suggest that the higher salaries for chief executives can largely be explained by increases in the value of the stock market. Viewed as a whole, these salaries are a result of competitive pressures rather than the exploitation of shareholders. … The growth in executive compensation reflects how much more is at stake in American companies. Is not the real question which policies and institutions have led to this explosion of value?"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Announces Creation Of Nationwide Anti-Web Predator Campaign. The Washington Times (5/18, Seper) reports Attorney General Gonzales "yesterday put into motion a nationwide program to protect children from online exploitation and abuse." Project Safe Childhood will "enhance the national response to a 'growing threat' to America's youths, and will allow U.S. attorneys nationwide to partner with a national network of 46 regional task forces to target online predators," Gonzales said. He also warned that, "at any given time, 50,000 predators are on the Internet 'prowling' for children." Gonzales continued, "Just this morning, I visited the FBI's Innocent Images Unit in Maryland, where I observed some of the aggressive behavior and graphic language used by these online pedophiles as they solicit our children. It is not an exaggeration to say that we are in the midst of an epidemic of sexual abuse and exploitation of our children."

Bloomberg TV (5/17, 4:54 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the start of a nationwide program called Project Safe Childhood designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse. The Attorney General toured a Justice Department computer center in Maryland where authorities track online predators. It's been estimated that at any given time there are some 50,000 predators on the Internet who are, in Gonzales's words, 'prowling' for children."

The AP (5/17) reports the project "calls for each U.S. attorney's office in the country to partner with state and local law enforcement to target internet predators. They will also try to find the children whose images have been found on the computers of those arrested. Project Safe Childhood will also provide training for investigators and prosecutors working cases involving computer crimes against children."

KATC-TV Lafayette, Louisiana (5/17, David) reports on its website that Gonzales "announced a new project to protect children from online abuse." The channel followed with a locally focused report on the impact of the program in the Lafayette area, where it "is already in place." US Attorney Donald Washington said, "The chances of you getting caught have gone up dramatically."

Sex Offender Charged In Child Porn Case. KTVB-TV Boise (5/18) reports on its website that convicted sex offender Jerry Banks has been charged producing and possessing child porn. Banks "is accused of producing and possessing child pornography. A federal grand jury charged 53-year-old Jerry Banks Sr. with producing a pornographic video of a baby boy, then taking those pictures and putting them on the Internet. The U.S. attorney's office says Banks is also charged with enticing a minor to engage in sexual activities."

Wisconsin Lawmakers Approve Satellite Monitoring Of Sex Offenders. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/18, Forster) reports that Wisconsin lawmakers voted Wednesday to require "lifetime global positioning system monitoring for certain child sex offenders." Gov. Jim Doyle said he intends to sign the measure. The "bill says that those who sexually assault a child under age 12, or use or threaten force or violence while molesting a child, would be subject to GPS tracking as a condition of parole, probation or extended supervision. The Legislative Fiscal Bureau estimated that such monitoring would cost $1.2 million for 285 offenders in the first year, and $2.3 million for 570 offenders in the second year."

DOJ Shuts Down Online Gambling Operation. The AP (5/17) reports that the Justice Department has dismantled a $2.5 billion offshore Internet gambling operation and charged two fugitives and their companies with laundering gambling proceeds from Internet casino games and sporting events. According to the AP, "A newly unsealed 12-count indictment filed in April 2005 accuses William Scott and Jessica Davis of illegally enticing gamblers to send funds from the United States to the Caribbean island of Antigua for wagers over the past eight years."

FBI Official Warns Of Offshoring's Intellectual Property Risks. In his Computerworld.com (5/17) blog, Robert L. Mitchell writes, "A few years back Boston-based FBI special agent Nenette Day busted a rogue programmer in India who had stolen the source code to SolidWorks Corp's CAD program. The sting, which took place in India, was a success in that SolidWorks was able to recover its software." But if "you think the perpetrator is rotting in jail, however, you'd be sadly mistaken." The case is "still dragging on in court, and it's unlikely that the defendant will ever serve jail time due to weak laws, Day says."

Pennsylvania Gambling Kingpin Returned To Prison. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (5/18, Cato) reports that John Francis "Duffy" Conley, the former kingpin of Western Pennsylvania's largest video poker empire, "was sent back to federal prison Wednesday for returning to his old ways -- running an illegal gambling operation and associating with known felons." Conley "was sentenced to four years by U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab for violating the conditions of his supervised release from previous gambling convictions. … State investigators say wiretaps from the investigation showed that Conley handled $3 million in bets in less than a month late last year and was employing people with felony convictions. He also hired people who have known ties to organized crime, investigators say."

House Ethics Committee Launches Ney, Jefferson, Cunningham Investigations. In a front-page story, The Washington Post (5/18, Weisman, 744K) reports, "After 16 months of inactivity and partisan infighting, the House ethics committee launched investigations last night into bribery allegations against Reps. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and William Jefferson (D-La.) and a separate inquiry into the widening scandal surrounding former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The probes "come after the Justice Department intensified corruption investigations of Ney and Jefferson, and after Cunningham pleaded guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes and was sent to prison." The Post adds that the committee "logjam was broken last month when Rep. Alan B. Mollohan…was forced to leave the panel amid accusations that he used his congressional position to funnel money to his own home-state foundations, possibly enriching himself." The New York Times (5/18, Shenon, 1.19M) notes that former Ney and Jefferson aides "have pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges" and "suggested in court papers that they were prepared to testify that their former bosses accepted bribes or other illegal gifts from government contractors or lobbyists. In a separate brief statement, the ethics committee…said that it would have investigated Representative Tom DeLay…but that the inquiry was short-circuited by Mr. DeLay's announcement that he would retire from the House." The AP (5/18, Margasak), Wall Street Journal (5/18, Mullins, 2.11M) and Roll Call (5/18, Bresnahan) also report on the ethics committee probes and the allegations against Ney and Jefferson.

Illinois Governor Accused Of Maintaining A Political "Favors List." WLS-TV Chicago (5/17, Goudie) reports on its website, "Allegations of lawbreaking have emerged in the race for governor of Illinois. Republican candidate Judy Barr Topinka says Democratic Governor Rod Blagoejvich doled out political favors to supporters. … According to Republican State Treasurer Judy Barr Topinka, Blagojevich was keeping an illegal 'favors list."' … The so-called favors list includes 291 names and the names of their references, from ward bosses to political moguls to influential associates, even Blagojevich's now estranged father-in-law, Chicago Alderman Richard Mell, who Wednesday acknowledged making hiring recommendations to his son-in-law governor."

Senate Panel's Report On Abramoff Expected In June. Roll Call (5/18, Kane) reports Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) "said Wednesday that their staffs were close to finishing a final report on the Indian Affairs Committee investigation into ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff's bilking of his tribal clients." The Senators "said that the final report has been delayed because of the sheer amount of work involved in compiling a single narrative that attempts to wrap up the committee's roughly two-year probe into what the Justice Department has concluded was an Abramoff-led operation that stole at least $40 million from a handful of tribes." It "now appears likely that the report won't be completed until sometime in June at the earliest, with the Senate adjourning for the week-long Memorial Day recess late next week."

Safavian Defense Dealt Setbacks As Trial Approaches. Roll Call (5/18, Bresnahan) reports that with his "trial set to begin next week, David Safavian, the former Bush administration official accused of lying about his relationship with ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff, was dealt a series of setbacks by a federal judge Wednesday." US District Judge Paul L. Friedman "has ruled against an effort by Safavian to keep jurors from hearing allegations that he gave Abramoff confidential government information about one of Abramoff's clients." Friedman also "ordered that jurors can be told the full cost of a controversial Scotland golf junket that Safavian took part in during August 2002."

Former Chicago Official Testifies City Employees Forced To Work Campaigns. The Chicago Tribune (5/18, Mihalopoulos, Higgins, 643K) reports, "In a meeting at his City Hall office, the patronage chief for Mayor Richard Daley directed Mary Jo Falcon and her group of Asian city workers to help the mayor's re-election effort, Falcon testified Wednesday" at he corruption trial of the former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and three codefendants. Falcon "vividly detailed how she recruited her underlings in the city's Sewers and Water Management Departments for hands-on, street-level campaigning." The Tribune notes, "She said when the FBI searched her city office last year, she did not think she had committed a crime, although she 'thought there was something wrong with what I was doing.' Falcon conceded that Sorich never told her to falsify records to get favored job candidates on the payroll." The AP (5/18, Robinson) notes, "Prosecutors wanted the jurors to hear about the campaigning to give substance to the charge that the employees were hired because of their willingness to do political work -- in direct violation of a court order. The idea was to show how a so-called patronage army, banned by the court and subsidized by taxpayers, was put on the street to propel candidates to victory. Falcon testified that some of the campaigning was arranged in her office on city time. But there was no testimony that city workers hit the streets to ring doorbells on taxpayers' time."

Under the headline "Altering, Lying On City Forms 'Was My Job'," The Chicago Sun-Times (5/18, Steve, Korecki) reports, "Sorich's attorney, Thomas Durkin, gently tried to put Falcon's credibility in question as he had her acknowledge that she cooperated with federal investigators because she didn't want to go to jail. Falcon is testifying under immunity."

Illinois Supreme Court Disbars Former City Clerk. The Chicago Sun-Times (5/18, Herman) reports, "The Illinois Supreme Court took away former Chicago City Clerk James Laski's law license -- a penalty for his role in a bribery scandal. Laski pleaded guilty in March to taking bribes and trying to block an investigation into his role in the city's Hired Truck Program. The case triggered a probe by the Attorney Registration and Disciplinary Commission, the disciplinary arm of the Supreme Court."

Ryan Juror Brought Outside Research Not Related To Evidence Into Deliberations. The Chicago Tribune (5/18, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "A juror in former Gov. George Ryan's trial acknowledged bringing outside legal research into deliberations out of what she described as frustration over another juror's refusal to discuss testimony, according to a newly unsealed transcript. Under oath during a private telephone interview by a federal judge, the juror, Denise Peterson, emphasized that her limited research on the Internet had nothing to do with evidence in the case and played no part in the ultimate guilty verdict. U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer called Peterson's move an 'innocent mistake,' according to the transcript." The Tribune adds, "Peterson said she did a Google search about deliberating and printed out two pages from the American Judicature Society, a legal group. She also found an article about 'Dealing with Difficult People,' according to the transcript." The AP (5/18, Robinson) adds, "Defense attorneys argued the documents might be prejudicial enough to warrant throwing out the guilty verdict and ordering a new trial," but Pallmeyer "spoke with Peterson and another juror by phone May 5 and then allowed the verdict to stand."

Prosecutors Say Race Not Factor In Tennessee Waltz Targets. The AP (5/18) reports, "Prosecutors deny targeting black lawmakers in the Tennessee Waltz investigation and say transcripts a defendant is using to make such a claim show racial bias by one of the accused, not government agents. Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon, in seeking to get his bribery and extortion indictment dismissed, argues he is a victim of selective prosecution because he is black. … But prosecutors say a recorded conversation with a government informant shows that a Dixon associate tried to direct bribes to black lawmakers while blocking white legislators from getting at what appeared to be a rich pool of payoff cash. 'All racial discussion is initiated not by the government informant but by the co-defendant and agent for the defendant Dixon,' prosecutors say in opposition to Dixon's petition for dismissal of charges."

Former RNC Official Gets 10 Months In Prison For Phone Jamming Scheme. The AP (5/18, Saunders) reports, "Former Republican National Committee official James Tobin was sentenced to 10 months in prison Wednesday for his role in an Election Day phone-jamming plot against New Hampshire Democrats. … He also was fined $10,000, followed by two years probation. Prosecutors had asked for a two-year prison sentence." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Steven McAuliffe said Wednesday he was impressed by character witnesses who testified on Tobin's behalf, but wished Tobin 'had a better sense of how serious this was.'"

Muhammad Jurors View Alleged "Sniper's Nest" Car. The Washington Post (5/18, B5, Rich, Londoño) reports jurors in the Montgomery County, Maryland, trial of sniper John Allen Muhammad "were escorted to a secure loading dock in the courthouse building yesterday to see the modified Chevrolet Caprice that was allegedly used as a sniper's nest during the attacks that claimed 10 lives in the Washington area in October 2002." The Washington Times (5/18, Manning) says the " beaten-up former police car" is the "key to the prosecution's case against Muhammad -- the Bushmaster rifle used in the killings was in the Caprice when he and Lee Boyd Malvo were arrested Oct. 24, 2002. A hole was bored in the trunk, for a rifle barrel. Investigators also found two-way radios, a scrap of paper with the sniper task force tip-line phone number and paper with a list of schools in the Baltimore area."

metamorphosis." He no longer is clad in "the orange jumpsuit he wore in Virginia when he was sentenced to death. Gone, too, is the hair that towered over him as he prepared for trial in Maryland." Looking "every bit the lawyer," he now "wears suits and ties. He carries with him a stack of legal papers, shuffling them purposefully at the defense table. He speaks the language of law, begging the 'court's indulgence' and asking that a 'continuous objection' be noted for the record." Because Muhammad is acting as his own attorney, the Maryland trial "has showcased Muhammad's personality and demeanor to a degree that his Virginia trial did not."

Virginia Police Officer Dies Of Gunshot Wounds From Attack. The Washington Times (5/18, Cella, Emerling) reports Fairfax County, Virginia, Master Police Officer Michael Garbarino died early Wednesday, a week after he was shot five times by Michael Kennedy in an "ambush" on a police station in Chantilly. Fairfax County Police Detective Vicky Armel was also killed in the incident, as was Kennedy.

The Washington Post (5/18, A22) editorializes that it "remains unclear" why Kennedy "was free to go on such a rampage. The details of his psychiatric history are still unknown to the public. Everything that is known, however, suggests that he was in desperate need of help he did not get. … Society pays in so many ways for failing to take the problem of mental illness seriously. One of those ways is tragic killings, like those of Detective Armel and Officer Garbarino."

Case Against Austin Cop Dismissed. KXAN-TV Austin, Texas (5/17) reports on its website, "An Austin police officer-involved shooting case has been thrown out of court, just before it was supposed to go to trial. Officer Scott Glasgow shot Jesse Owens Jr. five times back in 2003." Glasgow "shot 20-year-old Owens during a traffic stop where Glasgow pulled Owens over because he believed he was driving a stolen car. Glasgow then says Owens pulled him in through the window and drove off. That's when Glasgow shot and killed the young man. … The judge decided Glasgow was justified in using deadly force because there was no dispute Owens dragged him with his car."

Both Sides Of Duke Rape Case Playing To Public. The Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Jonsson) reports that legal analysts say both sides in the Duke sexual assault case "are going to new heights in playing to the public. … Going public is a strategy that has succeeded in the past, especially for defense teams who want the accuser's sexual history to be part of the trial, but who have been impeded in that aim by state shield laws intended to protect rape victims."

Federal Investigators Looking In To Connecticut Priest's Activities. The AP (5/17, Christoffersen) reports the Rev. Michael Jude Fay, a priest at St. John Roman Catholic Church in Darien, Connecticut, resigned "amid suspicions of financial wrongdoing and questions about his 'suitability for priestly ministry,'" according to Diocese of Bridgeport officials. The announcement "came the same day a private investigator gave results of his investigation to Darien police. Investigator Vito Colucci Jr. said he documented at least $200,000 in church money used to pay for Fay's lifestyle with a male companion." A spokesman for the US Attorney's office said federal authorities are also investigating.

Gargiulo Convicted Of Murder. The New York Times (5/18, Brick) reports that reputed organized crime figure Andrew Gargiulo was convicted of murder yesterday for killing his brother in law during a fight at a Brooklyn restaurant. Gargiulo "faces 25 years to life in prison when sentenced."

Washington-Area Bank Robber Gets Life Plus 95 Years. The Washington Post (5/18, B1, Weiss) reports that 29 year old Miquel Morrow yesterday was sentenced to life in prison plus 95 years on racketeering, conspiracy and other federal charges stemming from his in assaulting six banks, "terrifying employees and customers, spraying machine gun fire at a pursuing Prince George's County police officer." US District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly "was not about to be lenient, noting that Morrow 'terrorized' the community to satisfy his lust for money and a violent lifestyle."

Man Gets 14 Years For Swindling Scheme. Newsday (5/18, Kessler) reports that John Surgent, a convicted confidence man, was sentenced to 14 years in prison, "probably the stiffest sentence for a nonviolent, white-collar crime in the history of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District." Surgent "was sentenced Friday following conviction in July on charges of swindling hundreds of people around the country out of millions of dollars. A jury in Brooklyn deliberated for less than two hours before convicting Surgent of conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering. Many of the victims were elderly. Some lost all their retirement savings after being conned into investing in a shell company, Orex Mining, that Surgent set up in Plandome Manor, which he claimed could extract gold efficiently from very low-grade ore, officials said."

Witnesses In Lakin Case Make Courthouse Appearance. The Belleville (IL) News-Democrat (5/18) reports, "Lawyer Ed Unsell was at the federal courthouse Wednesday morning with witnesses who entered the federal grand jury room. Unsell filed and then dismissed a suit against prominent Madison County attorney L. Thomas Lakin, alleging Lakin sexually abuse minors and that the Lakin law firm tried to cover it up. Brad Lakin now runs the law practice and said the allegations are lies by people who tried to get $50 million from the firm."

Three Fugitives Arrested In Tallahassee. The Tallahassee Democrat (5/18) reports, "Two men wanted on warrants out of Maryland -- along with another man with a warrant out of Jacksonville -- were arrested in Tallahassee today the North Florida Violent Fugitives Task Force, Frank Chiumento, U.S. Marshals supervisor, said." Clinton Frie was wanted by Montgomery County, Maryland, "on warrants for home invasion, armed robbery, burglary, kidnapping, four counts of conspiracy, and possession of a firearm during a felony," while the county sought Deandre Goodrich "for two counts of violation of probation." The third man, Reginald Williams, "was wanted by the Jacksonville Sheriff's Office for forgery."

Former HBO Executive Jailed For Probation Violation. Brandweek.com (5/17, Edwards) reports, "Michele Rios-Nicosia Komack, the former director of print services at HBO who used her position to illegally obtain free designer shoes, foreign trips and parties at The Plaza Hotel, has been sentenced to seven months in federal prison for violating the terms of her probation. Komack pled guilty last year to charges of bid rigging, anti-trust conspiracy and tax evasion and was sentenced to five years' probation and 37 months of house arrest with electronic monitoring." Komack "violated the terms of that probation, which led to her being sentenced anew at U.S. Southern District Court in Manhattan on May 11."

Lawyers Will Seek To Postpone Depositions In UCI Medical Center Case. The Orange County (CA) Register (5/18) reports, "Attorneys for the former chief executive officer of UCI Medical Center will ask a judge today to halt next week's scheduled deposition by lawyers representing former patients suing over the now-shut liver transplant program. The hearing was sought by attorneys for Dr. Ralph Cygan, the first official placed on administrative leave when the program closed amid allegations of mismanagement. … More than 35 people have sued over the failure of the program. A subpoena for records was served on the UC Regents by the U.S. Justice Department in April, but federal authorities have declined to comment on what they are focusing on."

ITC Says Qualcomm Infringed On Broadcom Patents. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A9, Cheng) reports, "The U.S. International Trade Commission filed an opinion saying Qualcomm Inc. infringed on some of Broadcom Corp.'s patents -- a negative sign for Qualcomm in the two companies' ongoing legal dispute." The ITC report "said that two of Broadcom's patents were valid and that the protected technology was used illegally in several Qualcomm semiconductor sets, which go into cellphones. The two patents cover wireless telecommunications systems relating to power management and the maintenance of network integrity and optimal efficiency."

ACLU To Sue Black Jack, Missouri, Over Housing Law. USA Today (5/18, 3A, Moore) reports that the ACLU plans to sue the city of Black Jack, Missouri, which voted not to broaden a regulation on how many unrelated people can live together. … The federal Department of Housing and Urban Development is investigating whether Black Jack is violating fair housing law, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of family status or the number of children. The ACLU plans to sue the city whether or not HUD finds a violation."

Jurors In Bias Attack Case Asked About Use Of Racial Slur. The New York Times (5/18, Kilgannon) reports, "Potential jurors for the trial of a 19-year-old charged in a bias attack in Howard Beach last summer have been asked some unusual questions during jury selection: Do they listen to rap music? Are they familiar with hip-hop culture? Yesterday, the prosecution and defense asked them how they feel about a certain longstanding epithet denigrating black people. The epithet — or "the N-word," as the lawyer representing the defendant, Nicholas Minucci, repeatedly described it in court — may well be the crux of this high-profile case."

FBI Investigating Racist Graffiti At Kansas City Citgo Station. KSDK-TV Kansas City, MO (5/17) reports on its Web site, "Words of hate stunned motorists pulling into the Citgo station at exit 170" near Kansas City. "Investigators say sometime between 11:15 Tuesday night and 6 a.m. Wednesday morning, vandals with spray paint left their mark on walls, cars, and even gas pumps. One message believed to be directed to the owner and his clerk read, "Go back home to the Middle Eeast (sic)." … 'Pretty ignorant. We're not even from the Middle East, so just because we're kind of colored,' says Soofia Ahmed with a sigh. The clerk and her boss, store owner Andy Haroon, were both born in America, but they're of Pakistani heritage." KDKA notes FBI Kansas City SAC Thomas Noble said, "The reporting of hate crimes has increased significantly," and that the "are the number one priority for the civil rights unit." Noble added, "Primarily, the things we see are individuals doing dumb things that just express their own prejudice, bias against certain groups or people, which is unfortunate."

Wisconsin Elections Board Reverses Ruling On Voter IDs. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (5/18, Johnson) reports that the Wisconsin elections board has ruled that people who register to vote at the polls on election day won't be prohibited from casting ballots if they fail to produce their driver's licenses as long as they provide the last four digits of their Social Security number. The move "reverses the board's January decision that said people registering to vote on the day of an election must show their licenses or provide the license numbers. Under the rule, if people were issued a license but forgot to bring it, they would not have been allowed to vote until they showed it or provided the numbers."

Judge Approves Extension Of Microsoft Antitrust Settlement Through 2009. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, B2, Anderson) reports US District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly said she will let DOJ extend portions of Microsoft's 2002 antitrust settlement "for at least two years until the end of 2009." Kollar-Kotelly said, "It sounds like at least on paper this is the way to go." She agreed with antitrust regulators and Microsoft officials that the extension "is needed while Microsoft improves the technology information it must give to software companies seeking to make products compatible with Microsoft operating software." The New York Times (5/18) reports Kollar-Kotelly "urged" Microsoft "to do all it could to expedite the process." She said, "I want to make sure we have the resources to get things done. I want to make sure we are not shortchanged." The Los Angeles Times (5/18) and the technology news service ZDNet (5/18, Broache) also report on the approval of the extension.

DOJ Says IE7 Does Not Violate Microsoft's Antitrust Agreement. The NewsFactor Network (5/17, Haskins), an online technology-related news service, reports that the Justice Department has concluded that "Internet Explorer 7 defaulting to the MSN search engine does not violate the conditions of Microsoft's antitrust agreement with federal and state governments. Google brought the Internet Explorer 7 search feature to the attention of Justice Department regulators and the European Commission earlier this month. In the informal complaint, Google alleged that the default setting was biased and would give Microsoft an unfair advantage. Rejecting Microsoft's contention that users simply could change the setting, Google said its research showed that picking a new default engine would be difficult, requiring multiple steps."

McClatchy Considers Bids For Philadelphia Newspapers. The AP (5/17, Sutel) reports, "McClatchy Co. on Wednesday began considering bids from several parties for two newspapers in Philadelphia, the latest to be sold as part of McClatchy's acquisition of Knight Ridder Inc. The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News are among 12 Knight Ridder newspapers that McClatchy doesn't plan to keep. … The bidders for the two Philadelphia papers included Mortimer B. Zuckerman, owner of the New York Daily News; Black Press Group Ltd., a Victoria, Canada-based newspaper publisher; and Yucaipa Cos., an investment firm that is working with a newspaper union. The bids were due late Tuesday."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

American Indian Arguments For Hemp Farming Rejected By South Dakota Appeals Court. In Sioux Falls, a federal appeals court has turned down American Indian arguments for hemp farming. The AP (5/18) reports the court said, "An American Indian treaty and U.S. law do not allow industrial hemp to be grown on an Indian reservation. … Alex White Plume, vice president of the Oglala Sioux tribe, and members of his family planted hemp three times on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation from 2000 to 2002, but it was confiscated by federal agents. … The family's lawyer...argued that the family had a right to grow hemp without a permit because of an 1868 treaty that encouraged Indian farming." According to the AP, a prosecutor argued that the family could have asked the DEA for permission to grow the crop on the reservation in South Dakota.

Nevada Company Charged With Clean Water Act Violation. The AP (5/18) reports that a federal grand jury has indicted Nevada-based Greg Street Plating Inc., with violating the Clean Water Act by dumping contaminated wastewater into a municipal sewer system in 2003. The one-count indictment "charges that late on the night of April 12, 2003, or early on April 13, 2003, an unknown employee dumped highly acidic waste into the sewer system leading to the Truckee Meadows Sewage Treatment Facility, serving the Reno-Sparks metropolitan area."

FBI Says Texas Environmental Activist Not Terrorist. The Corpus Christi Caller-Times (5/17, Martinez) reported, "Corpus Christi port and refinery officials know environmental activist Suzie Canales by sight. They say they've become accustomed to her standing outside their facilities, snapping photos and catching air samples in buckets. That's why the visit to her apartment by the FBI came as such a surprise, she said. 'My work is well-documented,' she said. 'I'm no terrorist.' The FBI agreed, after checking out a report from Citgo Petroleum Corp. to the National Response Center of suspicious activity outside its refinery April 1." The Caller-Times adds, "Albert Holl, supervisory senior resident agent with the FBI Corpus Christi office, confirmed that agents interviewed Canales at her apartment two weeks ago about the report from Citgo. 'Most of the time, when we approach people, we try to make it clear that it's pretty routine now,' Holl said."

FDA Seeks Possession Of Eggs From Disease Cure Case. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/18, Templeton) reports, "The U.S. Food and Drug Administration and U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan are scrambling to get possession of eggs -- 24.75 tons of powdered ones -- that were the focus of an FDA case against claims the eggs cure disease. The FDA case against Dr. Marilyn Coleman, 60, of Richwood, Ohio, and Mitchell Kaminski, whose business address is Northfield, Ill., and their company, OvImmune Inc., led to convictions against both and the corporation on charges the egg powder was mislabeled as a treatment or cure for diseases, including AIDS and cancer, without FDA approval."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Florida Pipe Bomb Suspect Pleads Not Guilty. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/18, Gardiner) reports Sean Britnell of Broward County, Florida, who allegedly sold pipe bombs to an undercover ATF agent, "pleaded not guilty Wednesday in Fort Lauderdale federal court to charges of possessing a destructive device." Last month, a restaurant co-worker of Britnell's overheard him talking about making pipe bombs and notified ATF. An undercover agent "arranged to meet with Britnell on April 19 in the restaurant's parking lot. Saying that he wanted to scare someone who owed him money, the agent asked Britnell if he could buy some pipe bombs from him, according to court records. Britnell told the agent the bombs cost $75 each. The agent ordered 10 of them, the records said." One week later, the agent met Britnell in a strip mall, where Britnell "delivered the 18-inch pipes filled with gunpowder, authorities said. A green fuse stuck out of one end of the capped pipes, court records said. The next day, ATF agents obtained records from Home Depot showing that on April 25, Britnell bought 10 pipes, a drill and end caps. He was arrested May 3. Britnell has been ordered held on $300,000 bond."

Woman Angered By ATF Raid Of Home. WDTN-TV Dayton (5/17, D'Marko) reports on its website that ATF agents "raided a Dayton home and arrested a man for dealing firearms illegally. Now the woman who lives there said they got the wrong man, and she's upset about the damage they did during the raid." Latisha Haynes said she and her boyfriend James Lamar Gober "got a rude awakening" when the ATF entered their home "with guns drawn about six o'clock Wednesday morning." Gober was arrested on charges of dealing firearms without a license and distribution of crack cocaine. Haynes said the agents "broke the lock, emptied drawers and closets, even ripped open her couch cushions. But the most frightening part for her was the wake-up call." Haynes said, "They come in with guns pointed at me, and I'm naked in the bed, me and my dude."

FBI Searches For Hoffa's Remains On Michigan Farm. Following up on new leads, FBI agents yesterday searched a farm in Milford, Michigan, for the remains of Jimmy Hoffa. The story received heavy press coverage, particularly on TV news programs last night.

ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 4, 1:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "It's been more than 30 years since the former Teamsters Union boss disappeared under very suspicious circumstances." ABC (Thomas) added, "A source familiar with the investigation, tell us that recent leads appear to corroborate earlier tips that Hoffa may have been buried at a horse farm just outside of Detroit." Vargas: "Now, this is the latest in a long string of searches that have been thus far, fruitless." Thomas: "The FBI has been down this road many times before. In each case, failing to find Hoffa's remains. … This is the third time in the last three years that the FBI has been digging in the Detroit area." Vargas: "But clearly they think they there's enough merit to this tip to go forward and dig, in fact." Thomas: "Yes, I spoke to a senior FBI official a little while ago who said we have reached the threshold that we have to go out there and take a look."

USA Today (5/18, 3A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "FBI Special Agent Terry Booth said he hoped the dig would end up differently than several unsuccessful excavations from the past. 'We're hoping to put this to bed after 30 years,' Booth said. … 'This is one we felt we needed to follow up on,' FBI agent Dawn Clenney said of the tip that led them to Milford Township." In a very widely-distributed story, the AP (5/18, Martin) adds Clenney said that "investigators are looking for 'evidence of criminal activity that may have occurred under previous ownership' on the property," but "asked if they were looking for Hoffa's remains, she said, 'Could be,' but declined to comment further. A law enforcement source in Washington, D.C., said Wednesday's search was based on information developed several years ago and verified more recently. … Organized crime figures had used the area for meetings, but the location was never used again after Hoffa disappeared, the source said."

The Detroit News (5/18, Shepardson) reports Clenney said that the search "was based on one of numerous leads the FBI has received and declined to say if the search would continue into the night. The search could take several days. … Unlike previous excavations in recent years by local police, this is the first by the FBI and approved by federal prosecutors -- suggesting it might have more credibility than other efforts. But one senior federal official downplayed the search, saying the odds of finding Hoffa's body were '30 percent at best.'" The Detroit Free Press (5/18, Ashenfelter) notes Clenney's comments to the AP and adds, "Oakland County Prosecutor David Gorcyca said Bloomfield Township police, who the FBI called in for assistance, told him that the FBI had received a promising tip in the case." WDIV-TV reported Wednesday that "agents planned to return Thursday morning with heavy equipment to dig."

In last night's broadcasts, CNN's Situation Room, CNN's Paula Zahn Now, CNN's Anderson Cooper 360, MSNBC's Rita Cosby Live and Direct, MSNBC's Hardball with Chris Matthews, MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olbermann, FOX News' Fox Report with Shepard Smith and FOX News' On the Record with Greta Van Susteren also reported on the FBI search.

Colorado FBI Agent Indicted For Allegedly Falsifying Travel Expenses. The Denver Post (5/18, Caldwell) reports, "An FBI agent based in Colorado Springs was indicted today by a federal grand jury, accused of falsifying $6,832 in travel expenses." Douglas V. Brennan "was staying in a Denver hotel for nine weeks in 2003 as he testified in a federal trial, according to a news release from the U.S. Department of Justice. The DOJ paid for his lodging. But according to the indictment, Brennan also submitted bills and was reimbursed by the FBI for hotel costs. … 'He billed the FBI for lodging expenses knowing full well that they had not been incurred by him,' said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah." The AP (5/18) adds, "He has been placed on paid administrative leave, said FBI spokeswoman Monique Kelso. … Federal prosecutors in Utah were assigned the case to avoid a conflict of interest for prosecutors in Colorado. Court documents said Brennan had not been arrested and that prosecutors would not ask that he be jailed pending a trial." The Rocky Mountain News (5/18) notes, "A summons was issued for Brennan to appear in federal court on June 2 before Magistrate Judge Craig B. Shaffer."

Florida FBI Employee Arrested On Housing Subsidy Fraud Charges. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/17, Blum, 249K) reported, "Prosecutors say Raquel Bonifacio of Davie received valuable housing subsidies from the federal government for three years by lying about her income. That she may have gotten away with it until recently is particularly surprising given her place of employment -- the FBI." Bonifacio, an FBI administrative assistant who earned more than $40,000 a year, "was arrested Tuesday on charges she stole money from taxpayers by collecting almost $25,000 in Section 8 housing assistance that she was not entitled to receive." The Sun-Sentinel noted, "The FBI suspended Bonifacio without pay and revoked her top-secret security clearance as a result of the criminal charges, FBI spokeswoman Judith Orihuela said. Bonifacio has worked for the FBI for approximately three years."

Pennsylvania Felon Faces Gun Possession Charge. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (5/18) reports that Desmond Ham "has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Pittsburgh on a charge of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. … According to the indictment, Ham possessed a .357 Smith & Wesson handgun on or about May 13, 2005. A person convicted of a felony is prohibited by federal law from possessing a firearm. Ham has a prior felony conviction for aggravated assault."

Activists Call For Stricter Enforcement Against Gun Trafficking. The AP (5/17, Pfister) reports that New Jersey legislators, law enforcement officials and gun control advocates "renewed their call for stricter enforcement against illegal gun trafficking across state lines. Trenton Mayor Doug Palmer and activists from Ceasefire NJ and the Million Mom March said Wednesday that many violent crimes are committed with firearms purchased by 'straw purchasers.'"

FBI Arrests Alabama Sheriff's Deputy On Weapons Charge. WTVY-TV Dothan, AL (5/17) reports on its Web site, "The FBI arrested a member of the Houston County sheriff's department." Michael Shawn Campbell "is charged with selling a firearm to a convicted felon. Campbell, a member of the sheriff's narcotics unit, is also charged with possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute. He was arrested by FBI agents just before reporting to work Wednesday."

FBI Agent Testifies Gambino Capo Pressed DJ To Promote Mob-Owned Restaurant. The New York Daily News (5/18, Zambito, 729K) reports, "Reputed mobster Greg DePalma allegedly tried to pressure WKTU-FM (103.5 FM) morning show host Goumba Johnny and deejay Johnny Rocks into plugging a Harlem restaurant owned by another reputed wiseguy. 'He wanted to promote the restaurant because it was owned by [Louis] Filipelli,' FBI agent Joaquin Manuel Garcia testified yesterday during DePalma's racketeering trial in Manhattan Federal Court. … The 49-year-old radio host, whose real name is John Sialiano, served five months in prison in 2000 for cheating on his taxes while managing the Manhattan strip club Scores in the mid-1990s. DePalma and his son were snared in the same FBI probe." The New York Post (5/18, Cornell, 624K) adds, "But the agent said DePalma was only partly successful because Goumba Johnny refused to plug the restaurant. 'He was angry at Greg,' Garcia told defense attorney Martin Geduldig during cross-examination. 'I think Johnny Rocks did it.'"

FBI Seeks Interviews With GOP Convention Protesters In NYPD Civil Rights Probe. As The New York Times reported yesterday, he AP (5/18, Neumeister) reports in a widely-distributed story, "The FBI is investigating whether police violated the rights of protesters at the 2004 Republican National Convention, according to a letter sent by the bureau to the New York Civil Liberties Union. In the letter…the FBI asked the civil rights group for help, saying it believed the organization's lawyers had represented people arrested at the convention." The AP adds, "The NYCLU was prepared to provide the FBI with videos showing that officers of the New York Police Department failed to properly warn hundreds of protesters before they were arrested, said Chris Dunn, the group's legal director. FBI spokesman James Margolin on Wednesday said only that he did not deny the letter had been sent to the NYCLU."

Protesters' Lawyer Says FBI Should Investigate Former NYPD Attorney. The New York Sun (5/18, Hope) reports, "A former top lawyer for the New York Police Department, Stephen Hammerman, who was commended by Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly for his role in handling the protests at the 2004 Republican convention, may soon have the FBI knocking on his door" in the civil rights investigation. "A lawyer for several protesters, Gideon Oliver, said yesterday he would push to have the former deputy commissioner of legal affairs investigated for his role in the arrests, based on Mr. Hammerman's actions as documented in video evidence." The Sun adds, "Mr. Hammerman said yesterday that allegations that he acted inappropriately were 'nonsense.' A spokesman for the police department, Paul Browne, said in a statement that the NYPD is cooperating with the FBI investigation."

NYDaily News Criticizes NYCLU, Conyers For Pushing Probe On FBI. Under the headline "The FBI Has Better Things To Do," The New York Daily News (5/18, 729K) editorializes, "The very long list of duties assigned to the FBI's New York office starts with counterterrorism investigations and is fully subscribed after that by more traditional, pressing criminal matters like the mob, Internet fraud and political corruption. The city's G-men and G-women have their hands full." Now, "thanks to the New York Civil Liberties Union and Rep. John Conyers, a Michigan Democrat and inveterate police basher, the bureau's targets in the city have been expanded…to include one Officer Matthew Wohl, who is alleged to have sworn falsely in connection with the arrest of a convention protester or three." The Daily News adds that the FBI letter to the NYCLU "was in its own way comforting and funny. If you know of anybody whose rights may have been violated, give us a call, the FBI said. An agent will answer the phone, and that's all the effort this case deserves."

Plea Agreements End 10-Year FBI Probe Of Vegas Nightclub. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (5/17, Knapp) reports on its Web site, "A ten-year FBI investigation into the Crazy Horse Too adult nightclub is over. A deal was reached Wednesday between the club and federal prosecutors, and it will avoid a lengthy trial for 18 defendants." Nightclub owner Rick Rizzolo "agreed to get out of the adult business forever and could serve a maximum of 16 months in prison with half of that as house arrest." His lawyer "says he will ask for probation. For Rizzolo, the deciding factor might have been the government's promise that it would not indict his father, sister, and brother."

FBI, Coast Guard Say Missing Cruise Passenger Fell Overboard. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/18, Kay) reports Royal Caribbean passenger Daniel DiPiero of Canfield, Ohio, "fell overboard after a night of heavy drinking with friends, authorities said Wednesday as Coast Guard crews suspended their search for the man. … Investigators from the FBI and the Coast Guard interviewed DiPiero's companions, other travelers and crew members Wednesday aboard the ship, the company said. They found that DiPiero and his friends concealed liquor in mouthwash bottles and brought a bottle of rum in their luggage." WPLG-TV Miami (5/17) adds on its Web site, "The FBI and Coast Guard thoroughly reviewed the digital video recording captured by the ship's security systems, which recorded the young man alone on an outside portion of deck four…between 12:12 a.m. and 2:16 a.m. Monday. The FBI and Coast Guard indicated to family members that the young man went overboard at 2:16 a.m. Monday and that he was alone at the time."

FBI, Texas Police Searching For Bank Robber. KGBT-TV Harlingen, TX (5/17, Cavazos) reports on its Web site, "The FBI and Brownsville police are searching for the man involved in a bank robbery in Brownsville. Investigators are hoping someone can recognize the thief from this surveillance video taken at the bank. … The man reportedly stood in line to talk to a clerk, then gave her a note with directions to hand over the money. He then calmly walked out of the bank with $3500 in cash."

Philadelphia On Way To Record Number Of Bank Robberies. WPVI-TV Philadelphia (5/17) reports on its Web site, "The number of bank robberies is up 123% from last year. That's because numbers in 2005 were down. The FBI says if things don't change, we could see a new record and this is concerning to law enforcement. It is quick to carry out and difficult to prevent."

Man Among World's "Most Hunted" Drug Traffickers Arrested In Brazil. The arrest of accused drug trafficker Pablo Rayo Montano received wide media coverage, with news outlets making more than 200 references to his capture. For example, the AP (5/18, Goodman) reports, "One of the world's most hunted drug traffickers _ accused of shipping more than 70 tons of cocaine to the United States _ has been arrested in Brazil as part of an international crackdown. Colombian-born Pablo Rayo Montano, who had been on the run for a decade, was captured Tuesday in Sao Paulo as part of an operation coordinated by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and involving anti-drug police in eight other countries. … 'The Rayo-Montano organization had its own private, rogue navy to run a drug business that was nearly as sophisticated as a small nation,' said DEA administrator Karen P. Tandy in a press release." The AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of CBS News, the New York Times, Washington Post, USA Today, Forbes, San Diego Union Tribune, Houston Chronicle, San Jose Mercury News, the UK's Guardian, and the China Post.

The Washington Times/ UPI (5/17) reports, "An international team of drug investigators has seized 52 tons of cocaine and three islands off Panama in breaking up an alleged drug-trafficking ring. … U.S. federal indictments in the case were returned in Florida and Washington, charging members of the RAYO-Montano operation with money laundering and conspiracy and possession with intent to distribute cocaine."

According to AFP (5/17), "Thirty-two people were indicted in Miami, and three islands as well as yachts and art work were seized in a 10-nation operation against a Colombian drug trafficking ring. The Twin Oceans operation dismantled the cartel led by Colombian Pablo Rayo-Montano, considered one of the world's leading drug dealers. … The US Justice Department said another 70 million dollars worth of assets, including yachts, fishing trawlers, art galleries and other businesses would be seized."

The Washington Times (5/18, Seper) reports, "DEA spokesman Steven Robertson said the investigation revealed a far-reaching cocaine trafficking and money laundering organization based in Colombia. Mr. Robertson said arrests were made in Colombia, Brazil, Panama, Ecuador and Costa Rica. He said four gang suspects also were arrested in Miami and one was taken into custody in Indianapolis. In Los Angeles, he said, DEA agents tracked down one suspect to an apartment complex, where he was taken into custody after answering a knock on his door by a DEA agent posing as a pizza delivery man."

Operation Twin Oceans was a three-year multi-agency probe, according to the Miami Herald (5/17, Yanez, Weaver), which adds that the operation "snared Pablo Rayo-Montano, one of the U.S. government's most-wanted drug traffickers, along with 100 associates." The Herald reports that in a press release, Karen Tandy said, "As well-equipped and complex as this enterprise was, it was a matter of time before law enforcement caught on, and now Rayo-Montano's decadent, drug-funded lifestyle has caught up with him. … His real estate holdings went from three islands to one jail cell."

Knight Ridder (5/18) reports, "New York City-based DEA agents involved in 'Operation Twin Oceans' helped identify Rayo-Montano's associates, and an investigation was continuing to run down his city connections, a DEA spokeswoman said. Rayo-Montano used the small islands off Panama's Pacific coast as shipment points for his fleet of cargo vessels outfitted with underwater lines to tow submersibles packed with cocaine, DEA officials said." The Knight Ridder story was used by New York Daily News and Florida's Bradenton Herald.

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/17, Blum) reports, "Law enforcement officials said Rayo-Montano's cartel smuggled more than 15 tons of Colombian cocaine per month into the United States. The enterprise was involved in the production, transport, distribution, and sale of drugs, officials said. Thirty-two individuals associated with the drug ring face charges in South Florida." DEA agent Mark Trouville in Miami "said the effort was dubbed Operation Twin Oceans because the Rayo-Montano organization shipped drugs from both the west and north coasts of Colombia using a variety of vessels." The Sun-Sentinel story also was used by the Kansas City Star and Contra Costa Times.

On its Web site, CNN (5/17) reports, "The DEA said Rayo-Montano, who is in his late 40s, has been involved in drug trafficking for almost two decades. He is the 42nd person arrested on the U.S. list of alleged drug traffickers designated as 'consolidated priority organization targets.'"

According to the FOX News (5/17) Web site, the DEA "says 'Don Pablo' RAYO-Montano was the chief of a crime organization that used highly sophisticated technological methods to coordinate the movement of cocaine north and illegal drug proceeds south. The RAYO-Montano organization also has been associated with Colombian narco-terrorist groups such as the Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC), the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC) and the Norte del Valle Cartel."

Local TV Coverage. WSCV-TV, Telemundo Miami-Ft. Lauderdale (5/17, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Colombian drug lord Pablo Rayo Montano was captured in Sao Paulo, Brazil, with [another] 31 people [in a] DEA coordinated operation. Montano is accused of moving 70 tons of cocaine into the US."

WRGB-TV, Albany-Schenectady-Troy, New York (5/17, 5:30) reported, "The Drug Enforcement Administration says Operation Twin Oceans was a success, arresting 100 people, seizing 52 tons of cocaine and 70-million dollars in assets. The DEA along with officers from Brazil, Panama and Colombia brought down Pablo Rayo-Montano's drug trafficking organization. Which was responsible for smuggling more than 15 tons of cocaine per month into the US and Europe."

WCTV-TV, Tallahassee-Thomasville, Florida (5/17, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "One of the world's most hunted drug traffickers arrested in Brazil. Colombian-born Pablo Rayo Montano, on the run for a decade [was] captured yesterday in Sao Paulo as part of an operation coordinated by the US Drug Enforcement Administration."

Customs Agents In New York Make $1 Million Marijuana Seizure. The AP (5/17) reports from Lewiston, New York, that a truck driver "tried to smuggle nearly 340 pounds of hydroponic marijuana worth more than $1 million into the United States," according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection. "Amarjit Singh, 35, a citizen of India with resident status in Canada, applied for entry into the United States at the Lewiston Bridge Sunday, saying he was hauling a commercial shipment of bales of grow mix destined for Alabama."

Sixteen Indicted In Drug Ring Investigation Linked To Bloods Street Gang. The Sunbury (PA) Daily Item (5/18) reports, "Sixteen more people were indicted on federal drug charges Wednesday morning in the second day of a drug sweep targeting the Bloods, a New York City-based gang allegedly selling crack cocaine in Northumberland, Snyder and Union counties. Thirteen of those indicted were in custody Wednesday morning with officials searching for three more. All were connected to the Bloods with 14 of the 16 from the New York City area. Two were from Sunbury."

Texas Police Find MS-13 Members Among Group Of Illegals. KRG-TV Harlingen, TX (5/17) reported on its website, "Sheriff's investigators were looking for robbery suspects but stumbled across MS-13 gang members instead. Officers found 84 illegal immigrants in an apartment complex in Granjeno. Two of them were discovered to be members of the Mara Salvatruchas, the notoriously violent gang from El Salvador. Officers sent 83 of the illegals, including the MS-13 gang members, to the Border Patrol. They are being processed for deportation."

Reporting On Project Mas Dinero Continues. Canada's YorkRegion.com (5/17) writes, "Cops on both sides of the border helped put the sting on a multi-million dollar drug smuggling ring last week, accused of shipping dope by land and lake. Dubbed Project Masdinero…the joint forces initiative lead to more than 250 charges against 24 people, including 11 York Region residents from Richmond Hill, Markham and Vaughan. … The Canada Border Security Agency also played a role, and as the investigation progressed, assistance was provided by the Windsor OPP drug squad, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and Detroit law enforcement agencies."

$1.6 Million In Cocaine Seized In New Jersey Bust. NorthJersey.com (5/17) reports detectives descended on a house in West Paterson Tuesday, arrested two people and seized 180 pounds of cocaine worth about $1.6 million. "The arrests resulted from a six-month investigation by a team of 10 detectives assigned to the county's anti-drug task force. They were assisted by officers from Paterson and West Paterson and agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration."

Accused Gang Members Face Drug Conspiracy Charges In New Jersey. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/18) reports, "Rashad Smith and 19 other people who authorities say belong to a South Camden drug gang called the M.O.B. Boys were charged with drug conspiracy in a criminal complaint unsealed yesterday in federal court. … The M.O.B. Boys sold at least $20,000 worth of cocaine and crack each week in the 1200 block of Morton Street, where they sometimes operated 24 hours a day, authorities said."

The AP (5/17) reports, "A violent Camden cocaine-dealing operation was broken up Wednesday as authorities arrested 10 people in early-morning raids, officials said. In all, 20 alleged drug dealers, suppliers and bulk purchasers were charged in criminal complaints. Four were already in custody and six were fugitives, authorities said. Legal filings show the so-called 'M.O.B. Boys' organization killed a man…to protect its turf in March."

Cherry (NJ) Hill Courier-Post (5/18) writes, "Drug peddlers whose violent, sometimes deadly influence stretched from Camden to Atlantic City were in jail or on the run Wednesday at the conclusion of a three-year investigation," according to federal authorities.

DEA Assists In Rhode Island Cocaine Investigation. The Providence (RI) Journal (5/18) reports from Newport that police "say they arrested four major suppliers of crack cocaine and a slew of street-level dealers Tuesday, capping an eight-month investigation that focused on local public-housing projects. One of the prime suspects was subdued with a Taser stun gun when he tried to escape during the drug sweep, according to Lt. Michael Brennan. … Brennan said that the department requested the assistance of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration because of the amount of drugs being moved and because some of the suspects had extensive criminal records for dealing drugs."

DEA Agents Help Capture Carjacking Suspect In Florida. Florida Today (5/17) reports DEA agents "conducting surveillance in Orange County, Fla., [yesterday] spotted a carjacking in progress and helped police capture a suspect. Police said a 20-year-old man carjacked a vehicle near…the Florida Mall. … DEA agents helped police get a quick jump on the crime as it was happening."

Two Men Sentenced In Illinois In Cocaine, Gun-Possession Cases. The Benton (IL) Evening News (5/17) reports on the sentencing of two Mt. Vernon men in unrelated federal cases that involved the DEA. "Jason R. Myers, 26, was sentenced May 10 to 292 months of imprisonment after he had pleaded guilty to a three-count superseding indictment charging conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine and two counts of distribution of crack cocaine. … Deondery L. Chambers Jr., May 12 was sentenced to 188 months in prison after he had pleaded guilty to one count of being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm."

Sentence Expected In Meth Case Following Colorado Man's Guilty Plea. The Brighton (CO) Standard-Blade (5/17) reports, "A 26-year-old Brighton man is scheduled to be sentenced Thursday, May 18, in U.S. District Court for his role in a drug ring that led to federal charges against seven men following an eight-month, multijurisdiction investigation. Kenneth F. Fuqua, 26, of Brighton pleaded guilty March 9 to one count of conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine. … Fuqua was one of seven men charged with felony drug violations following an investigation that involved the Drug Enforcement Administration and Boulder County Drug Task Force."

IMMIGRATION:

Gonzales Comments On Grandparents' Immigration Get Attention. CNN (5/17, 10:48 a.m., Kagan) reported, "A startling admission by one of the President's most trusted insiders. Here now is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a candid exchange with CNN's Wolf Blitzer during 'The Situation Room.'" Gonzales: "Three of my grandparents were born in Mexico. They came to Texas. My parents, both my parents, were born in Texas. Extremely poor. My mother had--" Blitzer: "But when they came to Texas, were they legally documented, were they unlegally documented?" Gonzales: "You know, it's unclear. It's unclear. And I've looked at this issue, I've talked to my parents about it, and it's just not clear." Kagan: "Gonzales says that those humble beginnings gave him the route to the American Dream. His father had only a second grade education. Gonzales has gone on to become the government's top lawyer."

The Washington Post (5/18, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts) "Reliable Source" also runs the quote, and writes that "in the midst of the fierce congressional debate about immigration reform," Gonzales "says he's not sure whether his Mexican grandparents entered the country legally."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Tax Cut Extension Bill. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 2, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush was bullish on the economy today. He predicted a strong lift from the $70 billion tax cut package he signed into law. He said the cuts originally passed in 2003, have helped expand the economy and create jobs. The major provisions extend tax breaks on dividends and capital gains for two years. And protect 15 million taxpayers for the minimum tax for one more year."

NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 2, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported the President "said tax cuts have spurred economic growth in this country, but Democrats said today that cuts mainly help the very wealthy and have ballooned that Federal deficit number." The CBS Evening News (5/17, lead story, 2:05, Mason, 7.66M), in a story about stock market losses yesterday, showed Bush saying, "The American economy is powerful, productive, and prosperous and we're going to keep it this way."

In a story about the budget resolution debate in the House, the New York Times (5/18, Andrews, 1.19M) reports "the $70 billion bill that Mr. Bush signed would extend his 2003 tax cuts on stock dividends and capital gains for an extra two years, to 2010, and shield 15 million taxpayers for one more year from a big increase in the Alternative Minimum Tax."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/17, Quijano) reported, "The White House and Republicans believe that by highlighting this victory on tax cuts, that can help on a number of fronts, particularly at a time when there is such a deep divide within the GOP on the issue of immigration. … This is also coming at a time when the President has of course been trying to boost his approval ratings, which are now hovering in the low 30s and at a time when Republicans are trying to keep control of Congress. So now President Bush can put these tax cuts in his win column, and Republicans will be able to tout the cuts this election year." The AP (5/18, Riechmann) also says the GOP "sees the extensions as a chance to raise approval ratings for the president and the Republican-controlled Congress. Public opinion surveys put the ratings at their lowest points in the Bush presidency. … Voters will not feel the impact before the November election; for investors, it will be until the next president is about to take office, in 2009." Democrats "say the cuts favor the wealthy and even oil companies."

The Washington Times (5/18, Dinan, 90K) reports the National Republican Senatorial Committee "issued press releases accusing Democratic candidates in swing states of having voted for a tax increase." But Sen. Charles E. Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, "said the vote will 'stay with the president and stay with every Republican member who voted for this bill from now until November 6.'"

House Expected To Approve Budget Resolution Today. The Washington Times (5/18, Fagan, 90K) reports, "The House was expected to approve a $2.7 trillion budget blueprint early this morning, after Republican leaders promised the more liberal wing of their party some increase in health and education spending. 'We have the votes, and we expect to pass it late evening or early morning,' said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican." The Times adds, "Approval of the nonbinding blueprint for 2007 spending comes after weeks of negotiations between Republican leaders and their members."

The AP (5/18, Taylor) says "House Republican leaders seemed confident they would be able to pass" the measure. They "became more optimistic Wednesday afternoon after promising to insert into the bill nonbinding language endorsing a 5 percent increase over President Bush's $138 billion request for a popular measure funding the departments of Labor, Health and Human Services and Education."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Rogers, 2.11M), however, says that "as lawmakers worked late into last night, the outcome remained uncertain on final passage." But "having pulled back twice before, the leadership could no longer postpone action on what has been a signature responsibility for decades for whichever party rules the House." The Journal adds that "final changes, approved on a 226-193 vote last evening would create a new 'deficit neutral' $3.1 billion reserve fund dedicated to increase resources for health and education programs. Together with money already shifted from defense and foreign-aid accounts, the resolution pledges that at least $7.16 billion more will be added to what Mr. Bush allowed for the departments of Labor, Education and Health and Human Services."

The New York Times (5/18, Andrews, 1.19M) reports "the measure calls for increasing military spending by 7 percent, to nearly $558 billion in 2007, a figure that includes $50 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan." The package "would essentially freeze or cut spending on most domestic discretionary programs, including education, energy and national parks, and it calls for trimming $6.8 billion over five years from entitlement programs like Medicaid and farm subsidies." The plan "would raise the debt ceiling by $653 billion, to $9.6 trillion, and it assumes that the shortfall next year will be $348 billion, about what it is likely to be in 2006."

Boehner Warns Incumbents Could Lose Committee Assignments If They Oppose Resolution. The Hill (5/18, Bolton) reports, "House Majority Leader John Boehner issued a veiled threat to GOP incumbents yesterday that they could be stripped of plum committee assignments if they voted against his budget resolution. Three and a half months into his job, Boehner flexed his authority at a closed-door meeting, saying those lawmakers who do not face difficult races in November's midterm election have no reason to vote against the budget, according to people who attended the conference session."

Cost Of Retirement Programs To Balloon Soon. USA Today (5/18, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Taxpayers will soon get a surprise bill that could exceed $1 trillion for the cost of paying future medical benefits for state and local workers who retire. Retiree medical costs are the biggest long-term challenge that state and local governments face. By comparison, state and local pensions have an unfunded liability of about $500 billion." State and local governments "have set aside $2.5 trillion to help pay pension benefits for 19 million civil servants and 7 million retirees. But they have set aside almost nothing to pay for retiree medical benefits." USA Today adds, "New accounting rules require that governments, starting next year, put a price tag on the value of medical benefits promised to civil servants when they retire. New York City's liability, for example, approaches $50 billion. The city's total budget last year was $53 billion." The Federal government also "has a $2.3 trillion unfunded liability for medical and disability benefits promised to civil servants and military personnel who retire. The costs are not the nation's biggest financial problem. Medicare has a $33.4 trillion unfunded liability. Social Security has a $4.6 trillion shortfall."

White House Threatens Veto Over Agriculture Subsidies. The AP (5/18, Quaid) reports, "Giving money to farmers, traditionally a popular election-year idea, is growing less popular in this election year." The Senate "wants to spend nearly $4 billion to help farmers cope with high fuel prices and damage from severe weather. House leaders object to the aid, saying Congress spends money too freely. President Bush is threatening a veto." The White House "dislikes the farm aid because it raises the price of a spending bill for the Iraq war and hurricane recovery. Beyond that, the farm money would not give energy relief to every farmer, said Bush's agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns."

White House Considers Commerce's Gutierrez For Treasury. The White House Bulletin/US News (5/17) reports, "Unable so far to find any takers on Wall Street for the Treasury secretary's post, administration officials say that the White House is more open to considering Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez as John Snow's replacement. 'They can't find anyone for the job,' said one Bush associate of the drawn out search for a new Treasury secretary. 'They like Gutierrez,' he added." The Bulletin adds it has "been long expected that Snow would leave this spring or summer, serving out the normal three years in the post. Officials emphasized that Snow is not being pushed out. As the Administration has failed to find a Wall Street executive to take the post, it has looked inside its ranks for a replacement and is focusing on Gutierrez, said the insiders. The Cuban immigrant who ran Kellogg's has fast become a favorite in the West Wing because of his tireless salesmanship of the Administration's agenda, his strong congressional relations, and his ability to bring a businessman's perspective to government actions."

Congressional Republicans Fear Bush May Be Using "Triangulation" Strategy. Roll Call (5/18, Ben Pershing, Billings) reports with Republicans "desperate to pass big-ticket legislative items to reverse their slide in the polls, the House and Senate have increasingly moved in opposite directions as the White House has played each chamber off the other to achieve its own goals." On the supplemental spending bill, President Bush "has teamed up with House Republicans against the Senate's more expensive plan. And on immigration, Bush has sided more with the Senate — particularly some Senate Democrats — against the House's stricter position, raising fears among some GOP lawmakers and aides that 'triangulation' is back." To "some House Republicans, Bush's tactics on immigration are reminiscent of those used by President Bill Clinton to pass welfare reform in the mid-1990's. In that case, Clinton joined forces with Republicans to support a bill much of his own party detested." Bush has "used the tactic of moving to the center and teaming up with Democrats rarely since he came into office, and in 2003 Rove specifically told House GOP leaders at their retreat that the White House had sworn off triangulation."

Bush Vows Vigorous Campaign To Maintain GOP Control Of Congress. The New York Times (5/18, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports that President Bush "vowed Wednesday to lead an aggressive campaign this fall to maintain Republican control of Congress, saying there was a 'stark difference' between the two parties." Speaking at an RNC fundraiser, Bush "left little doubt that the White House would return to the same themes it used over the past six years, portraying Democrats as weak on terrorism and committed to higher taxes and government spending. … 'It's a stark choice,' Mr. Bush said. 'And I'm going to keep talking about it because we have a record to run on.' 'We are the party of the future, and our candidates will be running against the party of the past -- a party that offers no new ideas like the Republican Party, a party that can only offer opposition,' Mr. Bush said." He "also offered a strong defense of the war in Iraq," saying, "The enemy can't defeat us in Iraq -- and they can't defeat us anywhere else in the world. The only way we can be defeated is if we lose our nerve -- and the Republican Party will not lose its nerve." The president "also argued strongly to the crowd of 800 Republican donors in support of the changes in immigration law he proposed in a speech to the nation on Monday night," and touted the new Medicare prescription drug benefit program, saying, "We reformed Medicare."

Bush Helps Raise Record $17 Million For RNC. The AP (5/18, Loven) reports that President Bush "helped raise $17 million for the" RNC on Wednesday at its annual spring gala, "a welcome financial boost amid GOP gloom over the possible loss of majority control of Congress in November." Bush "repeatedly voiced optimism and signaled a no-holds-barred effort against Democrats, whom he argued would 'run up your taxes,' increase the deficit, enact shortsighted isolationist policies and fail to protect family values and national security." The $17 million raised for the RNC represented a record "for a nonpresidential election year since campaign finance law changes. The gala raised $15 million last year and $14 million in 2003. In 2004, when Bush was seeking re-election, the dinner brought in a record $38.5 million."

Conyers Says Impeachment Premature, Wants Bipartisan Probe Of Bush "Abuses." In a Washington Post op-ed titled "No Rush to Impeachment" (5/18, A23), Rep. John Conyers says, "As Republicans have become increasingly nervous about whether they will be able to maintain control of the House in the midterm elections, they have resorted to the straw-man strategy of identifying a parade of horrors to come if Democrats gain the majority.

Among these is the assertion that I, as the new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, would immediately begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush." But Conyers adds, "I will not do that. I readily admit that I have been quite vigorous, if not relentless, in questioning the administration. The allegations I have raised are grave, serious, well known, and based on reliable media reports and the accounts of former administration officials. … So, rather than seeking impeachment, I have chosen to propose comprehensive oversight of these alleged abuses. The oversight I have suggested would be performed by a select committee made up equally of Democrats and Republicans and chosen by the House speaker and the minority leader. The committee's job would be to obtain answers -- finally. At the end of the process, if -- and only if -- the select committee, acting on a bipartisan basis, finds evidence of potentially impeachable offenses, it would forward that information to the Judiciary Committee. This threshold of bipartisanship is appropriate, I believe, when dealing with an issue of this magnitude."

Social Conservatives Want Stronger Bush Support For Gay Marriage Amendment. The Washington Times (5/18, Dinan, 90K) reports social conservatives "say President Bush must work harder before next month's scheduled Senate vote to pass the Federal Marriage Amendment that would define marriage as between a man and a woman, and some even say the White House is sending all the wrong signals on the issue." Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council said, "The only thing we're hearing now from the administration are either comments that are totally opposed to the amendment or those that appear to be opposed to the amendment. The president needs to speak to the issue just as passionately as he did in the campaign." The Times adds conservatives "said Mr. Bush could stand to push the Federal Marriage Amendment, especially given his faltering support among his base and the widespread support for defining marriage as the union of a man and a women."

Senate Democrats Propose Energy Independence Strategy. The New York Times (5/18, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports Senate Democrats "on Wednesday fueled the debate over rising gas prices by introducing an energy bill they said would do more to wean the country off foreign oil than the plan advanced three weeks ago by Republicans." The bill "would cut domestic oil consumption to 12 million barrels a day in 2020 from about 20 million barrels, its supporters say. It calls for expanding the use of alternative fuels for vehicles, in part by requiring more federally owned vehicles to use them, and by ensuring that more service stations sell them." Sen. Harry Reid said, "We need lower gas prices and energy independence. Republican leaders have proposed the same old solution: drill, drill, drill. But drill, drill, drill is not going to deliver the results we need."

In an interview with Bloomberg's After Hours (5/17, 5:12 PM), Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-ND), one of the bill's sponsors, said the US is "always going to use fossil fuels in this country—oil, natural gas and coal," but at the same time, the government should also "encourage all of the biofuels — ethanol, biodiesel and others — and in the long term, we also are very interested in the issue of hydrogen and fuel cells." Dorgan said the Democrat's plan aims "to make the government a leader in this area. … They, of course, purchase a lot of vehicles and use a lot of fuel, to be moving in the direction of flex-fuel vehicles and hybrid vehicles and use of biofuels." Asked about the release Monday of the Federal Trade Commission's report on gas price gouging, Dorgan said the FTC has "been deceased from the shoulders up for a long while," and he has "very little hope that the Federal Trade Commission will really dig into this."

Talent, Moran Seek To Add More Ethanol Fuel Stations. The AP (5/18, Hananel) reports that a group of Midwestern lawmakers Wednesday proposed legislation aimed at "getting more gas stations to carry ethanol-based fuel—known as E-85." Sens. Jim Talent (R-MO), John Thune (R-SD) and Barack Obama (D-IL) seek to "reimburse gas station owners for 30 percent of the cost—up to $30,000—of replacing regular gas tanks with tanks for alternative fuel, such as E-85 and biodiesel." Lawmakers touted the measure as a "way to reduce reliance on foreign oil and, at the same time, use cleaner fuels."

Coleman's Gasoline Bill Attracts GOP Critics. The Hill (5/18, Allen) reports Republican Sen. Norm Coleman "wants to raise taxes on oil companies to subsidize gas costs for low- and middle-income drivers, but the idea is attracting criticism from other GOP lawmakers." Coleman unveiled his proposal Wednesday, "but some lawmakers were quick to criticize the offering, saying either that it does too much or too little both on the tax and spending sides of the ledger." The bill would "raise $4.3 billion through a retroactive revaluation of oil companies' inventory," and "the money would then be disbursed to the states through a block-grant program that would defray prices at the pump for low- and middle-income drivers." Sen. John Sununu (R-NH) called Coleman's plan "a dangerous precedent and a foolish idea." Sununu said Congress "should not legislate accounting standards that are regulated by the Financial Accounting Standards Board."

Chevron CEO Says Oil, Gas Exploration Should Be Part Of Strategy. As part of an hour-long show dedicated to the energy debate, Chevron CEO, David O'Reilly, told CNN's Larry King Live (5/17, 9:23 PM) that now "is the time to debate energy supply. Certainly, we should be pursuing ethanol. And when we're importing in increasing amounts why not open up gas and oil exploration? We ought to be…getting the message out we need to value energy and conservative energy, be more prudent how we use it." Similarly, Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchinson told Larry King that the US has "to diversify our energy sources," increase our refinery capacity, and "drill more in our own country for our own resources…so we're not dependent on foreign sources for our energy needs." At the same time, she said Americans "need to conserve and have renewable energy."

Administration Plans For Extra Bonneville Power Revenue Draws Northwest Opposition. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, Fialka, 2.11M) reports that last December, the Bush Administration "tucked a proposal into its 2007 budget to raise $1 billion over the next decade by squeezing more money out of one of the federal government's few cash cows: The Bonneville Power Administration." But the "plan is being fiercely resisted by Northwest lawmakers and other critics. Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Washington Democrat who has vowed to fight the proposal 'every step of the way,' has the backing of the entire Northwest congressional delegation -- a rare bipartisan show of unanimity on an energy issue this year." Bonneville, a "federal agency in Portland, Ore., sells about half the electricity used in the Northwest at relatively low cost." A surplus of snow means the utility, "which usually earns $3.2 billion a year, could make as much as $250 million extra this year by selling excess power mainly to California, where electricity rates are high." The Administration "wants to divert some of those profits to the federal Treasury by accelerating BPA's federal debt repayments. Critics of the plan say as long as Bonneville pays its debts, the utility should follow its traditional practice of using profits, or what it calls 'secondary revenue,' to reduce its wholesale electricity rates in the Northwest."

Taylor Says He'll Back Pelosi For Speaker If Necessary For Democratic Control. Roll Call (5/18, Kornacki) reports, "He hasn't voted with his party in an election for Speaker since 1999, but Rep. Gene Taylor, an iconoclastic Mississippi Democrat, is prepared to break with his recent tradition -- if it would ensure Democratic control of the House." Taylor, who "possesses the most conservative voting record of the House's 202 Democrats," said, "I'm not going to vote against my own self-interest. .. And I think I'd make a good subcommittee chairman." Taylor "figures to be the fourth most senior of the 28 Armed Services Committee Democrats when the 110th Congress opens next year. That puts him in line to chair the projection forces subcommittee if his party reclaims the majority."

Pelosi Angling To Remove Harman From Intelligence Committee. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Miller, Simon, 958K) reports Rep. Jane Harman, "who has gained national prominence as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, is fighting to hold on to the job amid indications she will be rotated off the panel next year." The dispute "pits the Venice lawmaker against House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco. Its outcome could determine what role Harman, who once ran for California governor and is one of the most quoted Democrats on intelligence matters, will play in the next Congress — if she is reelected." Pelosi has "informed colleagues that she intends to force Harman to step down, replacing her with Rep. Alcee L. Hastings of Florida, the second most senior Democrat on the intelligence panel." Democratic leadership aides "described the move as a routine rotation. But other congressional officials attribute the anticipated assignment change to internal party politics, including concern among Democrats that Harman is too moderate and inclined to accommodate the Republican agenda."

Tuesday's Primary Results Said To Signal Anti-Incumbency Mood Brewing. The Washington Post (5/18, A3, Balz, Cillizza, 744K) reports, "Pennsylvania voters dumped two Republican leaders in the state Senate and scared a GOP member of Congress, while Oregon voters sent a warning they are unhappy with" Democratic Gov. Ted Kulongoski, who "won his primary election but claimed just 54 percent of the vote." Taken together, "the results Tuesday were the latest signals of brewing unrest that could threaten incumbents of both parties in the November elections." The Post relates, "The defeats of Pennsylvania Senate President Pro Tempore Robert C. Jubelirer, Majority Leader David J. Brightbill and at least a dozen other state legislators there stunned the political establishment. Grass-roots protests brought primary challenges to 61 incumbent legislators, the most since 1980, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer." The Times adds, "More than a dozen legislators in Pennsylvania lost their jobs in a revolt over a pay raise for lawmakers that was enacted and later repealed but which provoked outrage among the electorate." Meanwhile, PA10 Rep. Don Sherwood's (R) "primary victory with 56 percent of the vote over a little-known and underfunded opponent signaled that his admission of an extramarital affair had damaged his standing and makes him vulnerable to a Democrat in November."

Defeat Of Two GOP Pennsylvania State Senate Leaders Enthuses, Concerns Conservatives. The New York Times (5/18, DeParle, 1.19M) reports, "A revolt among Pennsylvania conservatives gained national attention on Wednesday after challengers toppled at least 12 state lawmakers they deemed insufficiently committed to small government and fiscal restraint." The defeats of "the two State Senate leaders," Republicans Jubelirer and Brightbill, "drew cheers from conservatives nationally, many of whom voice similar criticisms of Republican incumbents in Washington and have threatened their own revolts. The Fiscal Restraint Coalition, a network of organizations calling for smaller government, sent out an e-mail message saying the election showed 'that the fiscal restraint message is a winner.'" However, "others, while celebrating the results, saw danger for the party. 'It shows a very worrisome, elevated level of anger and frustration on the part of Republicans,' said Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, which supports low taxes and small government. 'In a primary, they can vent that by voting for challengers. The problem is, in a general election they stay home. It's a very worrisome sign for Republicans in Washington.'"

WSJournal Says Pennsylvania Primary Results Should Send Message To National GOP. Citing Tuesday's primary results in Pennsylvania, an editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/18, A14, 2.11M) relates, "If Republican leaders in Washington still think their break-the-bank spending won't cause trouble with voters in November, they'd better pay attention to what just happened in the Quaker State's elections," in which "the two top senate leaders were thrown out and 13 incumbent House members bit the dust." The Journal notes, "Over the past three years the GOP majorities in the House and Senate have expanded the budget by twice the inflation rate and rubber-stamped an unpopular Rendell income tax hike. The final straw for voters…was that, in an act of remarkable arrogance, the Republicans violated the state constitution against a midterm pay raise by voting at 2 a.m. to hike their own salaries as much as 50%." The Journal adds, "We hope the tremors are felt by Republicans in Congress and in state capitols around the country. It seems this is a message GOP politicians have to relearn over and over: When they run as Reagan Republicans they win; when they run as big government Democrats they lose."

Specter Says Santorum's Reelection Is His Top Priority. The Hill (5/18, Kaplan) reports that during a tough 2004 primary race with Rep. Pat Toomey (R), Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter (R) "called on Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania's conservative junior senator, to help extend his political career." Santorum responded by reassuring "Republican voters that Specter would be a reliable vote for conservative issues." He "also raised money, appeared in television advertisements and direct-mail pieces and blocked Toomey from getting help from the state GOP." Now, with Santorum facing a difficult reelection challenge from Pennsylvania State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D), Specter "is stepping in to help his GOP colleague. 'His reelection is my No. 1 priority this year,' Specter told The Hill." Specter "has helped Santorum rake in campaign cash this cycle. He held two fundraisers last year in Washington, including one at his condominium, and another in Philadelphia. Specter said he has also written letters to potential donors. Perhaps most important, Specter has leveraged his perch as a subcommittee chairman on the Appropriations Committee to deliver federal dollars to Pennsylvania to help Santorum."

Political Analyst Critical Of Reasoning Behind Primary Challenge To Lieberman. In a piece in Roll Call (5/18), Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Political Report, discusses the primary challenge Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman (D) is facing from businessman Ned Lamont. Rothenberg relates that Lamont is "running against Lieberman -- and drawing attention from local Democrats, the 'netroots' and members of the national media -- primarily because of the Senator's relatively hawkish position on Iraq. … It doesn't seem to matter to those angry Democrats, or to Lamont, that Lieberman is widely respected for his thoughtfulness, integrity, civility and intellect. Or his overall voting record." Rothenberg notes, "Ironically, most of the House and Senate Democratic challengers that I have interviewed this cycle have decried their opponents' party-line voting and promise to be an 'independent' voice for their state or district. … Well, somebody better tell those candidates I'm interviewing that if they are 'independent,' they may well draw a primary opponent who, like Lamont, thinks that they aren't 'real Democrats' if they don't toe the party line." Rothenberg adds that "there certainly ought to be a place in our political system for someone like Lieberman. His defeat, unlikely as it may be, would be a sad, sad chapter in American politics."

Steele Criticizes Bush Education Policies. The Washington Times (5/18, Ward, 90K) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) "yesterday announced his U.S. Senate campaign's education platform by criticizing the federal government's implementation of the No Child Left Behind Act and President Bush's recommendation of cutting financial aid for low-income college students." Steele said that NCLB "has fallen short of expectations" and causes teachers to "teach to the test." Steele also said, "It was wrong for President Bush to call for eliminating" Perkins loans. Maryland students have "almost $19 million" in the low-interest loans for low-income college students. Steele further said that "the U.S. education system is 'fundamentally unequal,' describing it as 'cumbersome,' 'often myopic' and 'immoral.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Fall Dramatically On Inflation Fears. Inflation fears spooked stock traders, who sold on news the Consumer Price Index rose by a more-than-expected 0.6% in April, and that the core CPI, excluding volatile food and energy prices, also rose by 0.3%. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell by 214.28 or 1.88 percent to close at 11,205.61; on broader indexes, the S&P 500 fell 21.76 or 1.68 to 1,270.32 and the Nasdaq fell 33.33 or 1.5% to close at 2,195.80. The story was the lead on all three networks. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, lead story, 3:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "What a difference a week makes. Last Wednesday, the stock market was poised to break records. Investors were expecting an end to interest rate hikes and they were ready to spend. But in a matter of days, new signs of inflation have appeared and stocks have taken an enormous tumble." The CBS Evening News (5/17, lead story, 2:05, Mason, 7.66M) said the Dow "had its worst day in more than three years. It came as they were rolling out a cake on the floor of the stock exchange, but inflation spoiled the party. The New York Stock Exchange threw a birthday celebration, but the bulls were not on the guest list." NBC Nightly News (5/17, lead story, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight, the stock market dramatically has reversed course. Late today, it became clear the closing bell today would bring bad news and it did."

The Los Angeles Times (5/18, Petruno, 958K) says "the markets' sudden turmoil is shaping up to be the first major test faced by new Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke. … Many Fed officials have continued to declare in recent months that inflation was 'contained,' despite the surge in energy costs over the last year." But "the core inflation figure suggested that energy cost pressures could be bleeding into prices overall." That "could dash widespread hopes that the Fed was nearly done with its two-year-long credit-tightening campaign."

The Washington Times (5/18, Hill, 90K) reports "analysts said the surge in inflation ensures the Federal Reserve will remain wary and keep raising interest rates," while the New York Times (5/18, Uchitelle, 1.19M) says "the sudden unwinding in the market began on May 11, the day after Fed policy makers raised interest rates another quarter-point, to 5 percent, and left open the prospect that more interest rate increases 'might yet be needed to address inflation risks.'" USA Today (5/18, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) runs a similar report under the headline "Inflation Renews Pressure On Fed," and the Wall Street Journal (5/18, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports on the "worries…that the Federal Reserve could face a tough battle with inflation in coming months." The Washington Post (5/18, D1, Henderson, 744K), Christian Science Monitor (5/18, Trumbull, 61K), Knight Ridder (5/18, Hall) and Financial Times (5/18, Atkins, Hughes, Chisholm, Tsui), among other sources, also run stories on inflation fears. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, McKay, 2.11M) and USA Today (5/18, 2.31M), meanwhile, run separate stores on the stock numbers.

New College Graduates Seen As Entering Stellar Job Market. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 6, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported it is the "best hiring market for newly-minted college graduates in years. The economy has added 700,000 jobs just since January. And the unemployment rate has fallen to 4.7%, the lowest in five years. It is an extraordinary time to be graduating into the work force." ABC (Harris) added graduates are "waltzing out of academia and into what one career counselor is calling the best job market for college grads since the dotcom boom." Career counselors "at colleges and universities across the country say they saw real increases in the numbers of job recruiters on campus this year. Today, ABC News learned of increases of up to 30% at Georgetown, Rutgers, Rice, Stanford, Duke, and the University of Chicago."

North Carolina, Tennessee Given New Flexibility Under No Child Left Behind Act. The AP (5/18, Feller) reports U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings announced yesterday at a lunch with reporters that North Carolina and Tennessee have been chosen as "the only two states" that will be "allowed to change the way they measure student progress" under No Child Left Behind. The states will track individual students' math and reading tests scores rather than "comparing the scores of different groups of children from one year to the next." The change is regarded as "hugely important." 13 states applied to be part of the pilot program, but the two selected "have data systems to track individual students" and "committed to closing achievement gaps between whites and minorities."

The New York Times (5/18, Schemo, 1.19M) reports the program is a response to "years of hearing state officials appeal for more flexibility in judging schools." The change is "critical" and will allow the states "to count students as meeting the goals of the law if the students are judged to be on a trajectory toward proficiency in reading and math in three or four years." Spellings said that "the change did not amount to a weakening of the law's demands for student achievement."

The Washington Post (5/18, Romano, 744K) reports Spellings said that "those states were selected because they have a sophisticated data-collection system already in place for assessing students." Some "prefer the growth model to the current policy because they believe it gives them more flexibility to meet the standards." Spellings "dismissed the suggestion the new model would leave room for lax assessments."

Flood Insurance Becoming More Costly. The CBS Evening News (5/17, story 2, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Many homeowners are discovering this week that they will be paying more for flood insurance. That is, if they can get it at all." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "Flooding is the most common natural disaster in all 50 states. And despite last year's epic hurricane season, most homeowners in high-risk areas still don't have flood insurance. And almost no one is covered in low-risk areas. The problem, as the rain showed us this weekend in New England, low risk doesn't exist anymore." The "proof is in Pennsylvania. It's nowhere near the ocean, but residents filed more insurance claims for floods in 2004 than any state except Florida. Emergency officials are worried the Northeast is overdue for a major storm, so FEMA is urging homeowners everywhere to shell out more money for flood insurance."

NYTimes Says Greater Oversight Needed For Army Corps, Flood Insurance Reform. The New York Times (5/18, 1.19M) editorializes that as the situation in New England has provided a reminder "that the destructive force of floodwaters" is not a threat specific to the Gulf Coast, "The Army Corps of Engineers must learn, or be compelled, to place a higher priority on safety projects than on Congressional pork. At the same time, the government should use its federal flood insurance to encourage safe building, not to subsidize irresponsible development." The Times goes on to tout a measure sponsored by Sens. Russell Feingold and John McCain "that would bring more accountability to the corps' multibillion-dollar construction budget" and "require greater independent review of project designs to head off engineering failures like the ones that led to the breach in the New Orleans levees." Meanwhile, changes to the Federal flood insurance program should start with the exclusion of "vacation homes from…subsidized rates."

Race Likely To Be Key Factor In New Orleans Mayoral Contest. The New York Times (5/18, Nossiter, 1.19M) profiles New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin (D), who is facing Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D) in Saturday's election. The Times notes that Nagin's calm demeanor "has not dispelled a question haunting" his "tenure since Hurricane Katrina. Is he up to what has become one of the toughest mayoral jobs in the country? Lingering fleets of flooded-out cars parked under the elevated freeways, piles of garbage on the streets, and ever-shifting policies at City Hall: all these are constants in postflood New Orleans, and have only amplified the question." But "on Election Day…these details may not matter because so much of the vote will turn instead on the matter of race." Nagin "commands sympathetic allegiance from most of the city's remaining African-Americans, who supported him overwhelmingly in the primary. Many black voters say they do not blame the mayor for the limping recovery, accepting his assertion that Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, or FEMA, or President Bush, or Mr. Landrieu, are responsible."

Columnist Says Hillary Clinton Not Shoo-In For '08 Democratic Nomination. In a piece in the New York Times (5/18, 1.19M), columnist Bob Herbert writes that while New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) is widely viewed as the frontrunner for the '08 Democratic presidential nomination by people in both the Republican and Democratic parties, "I wouldn't crown the candidate yet. There are ominous stirrings in the tea leaves. A WNBC/Marist Poll released this week found that 60 percent of registered voters in" New York "believe that she will make a run for the White House. But 66 percent of the voters do not think she will be elected president. … Fifty-seven percent of the Democrats surveyed said it was 'not very likely' or 'not likely at all' that she would be elected." Also, Herbert notes, Democratic activists are unhappy with Clinton's co-sponsorship of "a bill that would criminalize the burning of the American flag," her "support for President Bush's war in Iraq," and the news that Rupert Murdoch will be holding a fundraiser for Clinton. Clinton also may be "handicapped by her gender," says Herbert, who concludes that "while the strategists may claim that this or that development is inevitable, the only thing we can really be sure of is that history is full of surprises."

Daschle To Test Presidential Waters In Key States Next Month. The AP (5/18, Jalonick) reports that ex-Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle "will gauge potential support for a 2008 presidential bid with stops in Iowa, New Hampshire and Michigan next month. 'It's just taking the next step to a more thoughtful consideration of a presidential campaign,' Daschle said in an interview with The Associated Press. Daschle said he will be traveling to states to 'sound out presidential themes, talk to voters and get a sense of what kind of a reception I might be getting.' He also will be campaigning for local candidates." Daschle "said he would decide by the end of this year, maybe sooner, if he will run for president."

McCain Attends Sinking Of USS Oriskany Off Florida Coast. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 8, 2:00, Cochran, 8.78M) reported the Navy yesterday sank the 1950's era aircraft carrier USS Oriskany off Florida to form an artificial barrier. ABC (Cochran) added, "It was hard for Navy veterans to take. To see the Oriskany, the ship known as the Big 'O,' sunk not by the enemy, but by the Navy itself, to create an artificial reef. Today, one of the best-known veterans was thinking about the Big 'O.'" Sen. John McCain: "It was a very gallant ship. And those of us that had the honor of serving on it loved it very much." Cochran: "Lieutenant Commander, now Senator John McCain, was on the ship during the Vietnam War." Sen. McCain: "That air wing had the highest losses of any air win in the war. So I lost a lot of friends. At the same time, some of the bravest men I've ever knew, I was privileged to fly with, who were obviously better pilots than I was. They didn't get shot down." Cochran: "McCain remembers his final takeoff from the carrier in 1967, the day he was shot down. The start of five years of captivity." Sen. McCain: "I remember that last takeoff, as if it happened five minutes ago. It was a very vivid memory because my entire life changed. Your entire life changes when you go from a free member of the Armed Forces to a captive of the enemy. It is a rather traumatic experience."

NBC Nightly News (5/17, story 11, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Among the Navy vets who served onboard, Senator John McCain, who today called her a brave ship and said he would someday like to dive down to visit his old quarters."

Clegg Invitation Withdrawn By EEOC. The Washington Times' (5/18, McCaslin) "Inside The Beltway" reports that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) chairwoman, Cari M. Dominguez, "decided to withdraw" an invitation to be part of a panel discussion extended to the president and general counsel of the Center for Equal Opportunity, Roger Clegg. Clegg later "learned from an unnamed source that career staff at the EEOC threatened 'mutiny' if he were to participate; not to mention that several 'establishment civil rights groups' had called to object to his testimony.

NRA To Target Local Officials Over Fears Of Gun Confiscation During Disasters. ABC World News Tonight (5/17, story 5, 2:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "ABC News has learned the National Rifle Association is about to launch a very aggressive and very controversial new campaign." ABC (Tapper) added, "ABC News has learned that the NRA's new campaign targets mayors and chiefs of police. At issue -- when can law enforcement confiscate weapons? The NRA is fired up, saying after Hurricane Katrina, law enforcement officers in Louisiana confiscated firearms from law-abiding citizens." In "this ad to appear in tomorrow's paper, the powerful gun lobby demands a pledge from every police chief and mayor in the country to never confiscate guns after emergencies." NRA executive vice president Wayne LaPierre: "We can't allow these local tyrannies to exist after disaster hits. Where they throw the Constitution out the window. And that's what the police chief in New Orleans did." Tapper: "The NRA will likely also demand that Congress make it a felony to order widespread confiscation of weapons. Louisiana law enforcement officials say, in the chaos after Katrina, some guns were confiscated in the interest of preserving order. But they argue the NRA overestimates how many guns were taken." The NRA is "confident the new message will resonate with its members and the public. Its opponents feel the NRA is overreaching and exploiting the Hurricane Katrina tragedy."

Promising AIDS Prevention Drug Is Long Delayed. The Wall Street Journal (5/18, A1, Hamilton, Chase, 2.11M) reports on the political and economic delays to introducing a drug as an AIDS preventative. Currently, tenofovir is sold only as a drug for treatment rather than prevention. The Journal writes, "The failure of [tenofovir] to get more rapid attention as a preventive step partly reflects the contentious politics of AIDS. Since 2004 protests and other issues have forced researchers to scrap trials in four nations in Asia and Africa." Furthermore, "regulatory hurdles to approval are lower when the people taking a drug are already sick, and so are legal risks. The company has sought to avoid being dragged into culture wars over whether an AIDS-prevention pill might encourage unsafe sex."

Kenya Said To Have Lessons For Fighting AIDS. The New York Times (5/18, Dugger, 1.19M) reports that Kenya "has become a hunting ground of a different sort, attracting policy makers and researchers looking for keys to slowing the relentless spread of AIDS elsewhere on the continent." Researchers have found that, besides the loss of HIV-positive people to death, useful "behavioral change" has helped reduce the incidence of AIDS.

Former President Clinton To Focus On Activism, Service In New Book. The New York Times (5/18, Rich, 1.19M) reports that ex-President Bill Clinton "is following up his best-selling 2004 memoir, 'My Life,' with a book on citizen activism and service, to be published by Alfred A. Knopf sometime late next year or early in 2008. Mr. Clinton was paid more than $10 million for 'My Life,'" but "neither Knopf executives nor Robert Barnett, the lawyer who negotiated both of Mr. Clinton's deals, would comment yesterday on the financial terms of the new book. But one industry veteran with knowledge of the deal estimated that Knopf is paying an advance of around $5 million. The new book will cover the work of the Clinton Foundation, the nonprofit group the president set up to work on issues including AIDS, poverty, women's empowerment and religious and racial reconciliation, Mr. Barnett said."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, B4, 2.11M) notes that the new Clinton book will also touch on "the public service work of private citizens, some famous, some not. The book will likely contain chapters that detail how readers can personally become involved with specific causes. 'President Clinton remains a leader on the global stage, someone with an ability to inspire citizens all over the world,' said Paul Bogaards, a spokesman for Knopf."

Tony Blair's Son Ends Hill Internship. Roll Call's (5/18, Akers) "HoH" reports that Euan Blair's, eldest son of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, internship with Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) came to a mysteriously abrupt halt" after about two weeks. "Sources contend that it's because the 22-year-old lad was a wee bit on the spoiled side" and "seemed 'bored' and uninterested in doing the work of other interns."

Oklahoma Medicaid Reform Touted. In the Wall Street Journal (5/18, 2.11M), Sen. Tom Coburn and Prof. Regina Herzlinger write, "[The Oklahoma legislature] is working to finalize an agreement for Medicaid reform legislation creating personal health accounts (PHAs) for Medicaid enrollees … Are we on the verge of a consumer revolution in health care?" Rather than trim costs by reducing enrollment or benefits, Coburn and Herzlinger argue that Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Florida have chosen a "less draconian" Medicaid reform by "permitting Medicaid enrollees to choose health services and providers for themselves." The results are that "health costs remain low, government outlays stable and state finances healthy."

Will Says Term "Value Voter" Is Meaningless. In the Washington Post (5/18, 744K), George Will calls "value voter" an "aggressively annoying new phrase" currently monopolized by "social conservatives." He argues that the term applies to any voter, since liberals "vote their values" too. He concludes that Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain "will remain busy courting only values voters, since there is no other kind."

Scholar Says Title IX Should Not Be "Misused" Against Science Programs. In USA Today (5/18, 2.31M), American Enterprise Institute scholar Christina Hoff Sommers argues against the prospect of using Title IX to conduct "a review of math, physics and engineering programs at selected universities to root out supposed bias against women and girls." Since males are underrepresented in increasingly many fields, Sommers says, the perception of universities as hostile to women is clearly outdated. She warns, "If the Education Department and National Science Foundation were strictly to impose Title IX compliance standards on academic science, we could see men's participation in math, physics, technology and engineering capped at the level of female interest. That would wreak havoc in fields that drive the economy and where the USA already lags other countries."

Renewal Of US Commitment To High-Energy Physics Urged. In the New York Times (5/18, 1.19M), scientist Verlyn Klinkenborg endorses the conclusion of the National Research Council "that the United States should make a determined effort to build the International Linear Collider in this country as part of an international consortium." He warns, "The overwhelming risk, the panel concluded, is that without this project, the thrust of high-energy physics in this country will simply die away. This country desperately needs to recommit itself to basic research."

WPost Says Free Trade In Services Is Beneficial To US. The Washington Post (5/18, 744K) writes in an editorial, "So far, rather few service jobs have been 'offshored.'" But "if a teenager in Potomac can learn geometry from a tutor in Cochin, India, there's no reason why many other U.S. service jobs can't be done from abroad." Princeton University's Alan S. Blinder "estimates that as many as 42 million U.S. jobs are potentially at risk." That suggests "the future of trade politics looks grim." But "the case for trade in services is as sound as the case for trade in manufactures." And "Indian math tutors may boost U.S. high school math scores, fixing a much lamented weak spot in the nation's competitive outlook."

LATimes Criticizes Bill To Give DC Voting Member In US House. The Los Angeles Times (5/18, 958K) says in an editorial, "Since the adoption of the 23rd Amendment to the Constitution in 1961, the almost 600,000 residents of the District of Columbia have been allowed to vote for president, but otherwise they have no say in the federal government that is their hometown's biggest tourist attraction. Residents of the nation's capital would finally get a vote in Congress under the D.C. Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act proposed by Eleanor Holmes Norton, the Democrat who serves as the district's nonvoting 'delegate' in the House of Representatives, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican and chairman of the Government Reform Committee." The "selling point of the bill is that it deals only with representation in the House — historically the 'people's chamber' — and not with the more problematic question of whether the district should become a state with two votes in the Senate." The "real problem with the bill, however, is that it also bakes a little bread for Utah, which would get a fourth House member because it came the closest of any state to achieving an additional seat in the 2000 census. Not so coincidentally, that additional Utah representative — who would be elected statewide until after the 2010 census — probably would be a Republican, balancing the Democrat who surely would be elected to represent D.C. Partisan horse-trading is a venerable part of the legislative process, of course, but the Utah add-on is an unseemly gimmick in a bill designed to redress a long-standing grievance."

Judges Urged To "Get Serious" About Ethics. The New York Times (5/18, 1.19M) editorializes that installing an inspector general to investigate federal judges "would pose a threat to the independence of the judiciary." To forestall this possibility, it says, "is for judges to finally get serious about holding themselves to high ethical standards."

Net Neutrality Called Web's "Worst New Idea."

The Wall Street Journal (5/18, 2.11M) editorializes that the Internet's progress was "accomplished with a light regulatory touch." It argues that the predominantly liberal backers of net neutrality would introduce a stifling "federal regulatory apparatus."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hayden Grilled On NSA Programs During Confirmation Hearing. Gen. Michael Hayden yesterday testified at the Senate Intelligence Committee hearings on his nomination to be CIA director. As expected, senators questioned Hayden closely over his handling of domestic surveillance programs while at the helm of the NSA. Media observers generally agree that nothing arose that would prevent Hayden's eventual approval. Knight Ridder (5/19, Kuhnhenn), for example, says Hayden "seems assured of Senate confirmation to take over the CIA and would become the agency's third director since the Sept. 11 attacks. The committee will vote next week." USA Today (5/19, Stone, 2.31M), meanwhile, quotes Sen. Carl Levin, the Intelligence Committee's senior Democrat, saying of Hayden, "It's very likely he'll be confirmed." And the New York Times (5/19, Mazzetti, 1.19M) reports that "for the most part, Democrats as well as Republicans praised his experience and said he was a good choice to lead an agency."

The story was the lead on NBC, and also ran early in the lineup of ABC and CBS. NBC Nightly News (5/18, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "General Hayden aggressively defended warrantless eavesdropping and a second program to track telephone numbers as legal. Under fire about government surveillance from committee Democrats, Hayden wouldn't back down." Hayden "insisted the National Security Agency targets al Qaeda, not ordinary Americans. Most committee members were not briefed on the secret programs until late yesterday, a last-minute White House effort to blunt today's questions. It didn't completely work." The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 4, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Instead of focusing on how Hayden planned to handle his new job, the senators spent most of the day asking him about his old job, head of the National Security Agency." CBS (Attkisson) added Hayden "remained cool as he faced more than six hours of questions, most of them on the fine line between protecting Americans and stepping on liberties. For the first time publicly, Hayden seemed to confirm reports that a terror surveillance program he helped devise does access phone call data but not conversations of millions of Americans." Hayden "also defended another surveillance method, eavesdropping on targeted phone conversations between people in the US and foreign countries." General Hayden's "performance has even Democrats telling me today that barring any unforeseen surprises, he's probably going to sail on through confirmation."

ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 2, 2:35, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported Hayden "disarmed the committee by promising to crack down on leaks, train better spies and obey the law. From the start, the four-star General appeared to be among friends." Still, Democrats "wasted no time grilling Hayden on the controversial warrantless wiretapping program he ran at the National Security Agency. Especially recent allegations that the NSA collected records of billions of American phone calls." ABC ran an exchange in which Sen. Carl Levin pressed Hayden over whether he had concerns about the privacy of ordinary Americans while at the NSA. CNN's The Situation Room (5/18, Blitzer) added that Hayden promised "to try to take the politics out of intelligence gathering. But…Hayden may be feeling like a political football himself, as questioning by the Senate Intelligence Committee members continues." The AP (5/19, Shrader) notes Hayden "vigorously defended the Bush administration's warrantless eavesdropping program as a legal spy tool needed to ensnare terrorists." He "portrayed himself as an independent thinker, capable of taking over the CIA as it struggles with issues ranging from nuclear threats to its place among 15 other spy agencies."

The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Hedges, 643K) reports Hayden said that "he initially doubted the legality of a Bush administration program to expand domestic wiretaps on US citizens after the Sept. 11 attacks, but that White House officials convinced him the program was lawful." The New York Times (5/19, Lichtblau, 1.19M) adds that "again and again, he cited the legal and constitutional authority for the program, the safeguards against abuses, and the need for secrecy to ensure its effectiveness." But while "the message was constant, General Hayden sought to put a more human face on the effort, explaining his role and that of his aides in running the surveillance program." The Washington Post (5/19, A1, Linzer, Babington, 744K) notes Hayden "deflected specific questions on sensitive subjects, including interrogation methods involving terrorism detainees and the scope of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping operation, telling senators he would respond only during the closed-door portion of the hearing." On the wiretapping program, Hayden "said the White House's legal basis is rooted in the opinion that Article II of the Constitution gives the president expansive authorities in a time of war to conduct domestic surveillance. Hayden said he never personally reviewed the legal opinion that was drawn up in support of the program, but 'when they came to me and we discussed its lawfulness, our discussion anchored itself on Article II.'"

The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Miller, 958K) reports, "In perhaps the clearest signal of a looming shift in course for the troubled agency, Hayden made it clear that he believes the CIA has become too bogged down tracking daily developments in Iraq and other global trouble spots." Instead, "he suggested that the CIA should surrender more of that work to the Pentagon, focus more of its energies on anticipating longer-term threats and trends, and reconcile itself to a diminished role in which it is an important, but not isolated, member of the US intelligence community." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Solomon, 2.11M) notes, "Currently, the Defense Department controls 80% of the US government's intelligence budget." Hayden's confirmation "would place active military officers in charge of all of Washington's principal spy agencies."

BellSouth Seeks Retraction From USA Today On Phone Record Database Story. USA Today (5/19, 2.31M) reports BellSouth "asked USA TODAY on Thursday to 'retract the false and unsubstantiated statements' about the company that it contends were in a May 11 story about a database of domestic calling records maintained by the National Security Agency." In a letter to USA publisher, Craig Moon, "the company noted that the story said BellSouth is 'working under contract with the NSA' to provide 'phone call records of tens of millions of Americans' that have been incorporated into the database." The letter says, "No such proof was offered by your newspaper because no such contracts exist. You have offered no proof that BellSouth provided massive calling data to the NSA as part of a warrantless program because it simply did not happen." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Searcey, Ellison, 2.11M) adds BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher "said the demand for a retraction was in part prompted by the cost BellSouth likely will incur defending against as many as five lawsuits seeking billions of dollars that have been filed against the Atlanta-based company since the article's publication."

Four Suspected Terrorists Attempt Suicide At Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Williams, 958K) reports that at Guantanamo Bay, "four terrorism suspects at the sprawling prison network here attempted suicide Thursday, and detainees at a camp for the most compliant prisoners attacked guards with improvised weapons when the guards tried to rescue a man attempting to hang himself, a spokesman for the U.S. military-run prison said." The disturbance "at Camp 4, a communal facility housing 175 prisoners, followed three overdose attempts earlier in the day at Camp 1, where about 180 detainees live in metal mesh cages." As many "as 10 detainees participated in the incident. It was unclear why the men sought to take their lives simultaneously or on this specific day."

State Department Will Not Use PRC-Made Computers On Classified Networks. Government Computer News (5/18, Wait) reports Rep. Frank Wolf announced yesterday "that the State Department has agreed that approximately 900 computers purchased from Lenovo Corp. will not be used on classified networks. The U.S.-China Commission…raised concerns with Wolf in April," and "Wolf contacted secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, FBI director Robert Mueller and John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, and asked them to look into the matter." Wolf said yesterday, "This decision would have had dire consequences for our national security, potentially jeopardizing our investment in a secure IT infrastructure. It is no secret, and becoming more obvious…that the United States is a principal target of Chinese intelligence services."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Officials Face "Grilling" Over Perceived Security Gaps, Staff Vacancies. In an article appearing on at least 40 news websites, the AP (5/19, Jordan) reports DHS officials Dwight M. Williams and K. Gregg Prillaman "sat through two hours of grilling" yesterday by members of the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee who questioned the agency's contract with Shirlington Limousine, which has been tied to the investigation surrounding former Rep. Randall 'Duke' Cunningham, and the security clearance of former spokesman Brian Doyle, who is now charged with sex offences. Williams and Prillaman, along with the associate director of the US Office of Personnel Management, "largely portrayed the department as victim to a few bad employees and constraining contracting rules." Subcommittee members "also criticized department officials about rampant staff turnover at the third-largest federal agency, leaving some high-level jobs vacant."

Government Executive (5/18, Marino) reported Prillaman said, "Recruitment is probably our highest priority right now." However, a memorandum released by the subcommittee late Thursday said "senior-level vacancies" exist at FEMA, ICE, CBP and the TSA. Rep. Bennie Thompson said that with the approach of hurricane season, FEMA "must beef up its ranks. 'When I see only 73 percent of FEMA employees on board, I'm concerned,' he said." GovExec added, "This is the second time in recent weeks DHS officials have been grilled by legislators; Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, told DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff in a memo sent in late April that the department must announce how many jobs FEMA still has open. Davis' staff is still processing the results of that request."

In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (5/19, D4, Barr) reports, "It's no secret that morale is a problem at" DHS. Bush administration officials have tried to play down turf battles and culture clashes as transitional woes that would fade after the rank and file had worked together for five to seven years, but complaints by employees continue and are starting to get to the ears of members of Congress." Prillaman and Williams acknowledged yesterday "that turnover in top management jobs…appears to be adversely affecting employee morale." Meanwhile, Rep. Kendrick B. Meek "pointed to MaxHR, the department's new performance-based pay system, as a source of anxiety for the employees."

Rogers Wants Hearing On Shirlington Contract. The Washington Times/UPI (5/19, Waterman) reports DHS officials "have repeatedly defended" the way the Shirlington contract "was awarded and the security procedures under which it is operated. They have launched a counteroffensive on Capitol Hill, visiting with lawmakers in an attempt to assuage concerns." However, aides for Rep. Mike D. Rogers say he hopes to hold a hearing on the contract award "when Congress returns in mid-June from its Memorial Day recess, but that the timing would depend on when they were able to get documentation from the department."

Bill Requiring Agencies To Conduct Privacy Review Seen As Unlikely To Become Law. Government Executive/CongressDaily (5/18, Sherman) reported the House Judiciary Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee approved legislation Wednesday that would require agencies "to assess the privacy implications of any new or proposed rule," though it "appears to have little chance of becoming law despite the recent and ongoing furor over reports that certain phone companies have been giving calling data to the federal government." George Mason University Law School Professor Sally Katzen suggested in testimony "that agencies be required to give a copy of their privacy impact assessment to the director of the Office of Management and Budget." She "also…excoriated the administration for failing to name a replacement for Nuala O'Connor Kelly, who headed privacy efforts at the Department of Homeland Security but resigned last fall." CongressDaily added that the bill was "first…introduced by panel member Steve Chabot, R-Ohio, in the 106th Congress," and that Rep. Melvin Watt said, "This may be just another show."

TSA Looking Into Machine That Would Allow Passengers To Leave Shoes On. USA Today (5/19, Frank, 2.31M) reports that a machine being developed by GE called the ShoeScanner, which "would allow airline passengers to keep their shoes on while going through security checkpoints," is being looked at "with great interest," according to TSA chief Kip Hawley. "Anything that speeds up explosive detection through the checkpoint, we want to encourage," said Hawley. The machine, which "uses technology similar to a medical MRI to detect explosives in 5 to 8 seconds," will have to "pass testing in an airport before" before it can be used for passenger screening.

Four Suspected Terrorists Attempt Suicide At Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Williams, 958K) reports that at Guantanamo Bay, "four terrorism suspects at the sprawling prison network here attempted suicide Thursday, and detainees at a camp for the most compliant prisoners attacked guards with improvised weapons when the guards tried to rescue a man attempting to hang himself, a spokesman for the U.S. military-run prison said." The disturbance "at Camp 4, a communal facility housing 175 prisoners, followed three overdose attempts earlier in the day at Camp 1, where about 180 detainees live in metal mesh cages." As many "as 10 detainees participated in the incident. It was unclear why the men sought to take their lives simultaneously or on this specific day."

Judge Dismisses Detainee Lawsuit. The New York Times (5/19, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "A federal judge on Thursday dismissed a lawsuit brought by a man who says he was an innocent victim of the United States government's program transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries." Judge T. S. Ellis III ruled against the plaintiff, Khaled el-Masri, to prevent "exposure of state secrets." The ACLU said it would consider an appeal.

WAR NEWS:

Five Americans, Two Dozen Iraqis Slain In Violent Day. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 6, 1:55, Vargas, 8.78M) reported that yesterday was "a very bad day in Iraq. Four American soldiers, one US sailor and two dozen Iraqis have been killed." ABC (Berman) also profiled one of the slain Iraqis, 37-year-old Thaier al-Ubeidi, "a police officer in Baghdad, dangerous work. But he was not killed on the job. He was killed on his way to buy dinner for his children. A group of gunmen drove past in a car, says his brother. They shot him five times. His brothers say they don't know why he was killed."

The AP (5/19, Quinn) reports that meanwhile, "the kidnappers of a United Arab Emirates diplomat in Iraq demanded the closing of the country's embassy in Baghdad in a videotape aired on Arab television. Al-Jazeera TV did not air audio with the video, which showed a man said to be the hostage, Naji Rashid al-Nuaimi, 28, who was abducted by gunmen Tuesday in Baghdad." The Washington Post (5/19, A14, Knickmeyer, Sarhan, 744K) also reports in the Iraqi violence in a story headlined "Iraqi Leader Acts To Defuse Shiite Rivalry In Basra," in which it says President Jalal Talabani "convened an emergency meeting Thursday to discuss the southern port of Basra, Iraq's second-largest city and the heart of a growing, lethal power struggle among some of the Shiite Muslim religious parties that lead Iraq's governing coalition."

Violence Said To Be Driving Middle-Class Away. The New York Times (5/19, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports, "In the latest indication of the crushing hardships weighing on the lives of Iraqis, increasing portions of the middle class seem to be doing everything they can to leave the country. In the last 10 months, the state has issued new passports to 1.85 million Iraqis, 7 percent of the population and a quarter of the country's estimated middle class." The Times adds, "The school system offers another clue: Since 2004, the Ministry of Education has issued 39,554 letters permitting parents to take their children's academic records abroad. The number of such letters issued in 2005 was double that in 2004, according to the director of the ministry's examination department. Iraqi officials and international organizations put the number of Iraqis in Jordan at close to a million. Syrian cities also have growing Iraqi populations."

Iraqi Reporters Risking Their Lives. The Washington Times (5/19, Behn, 90K) reports, "The recent killings of six Iraqi journalists have rattled the country's fledgling press corps, a battle-worn crew that has persisted in covering the nation's turmoil while suffering dozens of dead at the hands of insurgents, government troops and even American forces." Reporters Without Borders "counts 68 reporters and cameramen killed so far trying to cover Iraq at war; if translators and other assistants are counted the total is 86, making this the deadliest conflict for journalists since World War II."

Marine Officials Not Disputing Murtha Statements On Attack That Killed Civilians. The AP (5/19, Baldor) reports, "Military officials said Thursday that a criminal investigation into a firefight in western Iraq that left at least 15 civilians dead is not complete, but they did not dispute a congressman's charges that the attack by Marines was far worse than originally reported." The AP adds, "Officials in the Pentagon and at U.S. Central Command declined to say whether Rep. John Murtha…was correct in saying Marines killed innocent women and children 'in cold blood' during the attacks last November. … Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said he would not comment on the veracity of Murtha's remarks, but said individuals will be held accountable if it is determined they did something wrong."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/19, Shanker, 1.19M) says that "an official military investigation into allegations that American marines killed innocent Iraqis last November has uncovered evidence that the number of dead civilians is higher than the 15 originally reported, Congressional and Defense Department officials said."

New Iraqi Government To Be Announced Over Weekend. USA Today (5/19, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraqi leaders will announce the makeup of the country's new government this weekend, then turn to the task of running a country increasingly divided along ethnic and religious lines. After months of wrangling, those leaders say they have come up with a system that will help develop consensus on critical issues." The new government "has established oversight committees in which representatives of Iraq's various groups will debate issues and resolve problems, said Humam Hammoudi, an influential cleric with the United Iraqi Alliance, the religious Shiite alliance that is the largest political bloc in parliament." The Washington Times (5/19, Behn, 90K) says the new cabinet "will include a new Ministry of National Dialogue, in an effort to stop the sectarian killings and violence that has spread through most of the country." But "the effort might fall short, because Sunni leaders are not satisfied with the Cabinet lineup cobbled together after months of closed-door negotiations."

Rumsfeld Says Efforts To Stop Formation Of Iraqi Government Will Fail. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (5/18) what he would say to people who feel the Iraq war cannot be won. Rumsfeld said, "I can say that I can understand how some people could feel that way, given what they hear on the television and what they see in the press. And on the other hand, if you put yourself in the position of Zarqawi and the terrorists and the insurgents, they tried to stop the election last year in January, and they failed. They tried to stop the drafting of a constitution and they failed. They tried to stop the referendum on the constitution and they failed. They tried to stop the election December 15 and they failed. They're now trying to stop the formation of a new government and they're going to fail in the next few days. It's going to be completed and announced."

Senate Investigates Allegations Of Torricelli Link To Oil-For-Food Scheme. The Financial Times (5/19, Gatti) reports, "The US Senate is looking into allegations that" former US Senator Robert Torricelli "urged Baghdad to give a US company lucrative contracts under the much-criticised United Nations oil-for-food programme." It "is the first time that a leading US lawmaker has been linked to the controversial UN programme, whose shortcomings have been an important element of the Bush administration's critique of the UN." According to documents retrieved after the Saddam Hussein was overthrown, Torricelli "had a series of meetings in the late 1990s, when he was a congressman, with Nizar Hamdoun, then the Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations. During these meetings, Mr Torricelli allegedly urged the Iraqi authorities to help" Torricelli campaign contributor David Chang and his lobbying company Bright and Bright "get oil-for-food contracts on good terms."

Over 100 Killed As Taliban Violence In Afghanistan Spikes. In Afghanistan, the arrival of spring has brought a new wave of violence, as Taliban fighters cross the border from Pakistan into two southern provinces. More than 100 people, mostly Taliban fighters, were killed yesterday in ongoing attacks. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 5, :30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "There's been an explosion of violence in Afghanistan, some of the worst fighting since the US helped to overthrow the Taliban government after 9/11. Most of the fighting has been in two southern provinces, including a brazen assault by hundreds of Taliban fighters on one, small town. 87 Taliban, 15 police officers, a Canadian soldier and an American contractor have been killed. The American died in a car bombing in the northwest city of Herat."

The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 5, 1:40, Logan, 7.66M) added, "This time of year, springtime, is always the fighting season in Afghanistan, so it's no surprise to see an increase in the attacks here. But what this is really about is the fact that the Taliban have continued to have a safe haven across the Afghan border inside Pakistan, and no one has done anything about that." The Taliban, "according to the Afghans that I speak to, they say they're better equipped than the Afghan security forces."

NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 6, 2:25, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "The Taliban's comeback is not only on the battlefield, but increasingly in the hearts and minds of Afghans. Why? Analysts say the democratic values embodied by Afghan President Hamid Karzai haven't caught on." Despite "some $12 billion in aid and the loss of over 220 US soldiers, many Afghan men in the street want the Taliban back. Increasingly, the Taliban is seen here as a protector of Islamic values against an invasion of threatening Western ways."

Knight Ridder (5/19, Landay) says the unrest "comes as thousands of British, Canadian and Dutch peacekeepers are deploying into southern Afghanistan, replacing .. troops in a major expansion of NATO's International Security Assistance Force." Some of the violence "is related to tribal rivalries and a major Afghan government drive to eradicate the poppy crops that make the country the world's largest producer of opium, from which heroin is made."

USA Today/AP (5/19, Khan) reports Karzai "said the violence was coming from the mountainous regions of neighboring Pakistan. The area is populated by ethnic Pashtuns, who make up the majority of the Taliban militants. 'In the madrassas (Islamic schools), the mullahs and teachers are saying to their students: "Go to Afghanistan for jihad,"' Karzai said." Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, "called the allegations 'baseless.'" Similar stories appear in the Washington Post (5/19, A1, Constable, 744K) and New York Times (5/19, Gall, 1.19M).

US Soldier Rewarded With Silver Star For Bravery In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (5/19, A13, Tyson, 744K) reports, "Sgt. 1st Class David Lowe and his Special Forces A-team were in their last week in Afghanistan on June 10, 2005, when their base received an urgent call: A small group of 82nd Airborne paratroopers was pinned down in a firefight near the Pakistan border and needed support. … Lowe's bravery in the Afghan mountains that sweltering summer day was rewarded Thursday with a Silver Star, which was pinned on by Brig. Gen. John F. Mulholland Jr., the head of the Special Forces Command, as Lowe and 12 fellow soldiers from 1st Battalion, 7th Special Forces Group, were honored at a ceremony here."

Army Doctor Arranges For Afghan Child's Heart Surgery In US. Army cardiologist Maj. Sloane Guy arranged for an Afghan child to travel to the US for surgery to correct a severe heart defect. The story was covered by the CBS Evening News (5/18, story 8, 2:35, Assuras, 7.66M), which reported, "His Army nickname is Blue because that's the color Mohammed Umer's lips, fingers, and toes were when Major Sloane Guy found him half a world away in Afghanistan." Mohammed is "from a remote village in northeastern Afghanistan. Last April, he was so sick, his father turned to the US military for help. Major Guy realized the equipment needed to save Mohammed's life wasn't available in Afghanistan." Maj. Guy: "I made a commitment to him to try to bring him over here." Assuras: "It took more than a year to get here. He and his father were twice denied visas, so Major Guy went to the top for help, calling Senator and surgeon Bill Frist, with whom he had trained. This week, father and Blue arrived and Major Guy was at Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland to greet them." Today, "a big thumbs up after open heart surgery at Children's National Medical Center in Washington. The next two days are critical for Mohammed but" he is expected to "return to Afghanistan within two months with a healthy heart, needing a new nickname since he will no longer be blue."

DOJ:

US Attorney Says Active Solutions' Routing Calls To Him Is Harassment. The Roanoke Times (5/19, Nair) reports that Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Hogeboom "claims in court documents that he recently received calls from six elderly customers of Active Solutions, an Ohio-based medical equipment company, requesting that he service their broken-down motorized wheelchairs" and "filed a motion seeking a temporary restraining order against Active Solutions and its parent company, CBI Co. LLC." The companies are "under federal investigation for suspected Medicare fraud," and "Active Solutions has been telling wheelchair owners that Hogeboom can 'explain why the company cannot repair chairs.'" As "the customers…are potential witnesses or victims in the case, the government is requesting that a judge deem the company's behavior harassment." Hogeboom calls the companies actions "a sick practical joke."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Second Lay Trial Begins As Enron Conspiracy Jurors End First Day Of Deliberations. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, C3, McWilliams) reports ex-Enron chairman Kenneth Lay's "'other' trial -- on charges of violating bank-lending agreements -- began Thursday with his defense attorney insisting Mr. Lay wasn't aware of any violations." Lay is charged with bank fraud and misrepresentation for borrowing $75 million from three banks, Bank of America, Chase Bank, and Compass Bank, in order to buy Enron stock. The government contends the purchases violated loan agreements. Meanwhile, jurors in the conspiracy and fraud case against Lay and ex-Enron president Jeffrey Skilling completed their first full day of deliberations without reaching a verdict, and will resume on Monday.

The New York Times (5/19, Bajaj) reports the bank fraud charges against Lay were broken off from the main Enron case by Judge Simeon T. Lake III "after Mr. Lay's defense team sought to have the entire case against him separated from Mr. Skilling's" in what the Times calls "an unusual compromise." Lake has said he will not issue a decision "until the jury in the other case, which he also presided over, renders a verdict, which is expected to take a week or more."

USA Today (5/19, 8B, Farrell) reports prosecutor Robb Adkins said in his opening statement that Lay "repeatedly violated 'Regulation U,' a rule put in place following the 1929 stock market crash to protect banks from borrowers who speculate in the stock market. According to the rule, when a borrower uses stock as collateral for a loan, banks are only allowed to lend an amount equal to 50% of the stock's value. Every borrower has to sign a form indicating he or she understands the rule."

The Washington Post (5/19, D1, Johnson) reports ex-Bank of America executive James Shelton testified he discussed Regulation U with Lay on several occasions. But on cross-examination by Lay attorney Ken Carroll, Shelton said he "did not believe Lay had engaged in a scheme to defraud the bank." The Los Angeles Times (5/19) reports that "each of the four counts of bank fraud and false statements to banks carry prison terms of as many as 30 years and a fine of $1 million. Those penalties are in addition to the decades in prison Lay could face if convicted in the fraud and conspiracy trial."

First Enron Executive Retrial Also Gets Underway. The AP (5/19) reports, "Next door to Lay's bank fraud trial, the first of three retrials of five former Enron broadband-unit executives was winding down in its third week, with closing arguments expected as early as Friday. In that case, former unit finance chief Kevin Howard and former in-house accountant Michael Krautz are charged with conspiracy, fraud and falsifying records for allegedly using a sham deal to fake earnings in late 2000. Both testified this week that the deal was legitimate." A three-month trial in 2005 ended in a hung jury.

Ailing Lay Lead Attorney Profiled. The New York Times (5/19, Barrionuevo) runs a story on the much-covered health problems of Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, who "was forced into surgery to clear an arterial blockage" during the conspiracy trial. For Ramsey, "who describes himself as a hard-drinking, chain-smoking legal warhorse, it was the beginning of the most challenging personal odyssey of his career and an event that may turn out to play a crucial role in the outcome of Mr. Lay's case." He ultimately "missed more than a month of the 56-day trial, including the testimony of Mr. Lay."

White-Collar Law Firms Turning To Corporate Criminal Defense. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Selvin) writes that "white-shoe" law firm O'Melveny & Myers "probably won't be fully compensated" for their work defending Skilling, who "appears to have exhausted his defense fund. But the payoff down the road could be well worth it, even if Skilling is convicted. The decision to defend Skilling is seen as a business move by Petrocelli and his firm, O'Melveny & Myers, to burnish their reputation and expertise in white-collar criminal defense." Firms like O'Melveny "that had once shunned criminal work as distasteful have come to see defending alleged corporate wrongdoers as a potential growth business. Enron's collapse, other corporate scandals and passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law tightening corporate accounting rules have fueled much of this growth."

LATimes Says Enron Executives Are On Trial For Arrogance. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (5/19) says, "Jurors finally began deliberations Wednesday in the nation's latest trial of the century, the criminal case against former Enron executives Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay. Although charged with multiple counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading related to the energy company's 2001 collapse, the ex-CEOs were really on trial for arrogance -- 'extraordinary arrogance,' as one prosecutor called it in her closing argument. … Now the fates of Skilling and Lay are in the hands of 12 fatigued jurors in Houston. Their charge is to consider only the evidence in the 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading against Skilling and the six counts of fraud and conspiracy against Lay. But it's unlikely that they will forget all that they have seen and heard in the last 15 weeks. Nor will the rest of us."

Columnist Says Lay, Skilling Betting On "Nothing Happened" Defense. In his New York Times (5/19) business column, Floyd Norris writes, "In the previous trials of chief executives whose companies imploded in fraud, the defense has always been one of ignorance, that underlings pulled it off behind the boss's back. It is an embarrassing defense, given that it implies the boss got millions for doing a very bad job, but sometimes it has worked." But Lay and Skilling "went for the 'nothing happened' defense, holding that there was nothing really wrong until Enron folded because of a loss of confidence." The "audacious" argument is meant to suggest that since "there was nothing really wrong at Enron, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling seek to preserve both their freedom and their reputations."

Milberg Indicted For Kickbacks In Class Action Suits. A federal grand jury indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the nation's best-known class-action law firm, for a 20-year conspiracy to funnel payments to plaintiffs in dozens of securities class-action cases as part of a scheme to improve their prospects of gaining the lucrative status of lead counsel. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, A1, Wilke, Koppel, Sanders) reports this "could prove fatal" to Milberg, as it "will find it nearly impossible to win future assignments." Discussions between the firm and the government on "a deferred-prosecution agreement that would have avoided criminal charges" collapse after Milberg wouldn't agree to "a waiver of attorney-client privilege and access to privileged internal records," and the case "is expected to bring new scrutiny of the government's tactics in its crackdown on corporate crime, including the increasingly common demand that companies under investigation waive attorney-client privilege and cut off legal-defense funds for partners or executives who have been accused -- not convicted -- of a crime."

The New York Times (5/19, Creswell) adds that this "is the first instance of a law firm with national reach facing criminal charges." However, "prosecutors have so far been stymied in efforts to charge the two primary targets of the investigation, Mr. Weiss and his former partner, William S. Lerach." Also, some "said they were disturbed that the entire law firm had been indicted, especially as the Justice Department has been reluctant to take such an action since the 2002 indictment of the accounting firm Arthur Andersen," which went out of business even though the Supreme Court overturned its conviction.

The Financial Times (5/19, Kirchgaessner) characterizes the indictment as "a sea change in the Justice Department's handling of white-collar crime and law firms." The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Reckard, Friedman), USA Today (5/19, 3B, Iwata) and Bloomberg (5/18, Pearson) also cover this story.

Government Widens Stock-Option Probe. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, A3, Bandler, Levitz) reports, "In a dramatic widening of the investigations into potential stock-option abuses, federal prosecutors in Manhattan have launched criminal probes of at least five U.S. companies," including Caremark Rx Inc., SafeNet Inc., Affiliated Computer Services Inc., Vitesse Semiconductor Corp., and UnitedHealth Group Inc. This "signals a significant ratcheting up of government scrutiny of option-granting practices." Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant for the SEC, notes that "unlike some complicated revenue-recognition cases brought by federal prosecutors in recent years, backdating would be easy for jurors to grasp." He also "predicted pressure would mount for boards to fire chief executives who had been involved in backdating." The New York Times (5/19) and AP (5/18) also cover this story.

Justice Department Joins Suit Against Abbott On Drug Pricing. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, B2, Carreyrou) reports, "The Justice Department joined a whistleblower lawsuit against Abbott Laboratories Inc. and Hospira Inc., alleging that the companies conspired to inflate Medicare and Medicaid reimbursements on some drugs from 1991 to 2001" by reporting "prices for its drugs to price publishers, such as the Drug Topics Red Book, that were as much as 1,000% higher than the prices the company charged hospitals and doctors," who could then "reap big profits by filing Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement claims that were much higher than what they had actually paid," Abbott allegedly marketed the scheme as "an inducement to buy its drugs" and "thereby increasing its own sales and profits." However, "Abbott denied the allegations and said it would defend itself vigorously." The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Japsen) notes that the suit "mirrors similar allegations brought against Abbott and dozens of other drugmakers in recent years" and is "part of a legal assault on pharmaceutical industry pricing."

HealthSouth To Pay $3 Million To Avoid Prosecution For Accounting Fraud. The New

York Times (5/19, Whitmire) reports that in a deal that avoids "prosecution over a giant accounting fraud," HealthSouth "agreed to accept responsibility for crimes committed by its executives, must pay the money to the United States Postal Inspection Service's consumer fraud division, enact more stringent internal controls and commit no other illegal acts for three years." This ends "an investigation that began in March 2003" during which "15 executives, including 5 chief financial officers, have pleaded guilty or been convicted of participating in the fraud." The Los Angeles Times (5/19) also reports on the HealthSouth settlement.

NASDAQ May Delist Maces Security. The Philadelphia Business Journal (5/19) reports, "Mace Security International Inc. "faces a delisting from the NASDAQ stock exchange" as "an independent investigation into its hiring practices," including "t alleged hiring of undocumented workers at its car washes," which "was commissioned by the company's audit committee" delayed its "filing of the company's 10-K annual report for 2005 and its 10-Q quarterly report for the period ended March 31." However, Mace "received a stay of the delisting" and "a hearing before the NASDAQ Listing Qualifications Panel…is scheduled for May 25."

Financial Times Criticizes Sarbanes-Oxley. The Financial Times (5/19) editorializes, "America's smaller public companies had reason to hope the cost of complying with the Sarbanes-Oxley (Sox) act would this week be lightened. Their hopes were largely belied." Furthermore, the SEC "failed to specify when the reporting holiday for small caps would come to an end; and it forgot to clarify whether foreign companies could use this postponement." The result of all this is that "many US small businesses have reportedly avoided going public altogether, or are conducting initial public offerings on small cap exchanges in foreign markets," and "New York has lost its position as favourite port of call for the secondary listings of foreign companies in favour of London, Hong Kong and other less burdensome jurisdictions" The SEC's "most pressing concern" in its new guidelines "must be to address the incentive for the big four accounting firms to pile ever greater disclosure requirements on companies' internal controls."

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Probes Of Ney, Jefferson To Run Parallel To DOJ Investigations. The Washington Post (5/19, A4, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the House ethics committee "plans to quickly begin its probes into the activities" of Reps. Ney and Jefferson "while working with the Justice Department to avoid interference with federal prosecutors' investigations of the same lawmakers, according to people familiar with the panel's efforts." The committee's "surprise decision Wednesday to open inquiries into allegations that the congressmen accepted bribes -- as well as a third, wider-ranging probe -- was meant to tamp down criticism that the panel is dysfunctional and that the House is not policing the ethical lapses of its members, according to the sources." But it "was not clear that the committee would have enough time to complete its work before the end of the legislative session this autumn, or that its efforts would not complicate the work of Justice Department prosecutors and investigators." The logjam "over starting new investigations was finally broken after Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) was replaced last month as the committee's ranking Democrat by a respected veteran of the panel, Rep. Howard L. Berman (D-Calif.)." Yesterday, Republicans "sought to portray Mollohan as the primary cause of the long holdup in new investigations."

The AP (5/19, Margasak) reports the House ethics committee, "fortified by a pile of new money to conduct investigations, has become a player in major bribery probes that could leave some lawmakers facing double trouble: criminal prosecution and punishment by their peers." One "potential legal obstacle for the committee could be the Justice Department, which sometimes asks the ethics panel to step aside temporarily to avoid jeopardizing a prosecution. In the cases announced Wednesday, the committee could need some of the same witnesses and documents that are crucial to the Justice Department investigations."

The NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 7, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) last night noted the investigations, reporting, "In Washington, this is the season of investigations into members of Congress. The ethics committee in the House has been paralyzed, dormant for over a year, because of a fight about its own rules of operation. But this week, it suddenly came to life and opened investigations into two members of Congress, perhaps with more to come." NBC (Reid) added,

"Republican Bob Ney of Ohio and Democrat William Jefferson of Louisiana, both already under investigation by Federal prosecutors. Now, the House ethics committee, ending 16 months of partisan gridlock, has launched its own investigation into whether the two men accepted bribes. The allegations are serious, but longtime Congress watchdog Fred Wertheimer says these two cases are just the tip of an ethics iceberg." Fred Wertheimer, Congress watchdog: "We are facing the worst corruption scandals in Congress in decades."

Justice Department Goes To Trial In Safavian Case On Monday. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Cummings, 2.11M) reports the Justice Department's "investigation of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal already has produced four guilty pleas. Now, prosecutors are about to find out whether an influence-peddling probe based largely on emails and a network of low-profile Republican aides can pass muster with a jury." David Safavian, "a longtime friend of Mr. Abramoff and a former White House official, is scheduled to go on trial Monday. He is charged with making false statements and obstructing government inquiries about Mr. Abramoff's relationship with him while he served as chief of staff of the General Services Administration, which manages government property." The trial "comes at a critical moment as the focus of the Abramoff investigation appears to be broadening from staff to members of Congress, most notably Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney. While the Safavian trial is narrowly focused on the former government official's actions, a court loss could be a psychological blow to the high-profile inquiry." The prosecutors' "task is complicated by the fact that they aren't planning to call Mr. Abramoff."

DOJ Funds Texas Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force. KTBC-TV Austin, Texas (5/18, 6:07 p.m.) reported, "Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott announced a grant from the US Department of Justice. The grant will help establish an Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force responsible for investigating online child exploitation cases in southern and central Texas. The task force will be responsible for both proactive and reactive investigations as well as prevention and education."

KXAN-TV Austin, Texas (5/18, 4:05 p.m.) reported, "Fighting cyber crime in Texas gets a boost today. The US Department of Justice has given $300,000 to the Texas Attorney General's cyber crimes unit. The money will be used to create an Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, responsible for fighting child exploitation online."

Oklahoma Creating Online Predator Investigation Agency. KVII-TV Amarillo, Texas (5/18, 12:35 p.m.) reported, "Oklahoma will soon have a new crime-fighting agency. The state senate passed a bill yesterday creating a full-time crime bureau unit that will investigate cases of child pornography and pedophiles targeting children on the Internet. The bill now goes to Gov. Brad Henry, who made it a part of his legislative agenda. The Department of Justice estimates that one in every five teenagers is approached online by a sexual predator."

Former Weekly Reader Editor Guilty Of Internet Child Predator Charges. The Stamford (CT) Advocate (5/19) reports that former Weekly Reader editor Noel Neff was convicted on "charges of using the Internet to lure a minor to engage in sexual activity and traveling across state lines to engage in sexual conduct with a minor." He "faces a minimum of five year, and up to 60 years in prison." Francis O'Reilly of Fairfield, Neff's lawyer, "said his client never committed a criminal act and was only trying to share his insight as a sexually confused teenager with someone he thought was going through the same experience."

Louisiana Teacher Faces Federal Child Porn Charges. The AP (5/18) reports that a Jefferson Parish, Louisiana public school teacher "was in custody Thursday, booked on charges of possession of child pornography, federal authorities said. The FBI arrested Russell Counterman, 44, of New Orleans, after getting a tip that he allegedly downloaded files _ while at work _ containing sexually explicit images of children who ranged in age from 4 years old to teenagers, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. … Federal agents said Counterman was accused of using a school-issued laptop to download child pornography from the Internet at the school. After agreeing to a search, authorities said some of the alleged material was found in Counterman's classroom in a briefcase as well as in his home."

Florida Man Admits To Internet Sex Solicitation Charges. WTSP-TV Tampa Bay (5/18) reports on its website that Leroy Walter Lasky, Jr., of Port Orange, Florida, plead guilty "to using a computer to entice a minor to meet and have sex," and now "faces 5 to 30 years in prison.

Pentagon Contracting Probe Shows Federal Emphasis On Fighting Corruption. The Boston

Globe (5/19, Kranish, 484K) reports that after covering a $15,000 luxury trip to Miami by former Rep. Randy Cunningham in March 2004, prosecutors say defense contractor Mitchell Wade "gave $32,000 in laundered campaign funds to Representative Katherine Harris" and "funneled $46,000 into the campaign account of Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr." Wade "then discussed getting specific defense appropriations with Harris and Goode or their staffs, according to court documents." The Globe notes that in addition to Harris and Goode, federal agents are investigating Reps. Robert Ney and William Jefferson, and "the totality of these investigations marks one of the Justice Department's most concentrated public corruption efforts in recent history. In a speech last week in San Diego, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said the bureau has made those cases its top priority. 'More than ever, the FBI must be actively engaged in combating public corruption,' Mueller said."

House Ethics Committee Hopes To Avoid Conflict With DOJ Ney, Jefferson Probes. The Washington Post (5/19, A4, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "The House ethics committee plans to quickly begin its probes into the activities of Reps. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.) while working with the Justice Department to avoid interference with federal prosecutors' investigations of the same lawmakers, according to people familiar with the panel's efforts. Yet it was not clear that the committee would have enough time to complete its work before the end of the legislative session this autumn." The Post notes that DOJ "has traditionally opposed such parallel inquiries by congressional committees for fear that lawmakers might complicate its collection of testimony and information. … Stanley Brand, a lawyer and expert on congressional ethics, said that simultaneous inquiries are 'impractical' and might put the Justice Department's efforts in jeopardy."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 7, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In Washington, this is the season of investigations into members of Congress. The ethics committee in the House has been paralyzed, dormant for over a year, because of a fight about its own rules of operation. But this week, it suddenly came to life and opened investigations into two members of Congress, perhaps with more to come." NBC (Reid) added that Ney and Jefferson are "already under investigation by federal prosecutors. The allegations are serious, but longtime Congress watchdog Fred Wertheimer says these two cases are just the tip of an ethics iceberg."

Gillespie Says White House Was Told Of Intended Payment For Tobin Defense. The New Hampshire Union Leader (5/19, DiStaso) reports that ex-RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie "remembers telling someone at the White House that he had decided to have the RNC pay the legal defense bills for convicted phone-jamming conspirator James Tobin, but he can't remember who." Gillespie "told the New Hampshire Union Leader yesterday he informed the White House after he decided to authorize payment. The Washington Post reported on Wednesday that Gillespie told its reporter that he had 'informed the White House, without seeking formal approval, before authorizing the payments.' Gillespie told the Union Leader the two accounts were 'consistent' because he decided to authorize the payments before telling the White House and actually authorized the payments after telling the White House." Gillespie "yesterday told the Union Leader he could not remember who at the White House he informed of his decision to pick up Tobin's legal bills. 'I'm not going to guess,' he said. 'It was years ago, but as a matter of routine, I would have told somebody over there.' If someone at the White House had expressed displeasure with his decision, Gillespie said, 'It was too late. I had made the decision and they were not involved in it.'"

Kentucky High Court Rules Fletcher's Pardon Valid. The AP (5/19, Alford) reports, "The Kentucky Supreme Court on Thursday invalidated a string of indictments charging members of Gov. Ernie Fletcher's administration with rewarding political supporters with state jobs, leaving only the misdemeanor counts against the governor himself. Fletcher had pardoned his entire administration -- other than himself -- for any charges that could result from a probe into allegations of hiring misconduct. The state's high court said Thursday that Fletcher had the authority to issue the blanket pardon, something prosecutors had questioned. 'A gubernatorial pardon operates to cease any further legal proceeding concerning the pardon conduct including indictments,' Justice Martin Johnstone wrote in the court's 4-2 opinion. A special grand jury indicted Fletcher last week on misdemeanor charges of criminal conspiracy, official misconduct and violating a prohibition against political discrimination. It was among 29 indictments issued in the case -- 14 of which remain sealed by the court."

Former CDC Director Pleads Guilty On Padded Expense Accounts. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (5/19, Torpy) reports that Donna Stroup, former director of the Coordinating Center for Health Promotion for the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, "pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to a charge of theft of government funds for padding her travel expense accounts by an estimated $7,500."

Shootings Culminated Teen's Descent Into Madness. A front page story in the Washington Post (5/19, A1, Duggan) reports that friends of Michael W. Kennedy, who killed two police officers outside a Fairfax County police station last week, say the 18 year old "longed to have his mental health back, saying he felt tortured by strange delusions and might kill himself to find peace." The shootings "marked the end of a half-year descent from normalcy to homicidal madness. His decline began suddenly in the fall, they said, with the unexplained onset of chronic severe headaches and bouts of sleeplessness."

Deputy US Marshal Killed In Gun Battle With Police. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (5/19, Conley) reports, "A deputy U.S. marshal was shot numerous times by Memphis police before dying in an exchange of gunfire, a Shelby County Medical Examiner's report revealed Thursday. Mary Fisher, 46, died Sunday morning after she began shooting at two police officers in the driveway of her Cordova home at 1143 Palmina Cove." The Appeal adds, "The circumstances that sparked the shooting remain a mystery, and Shelby County Sheriff's deputies hope toxicology tests will help."

Homeland Security Officer Facing Murder Charge. The AP (5/18) reported, "A Department of Homeland Security officer faces a murder charge in connection with a shooting outside his apartment after authorities dismissed a lesser charge as his trial was about to begin. Douglas William Bates, 44, had been scheduled to go to trial Wednesday on a voluntary manslaughter charge, which carried a possible 11-year sentence. He now faces a sentence of 40 years to life on a second-degree murder charge with a gun enhancement, authorities said." Bates, who worked at Los Angeles International Airport, "is accused of firing his gun outside his apartment at 20-year-old Bassim Chmait after a dispute with Chmait and his friends in February of 2005."

Judge Won't Fast Track Duke Rape Case. The AP (5/19) reports that while one of the three Duke University lacrosse players charged with rape wants the case resolved in time for the next school year, Superior Court Judge Ronald L. Stephens said he will not fast track the proceedings. After the hearing, District Attorney Mike Nifong "said that he intends to try all three players together and that he does not expect any trial to begin before next year. [Reade] Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., and Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., were indicted last month on charges of raping a woman who had been hired to strip at a team party in March. A third player, co-captain David Evans, was indicted on Monday."

Fugitive Millionaire Hinckley Turns Himself In. The Des Moines Register (5/19) reports, "One of Iowa's most-wanted federal fugitives, a suspected millionaire swindler who disappeared nearly two years ago, has surrendered to federal marshals in Laredo, Texas, with only $40, a Mexican calling card and a pack of cigarettes. Federal authorities say Scott William Hinckley Sr., 57, surrendered to U.S. Marshals at the Mexican border on Sunday. Hinckley had been missing for nearly two years since he bolted from his Des Moines apartment with 33 months of probation left."

The AP (5/18, Beltran) reports, "Scott Hinckley served 47 months in prison for stealing an estimated $5.5 million from 330 investors in his Iowa and Missouri Rural Investment companies. He was released in March 2004 but missed an appointment with his parole officer four months later and had not been seen since."

DOJ Charges Online Casino Duo On 12 Counts. TechWeb (5/18, Keizer) reports on DOJ's announcement of a "dozen money-laundering charges against the fugitive owners of an online gambling Web site who walked away with a quarter of a billion dollars." William Scott and Jessica Davis "laundered some $250 million raked in by their Internet betting site, which they sold in 2003 to an Australian company, Betcorp."

Kansas Man Charges As "Kingpin" Of Fraud Scheme. KMBC-TV Kansas City (5/18, Flink) reports on its website that F. Jeffrey Miller, operator of Miller Enterprises and Star Land Development, is charged with "60 counts, including conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering" connected to "a $25 million fraud scheme." Prosecutors say he was the "kingpin of an operation that included loan officers who forged signatures, appraisers who inflated values, realtors and developers -- all allegedly designed to con banks and down-and-out home buyers out of millions of dollars."

The Kansas City Business Journal (5/19) reports Miller "is charged with one count of conspiracy, 53 counts of bank fraud and five counts of money laundering. Miller also faces one count of criminal forfeiture, in which the government seeks forfeiture of proceeds traceable to the alleged crimes, including $25 million, a residence in Stilwell, Kan., and an airplane."

Former North Carolina Lottery Commissioner Indicted For Fraud. The AP (5/18, Robertson) reports that a federal grand jury has indicted former North Carolina state lottery commissioner Kevin Geddings on fraud charges yesterday, saying he failed to disclose his work for a leading supplier of scratch-off lottery tickets. Geddings "was indicted on multiple counts of mail and wire fraud. If found guilty, he could face up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each charge, said U.S. Attorney Frank Whitney."

The Winston-Salem Journal (5/19, Ingram) reports, "The release said that the indictment 'is part of an ongoing investigation' by federal and state authorities. It did not elaborate, but several lobbyists and state officials have appeared at the federal courthouse in Raleigh on days when the grand jury was expected to meet."

Two Elderly Women Investigated For Insurance Fraud. The AP (5/18, Nguyen) reports, "Two women in their 70s were arrested Thursday for investigation of insurance fraud after they collected more than $2 million in benefits from policies issued on the lives of homeless men who were killed in hit-and-run crashes, authorities said. Police believe the women may have committed the fatal accidents and were befriending other men to set up more insurance policies. … Helen Golay, 75, and Olga Rutterschmidt, 72, allegedly paid for the men to stay in apartments for as long as two years, police said. In exchange, they obtained the victims' signatures and opened more than a dozen life insurance policies that named the women as beneficiaries. In the November 1999 and June 2005 hit-and-runs, both victims were struck in street alleys in the early morning hours and no witnesses were found, police said. In both cases, Golay and Rutterschmidt came forward claiming to be relatives or fiancees of the men."

Missing Couple Found. The Charlotte (FL) Sun-Herald (5/19) reports that police near Nashville, Tenn. Detained Shannon Gordon and Nathan Myers, who were "reported missing and endangered" by "a family member for Myers," who said they were "missing for a week" and that "family members had received anonymous calls saying Gordon had been beaten up and Myers had been killed."

New Jersey University's Records Subpoenaed. The New York Times (5/19, Smothers) reports, "Federal prosecutors subpoenaed a wide range of documents on Thursday from the southern campus of the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey as part of their investigation into allegations of corruption and patronage at the institution, a lawyer for the university said. The action came one day after F.B.I. agents raided the state university's 366-student Stratford campus to stop the shredding of documents in the office of Warren S. Wallace, the senior associate dean for academic and student affairs at the School of Osteopathic Medicine."

Tax Fraud Nets Eight Years In Jail. The Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal (5/19) reports, "David Carroll Stephenson of Tacoma was sentenced to eight years in jail" and "ordered to pay $8.5 million in restitution to the IRS" after his conviction on "conspiring to defraud the United States and for not filing income tax returns for three years." He "formed and operated 'pure equity trusts,' where he told his clients to place their money so they could avoid paying income taxes." John Imhoff Jr., acting IRS chief, criminal investigation, released a statement that said the case, "should serve as a warning that taxpayers should be wary of tax planning arrangements that claim to drastically reduce or eliminate their tax liability while still allowing them unlimited access to their money."

Ex-Old Mutual Manager Makes Guilty Plea On Fraud Charges. The Baltimore Business Journal (5/19) reports that Bryn D. Phillips, a former treasury operations manager at Old Mutual Financial Network, "pleaded guilty to" one count of bank fraud and one count of mail fraud" alleging "she defrauded Old Mutual and banks of more than $850,000." She took the money "by falsely representing to Wachovia Bank that she had authority to transfer money from Old Mutual bank accounts into accounts that she controlled."

California Panel Calls For Recording Of Police Interrogations. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Hong) reports the California Commission on the Fair Administration of Justice "called for police to tape interrogations of crime suspects in serious felonies and to videotape homicide interrogations. The proposal is meant to prevent wrongful convictions." The panel "called on the Legislature to mandate the taping through a new statute. Under the law, if interrogations are not recorded, jurors would be instructed to view confessions with caution."

CIVIL LAW:

Povich Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Sexual Harassment Case. The AP (5/18) reports, "Lawyers for television talk-show host Maury Povich have asked a court to dismiss a $100 million sex harassment lawsuit against him and members of his staff and to compel the producer who filed it to arbitrate the dispute. Bianca Nardi, 28, of Fort Lee, N.J., complained in a lawsuit filed last month that some of her supervisors at The Maury Povich Show barraged her with sexual remarks and made her watch pornographic movies, wear revealing clothing and expose her body. … The lawsuit names Povich, NBC Universal Television Inc. and Povich's production company, Mopo, among others, as defendants."

Amazon.com Online Order Patent To Face Review. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, B2, Clark) reports, "The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has agreed to re-examine Amazon.com Inc.'s high-profile patent on 'one-click' online shopping, after" Peter Calveley, an actor from New Zealand, "claimed there were possible prior inventions in the field." An agency examiner ruled that the re-examination "raised a 'substantial new question of patentability' affecting Amazon's patent."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Supreme Court Finds No Misconduct By Late Judge. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Dolan) reports the California Supreme Court "rejected claims that a judge advised a prosecutor to remove prospective jurors from a death penalty trial because they were Jewish. The justices found insufficient evidence of misconduct by Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde, who died in 1998. A misconduct finding could have led the courts to overturn dozens of death sentences." The court "also discounted claims that the Alameda County district attorney had a policy of barring not only Jews but also African American women from death penalty juries. A former Alameda County prosecutor had alleged that Golde, who was Jewish, had advised removing Jewish jurors because of their perceived aversion to the death penalty."

Judge Rejects Tennessee Senator's Claim Of Racial Bias In FBI Probe. The Memphis Commercial-Appeal (5/19, Buser) reports US District Judge Jon McCalla yesterday "rejected former state senator Roscoe Dixon's claims of unfair selective prosecution and refused to delay his upcoming Tennessee Waltz public corruption trial. … McCalla said federal prosecutors have 'broad discretion' to enforce federal laws within boundaries set by the constitution. He said that Dixon's claim of race-based prosecution in the FBI sting operation is not supported by any evidence that there are non-black individuals who could have been prosecuted for similar offenses but were not." The AP (5/19, Baird) adds that "McCalla rejected a petition to dismiss the bribery and extortion charges…or to delay his trial set for May 30. In that petition, Dixon claimed he is the victim of selective prosecution because he is black. … Dixon also sought more access to government files to search for evidence of racial bias and for a trial delay until October. McCalla rejected those requests, too."

West Virginia To Seek Compensation For Election Systems Costs. The AP (5/18) reports that West Virginia "Secretary of State Betty Ireland is asking county clerks to submit detailed information about how much voting machine snafus cost them," which will "be used to seek compensation from Election Systems & Software." The day after the primary, "Ireland complained to federal officials…

blaming the voting machine vendor for 'vast delays' and 'broken promises.'"

Charges Dropped Against Mother In Mall Incident. The Columbia (MO) Tribune (5/18, Agnew) reports, "Charges have been dropped against a Columbia mother who was wrestled to the floor and handcuffed by Columbia police officers trying to contain a disturbance at the Columbia Mall. The incident was one of several involving Columbia police and black residents described last month to a U.S. Department of Justice official during a meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Columbia attorney David Tyson Smith said his client, Alva Scott, who is black, was simply trying to protect her children and leave the mall when officers prevented her from returning to her children, ages 2 and 8. Scott was eventually arrested and charged with trespassing, assaulting a police officer and resisting arrest."

GOP Constituents' Letters Seeking Probe Of NAACP Were Forwarded To IRS. The AP (5/19) reports that several Congressional Republicans "forwarded constituents' letters to the" IRS "claiming the NAACP had veered into political advocacy, a potential violation of the civil rights group's tax-exempt status, according to documents released by the NAACP." The IRS began scrutinizing the NAACP "about a month before the 2004 presidential election after a speech by NAACP Chairman Julian Bond that was largely critical of President Bush's policies. Political campaigning is prohibited under the NAACP's tax-exempt status. The IRS said its inquiry would focus on whether Bond's speech was too political." The NAACP "received more than 500 pages of documents the IRS has gathered to begin its inquiry and posted them on its Web site. … The documents include letters that members of Congress sent to the IRS on behalf of their constituents. The lawmakers include Sens. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee and Susan M. Collins of Maine, Rep. Jo Ann Davis of Virginia, the late Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and former Reps. Larry Combest of Texas and Joe Scarborough of Florida. All are Republicans. Spokespeople for those members of Congress still in office said they simply forwarded the concerns of their constituents, as they would for any constituent, and took no position on the issue."

Southern Lawmakers Block Voting Rights Act Renewal. The Dallas Morning News (5/19, Gillman) reports, "A revolt by Texas Republicans and other Southern lawmakers is threatening the Voting Rights Act, the landmark civil-rights law enacted to overcome the legacy of poll taxes and literacy tests. House leaders planned a routine vote this week to extend the LBJ-era law for 25 years, avoiding a potentially ugly eruption of racial politics. But a Georgia-Texas coalition of conservatives slammed on the brakes, angry over the special regulatory burdens of the act."

Georgia DA's Office Faces Discrimination Charges. The Jonesboro (GA) News-Daily (5/19, Boron) reports, "The Clayton County District Attorney's office has been hit with a trio of discrimination claims from current and former employees, at least one of whom has named the top assistant prosecutor in the office, John Turner, for retaliation and discrimination against a minority woman. The allegations come during the first term of Jewel Scott, the county's first black district attorney. … Two victims advocates — Andrea Rhymes, who is black, and Rebecca Miller, who is Latino — allege in formal complaints they were retaliated against. Rhymes alleges it was on the basis of race and a disability. Miller alleges it was on the basis of sex and national origin."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Antitrust Division To investigation Florida Utility Contracts. The Southwest Florida News-Press (5/19, Ruane) reports that the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department will run the "federal investigation of Cape Coral utilities contracts" to "extended water, sewer and irrigation lines into portions of southwest Cape Coral." These projects are "controversial among residents," who "turned out in large numbers at City Council meetings to protest the $12,000 assessments they received to pay for" them.

Knight Vinke Drops Opposition To VNU Deal. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, C3, Singer) reports that Valcon Acquisition BV, A group of six private-equity firms, "is likely to win its €7.7 billion ($9.82 billion) takeover bid for Dutch media giant VNU NV as activist shareholder Knight Vinke Asset Management LLC, leader of a revolt against the bid, has thrown in the towel and said it will tender its shares by the Friday deadline." buyout, agreed to on friendly terms, met opposition from shareholders threatening to reject it and impose their own plan for turning around the firm," one offered by Knight Vinke. However, Valcon "raised its offer by 2.6% to €29.50 a share," and "the higher price, combined with the difficulty and time that would be needed to implement the Knight Vinke plan, led many shareholders that had been backing Mr. Knight to defect and say they would accept the offer."

Symantec Sues Microsoft Over Volume Manager Software. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, B4, Richmond) reports, "Symantec Corp. sued Microsoft Corp. on Thursday, citing misappropriation of intellectual property and breach of contract." The suit "involves Symantec's Volume Manager product, software it acquired with its purchase of Veritas Software Corp. Volume Manager allows operating systems to store and manipulate large amounts of data and protect systems from data loss when storage hardware fails. Symantec alleged that Microsoft, which had licensed the Volume Management technology from Veritas, violated terms of its license agreement by using the technology to develop competing features and products."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Says US, Mexico Developing Joint Meth Trafficking Strategy. The Washington Times (5/19, Seper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said the United States and Mexico are developing a strategy to attack large methamphetamine trafficking organizations operating on both sides of the border. Mr. Gonzales, speaking at a National Methamphetamine Chemical Initiative conference in Dallas, said the two countries had reached an agreement for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the Mexican government to establish specialized anti-meth enforcement teams." Gonzales said strong US demand for methamphetamines "is fueling its production and that the public needs to be better informed about its dangers. He said the trafficking organizations combine the 'sophistication of a contemporary corporation with the brutality of a street gang.'"

CNSNews.com (5/19) reports, "Appearing with the Mexican attorney general at a conference in Dallas, Gonzales stressed the importance of international cooperation in fighting meth production and trafficking. 'Approximately 80 percent of all meth purchases in the U.S. originate from Mexican labs,' Gonzales said. 'Accordingly, we are refocusing our investigative resources on large meth trafficking organizations. DEA enforcement teams will now concentrate on meth transportation and distribution cells in the U.S. and Mexico.'"

WFAA-TV Dallas (5/18, 5:07 p.m.) reported, "The US and Mexico are joining forces to fight the growing meth trade. Today, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Mexican counterpart announced the plan to go after traffickers. About 80% of the meth distributed here is now made south of the border. US drug enforcement agents will train about 1,000 Mexican police, Specialized teams will then focus on breaking up the most wanted meth gangs."

Gonzales Praises Grants To Fight Gangs. The AP (5/18) reports that at a news conference in Dallas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "praised federal grants intended to combat gangs, saying it is never too late to help youths. … The Dallas-Fort Worth metroplex was awarded $2.5 million in March as part a $15 million pilot program that includes equal grants to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Cleveland; Milwaukee and other cities deemed to have serious gang problems. The money will go to prevention, enforcement and rehabilitation of former gang members."

Six High-Ranking Gang Members Caught By Operation Triggertown. The Chicago Sun-Times News Group (5/18) reports, "Federal and local authorities on Thursday announced" that "a six-month investigation dubbed 'Operation Triggertown'" lead to "the arrest of six high-ranking gang members and drug traffickers:" Rashod "Fatman" Bethany, Quenten Hawkins, Shannon Evans, Charles "TuTu" Golden, Roosevelt "Jimmy Mac" Adams, and Rickey "L'il Rickey" Long. Conducted by both Chicago police's Narcotics and Gang Investigation Section and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the operation involved "undercover buys and police used a variety of electronic and technical devices that assisted the investigation."

FBI Continues Intense Search For Hoffa's Remains On Michigan Farm. FBI agents continued their search for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a Michigan horse farm yesterday, and the story garnered even heavier media coverage than on Wednesday evening TV and in yesterday's newspapers. FBI Detroit SAC Daniel Roberts held a briefing for reporters yesterday, and every print and network news story included at least one of his comments, "In the last two years, I've been here as the agent in charge, this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation," and "You can see from the amount of FBI and police department personnel out here that this is probably a fairly credible lead."

ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 9, 2:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The FBI began digging yesterday, not far from where the legendary former Teamsters union boss disappeared." ABC (Reynolds) added, "With the help of architects, anthropologists, and archaeologists, the FBI acted on what is clearly a very compelling tip." SAC Daniel Roberts: "In the last two years, I've been here as the agent in charge, this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation. … We plan to be out here for probably a couple of weeks, at least." Reynolds: "No discoveries today. And local residents remain pretty skeptical." The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 2, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported that "the FBI has a new tip that he may be buried near where he was last seen alive in Michigan." CBS (Stewart) added, "Law enforcement officials suggest it's the best lead they've had in years…and are prepared to dig here for up to two weeks to check it out." Roberts: "You can see from the amount of FBI and police department personnel out here that this is probably a fairly credible lead." Stewart: "Law enforcement officials say several months ago, a jailed informant offered detailed information that Hoffa was buried on the farm, near a large barn," and "the prisoner's information was checked several ways, officials said, including polygraph tests."

NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 5, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "When we entered this new century, there were two enduring mystery in the American life left over from the last century: the identity of Deep Throat and the location of Jimmy Hoffa. We now know the answer to the first one and it's possible we may soon know the second as a huge dig is underway tonight in a farm in suburban Michigan." NBC also shows Roberts saying, "In the last two years I've been here as the agent in charge, this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation." In a very widely-distributed story, the AP (5/19, Krisher) adds, "A law enforcement official in Washington said the latest search was based on information developed several years ago and verified more recently. Among other things, there was a high level of suspicious activity on the farm the day Hoffa vanished, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The Detroit News (5/19, Wisely) reports, "The farm once was owned by Rolland McMaster, often described at Hoffa's right-hand man in the union. McMaster was not in Michigan at the time of Hoffa's…disappearance from the Machus Red Fox restaurant, said Mayer Morganroth, McMaster's attorney. … 'They went through that place with a fine-toothed comb in 1975,' Morganroth said. 'There is nothing there. It is ridiculous.'" In a story widely-distributed by Knight Ridder, The Detroit Free Press (5/19, Ashenfelter, Swickard) adds, "The tip that Hoffa was buried on the farm came from Donovan Wells, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison two years ago in a marijuana smuggling scheme." He "is a former associate of McMaster, who was a top Detroit Teamsters official until a reputed falling-out with Hoffa in the late 1960s. ... During an interview Thursday, McMaster said that account was worthy of a drug-addled imagination," and "some old Hoffa hands were skeptical of the new tip. Retired FBI agent John Anthony said the horse farm is a new theory to him, and doubted its value: 'Even if they find something, will it be able to lead to a prosecution?'"

Under the headline "Hoffa Tip 'Fairly Credible,' FBI Says," The Washington Post (5/19, A8, Lengel, 744K) reports, "Authorities said the latest search for Hoffa is the most intensive in decades. Privately, some expressed skepticism, though they said the information is credible enough to pursue." The New York Times (5/19, Maynard, Bunkley, 1.19M) notes, "The latest search is the third in the past two years by the F.B.I. in the Detroit area. Mr. Roberts acknowledged those efforts, saying, 'We do not leave any leads uncovered, obviously.' Or any stones unturned, apparently. He said the F.B.I. might have to move a barn in order to dig for evidence of Mr. Hoffa's remains." The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Jones, 643K) adds that "the FBI, by all appearances, seems determined to exhaust this latest lead. Graduate students schooled in geology will be used to determine whether the earth has been removed and then replaced, Roberts said. If anything is found they will check for a DNA match."

WXYZ-TV Detroit, WWJ-TV Detroit, WDIV-TV Detroit and WJRT-TV Flint, among other local TV stations across Michigan, covered the FBI search yesterday. The story also was prominently reported on cable news programs last night, including CNN's American Morning, CNN's Paula Zahn Now, MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olbermann, MSNBC's Abrams Report, MSNBC's Scarborough Country, FOX News' Live PM, FOX News's Big Story with John Gibson and FOX News' Studio B with Shepard Smith.

Neighbors Say Mobsters Used To Gather At Farm, Until Hoffa Disappeared. The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 3, 0:55, Alfonsi, 7.66M) also reported from the scene, "We can actually see a fresh pile of dirt that earlier they had some police tape around. And I was talking to neighbors out here. They told me this old horse farm is a place where mobsters used to come and have lunch, an out-of-the-way spot. They say after Jimmy Hoffa disappeared, the lunches stopped and they saw a backhoe show up on the property. … There's about 50 FBI agents out here right now. We also learned that a famous forensic anthropologist from Michigan State University by the name of Norman Sauer is out here. I spoke to him on the phone, he confirms he's out here with seven students today. So, it's a little like CSI but in the country."

New Technology Expected To Aid Search. The Detroit News (5/19, Donnelly) reports that the geologists and forensic anthropologists working at the site "have at their command technology that wasn't around when the former Teamster leader disappeared 31 years ago. … If any human remains are located, modern DNA testing may be used for comparison with Hoffa's genetic code. The FBI wouldn't discuss the search in detail but a Colorado expert who heads a team of scientists that searches for bodies said today's technology will save police a lot of time. … Should searchers come across bones, forensic anthropologists from Michigan State University will quickly be able to tell whether they are human or animal," and "since the FBI is searching a horse farm, they're likely to come across many bones of horses."

FBI Investigating USAF Generals Over Thunderbirds Contract. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 4, 2:50, Vargas, 8.78M) reported that an investigation of the US Air Force Thunderbirds has "the FBI and the Pentagon inspector general reaching into the highest ranks of the military. They involve Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley, the man he replaced." ABC (Ross) added, "The FBI's investigation is focused on a $49 million contract for an audio/visual system for spectators that the Thunderbirds have said they didn't ask for, but that was pushed through at the Pentagon anyway. … Documents submitted to the Air Force and obtained by ABC News show the contract went to a company partially owned by a recently-retired four-star General, Hal Hornburg, who…had been in charge of the Thunderbirds and initially requested the improved audio/visual system." Hornburg "says he did not get involved in soliciting the contract until a year after he left the military, as provided by law. But a document obtained by ABC News from the US Trademark office shows the General was listed as co-owner of the company just six months after he retired. The general says that was an error."

Newark FBI Agents To Meet With Egyptian-American Group. The AP (5/19, Parry) reports, "In September, a group of Muslim men praying near the main air intake duct at Giants Stadium was detained by suspicious FBI agents. On Saturday, the federal agency and an Egyptian-American group plan to meet at the stadium in the latest FBI push to recruit Arab-Americans and repair relations strained in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks. 'It's an effort to build bridges with this community,' said Les Wiser Jr., special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark bureau, who has made improving ties with New Jersey's Muslim community a priority. 'We think it's important for them to get to know us. We're fighting perceptions we think are skewed against us.'" Egyptian American Group member Suzanne Loutfy noted, "We were afraid of them, and they were suspicious of us. It was thought by many people that the FBI is the enemy. That's the perception we're fighting against."

Detective Testifies NYPD Recruited Him As "Walking Camera" Among Muslims. The New York Times (5/19, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "A young police detective testified yesterday at the Herald Square bombing plot trial that he was recruited from the Police Academy 13 months after 9/11 to work deep undercover in the Muslim community to investigate Islamic extremists." The Bangladeshi immigrant, identified only by his alias, Kamil Pasha, "took an apartment in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, where, he testified, his assignment was to be a 'walking camera' among Muslims there." Over two years, "he was involved in 'numerous' investigations, he testified, and was at times shadowed by a field team to ensure his safety." The Times notes, "His testimony confirmed what many Muslims have believed since the Sept. 11 attacks: that law enforcement agencies have worked to infiltrate their community during terrorism investigations. … He said he was told 'never to push for information,' but instead to 'take a back seat' and 'observe, be the ears and eyes.'" The AP (5/19, Hays) adds, "One place he hung out was an Islamic bookstore near a Brooklyn mosque, where he said he heard" Shahawar Matin Siraj "openly praise Osama bin Laden while damning the U.S."

Grand Jury Doesn't Indict In Police Attacker's Death. The Baton Rouge Advocate (5/19, Angelette) reports, "A grand jury Thursday decided against charging anyone in the death of motorist George Temple II," who was "shot and killed by" Perry Stephens, a civilian Stephens "came to help the officer" after Temple fought the officer when he was arrested. "The U.S. Justice Department is still investigating the case."

New York Measure Would Require DNA Samples For All Convicts. The Christian Science Monitor (5/19, Scherer) reports that under a proposal being considered by state lawmakers, New York "would be the first state in the nation to require DNA samples for all convicted offenders. Gov. George Pataki (R), who is asking the Legislature to expand DNA collection, argues that a larger database will help solve more crimes. Supporters add it will help solve future crimes because criminals who start off committing petty crimes sometimes graduate to more serious offenses." The New York proposal would require "DNA collection for all convicted of misdemeanors. This would add about 80,000 additional DNA profiles per year to the DNA bank, say researchers at the state's Division of Criminal Justice."

States Seek To Bar Marketing Of "Little Cigars." The Washington Post (5/19, D1, Day) reports, "Forty states have asked the U.S. Treasury Department to bar tobacco companies from marketing products they say are identical to cigarettes as 'little cigars,' a designation the states say lets the firms evade taxes and target younger consumers. Attorneys general from the 40 states, including Maryland, want the department's Alcohol and Tobacco Tax and Trade Bureau to reverse decades-old rules that permit products the size, shape and weight of cigarettes, but have brown rather than white wrappers, to be labeled as little cigars. … The 'little cigar' label allows the companies to pay lower federal and state taxes, and to avoid payments and advertising restrictions required for cigarettes under the 1998 master agreement between tobacco companies and all 50 states, according to the petition for rule changes."

Chicago FBI Informant Slain During Weapons Sting. The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Rybarczyk, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "An FBI-orchestrated weapons buy in a Dolton parking lot went awry late Wednesday, leading to the fatal shooting of an informant who was wearing a wire and being watched by surveillance teams, officials said. … FBI agents watched as the man meeting" informant Timothy Forrest "exited his vehicle and got into Forrest's car. They did not suspect anything amiss until the man hurried away and drove off, officials said. The suspect's name was known to investigators, who captured him more than 10 hours later at a house in Alsip. He was being held for questioning Thursday night." The Tribune notes, "FBI Special Agent Tom Simon said every safety precaution was taken as the weapons buy was set up, but events like this happen 'once every blue moon.' … FBI spokesman Frank Bochte confirmed that Forrest was wearing a wire but said the gunshots were inaudible to those listening." The Chicago Sun-Times (5/19, Main) notes, "The FBI's Evidence Response Team was helping Dolton police process the murder scene, officials said. In 2003, an FBI informant committed suicide while wearing a hidden recording device outside the police station in south suburban Chicago Heights. Otis Moore, 43, died of a bullet wound to the mouth, the medical examiner's office said. … He was key to a federal corruption investigation that led to the 1995 racketeering conviction of Sam Mangialardi, Chicago Heights' deputy police chief."

WMAQ-TV Chicago (5/18, Rogers), WBBM-TV Chicago (5/18, Hartman) and WLS-TV Chicago (5/18, Bradley) also reported on the informant's murder and noting Moore's 2003 suicide.

Reporting On Operation Twin Oceans Continues. The UK's Guardian (5/19) reports, "By the end of the operation, more than 100 people in nine different countries had been taken into custody, including one of the big cheeses in the cocaine trade, the Colombian-born Pablo Rayo-Montano, known as El Tio (the uncle) who was captured in Brazil. The prime catch, as far as the DEA officials and their colleagues in Brazil were concerned, was Rayo-Montano, who had been on the run for 10 years."

The UK's Telegraph (5/19) writes, "Colombia's biggest drug baron has been captured in Brazil in a raid that stretched from Indianapolis to the Pacific Coast of Panama and involved police forces in nine different countries. 'Don Pablo' Rayo-Montano, 46, successor to the late Pablo Escobar, had been on the run for a decade before he was caught by American drug enforcement agents at his hideout in Sao Paulo. Thirty-six of his henchmen were apprehended in simultaneous raids in Miami, Indianapolis and Los Angeles."

Australia's Daily Telegraph (5/19) notes Rayo-Montano's arrest, saying it toppled an empire that "used submarines to put 15 tons of cocaine a month into the U.S. and Europe." On its Web site, Australia's Melbourne Herald Sun (5/19) posts a similar but longer story attributed to the AP.

More Than 400 Arrested In Seattle Drug Investigation. The Seattle Times (5/18) reports DEA Special Agent in Charge Rodney Benson and others yesterday announced the arrests of 403 people, including 14 juveniles, since mid-September. "Of those arrested, 239 had prior drug arrests, and of those, 39 had been arrested 10 or more times for drug violations, 86 were considered violent drug offenders, and 46 had been previously charged for weapons violations. At least 25 of the arrestees admitted they were members of gangs," according to Benson.

Public Defender Criticizes Operation. The Seattle Post Intelligencer (5/19) reports, "While police were proud of the joint effort and community members pleased to see drug dealers get arrested, there were critics of the operation. 'What the Seattle Police Department, as well as the DEA, is interested in doing is the same old failed policies toward drug enforcement,' said Sunil Abraham, a local public defender. Abraham and his colleagues argue that 'buy-bust' operations, by focusing on street dealers, unfairly target minorities and the poor -- ignoring drug sales in other neighborhoods or behind closed doors."

Indiana Woman Faces Drug, Money Laundering Charges Following Sting. The Indianapolis Star (5/18) reports, "A 32-year-old Plainfield woman was among those arrested in a multination drug sting this week. Monica Patricia Ruiz-Matorel faces four counts: importation of drugs, conspiracy to distribute, smuggling and money laundering. The money-laundering component of the charges involves about $150 million in assets, said Steve Robertson, a special agent with the Drug Enforcement Agency at its Washington headquarters."

Sentencing Delayed In Rhode Island For Accused Mob Associate. The Providence (RI) Journal (5/19, Stanton) reports the case of Alan Blamires, "the mob associate caught guarding a shipment of cocaine in an undercover FBI sting, encountered another detour yesterday. … Some confusion over the value of cooperation that Blamires…has provided the authorities prompted Chief U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres, reluctantly, to postpone the sentencing." The Journal reports Blamires has claimed to have "pertinent information" regarding lawyer Joseph Bevilacqua, who also has been a target of an investigation by the DEA.

DEA Agents' Work In "Operation Royal Flush" Recognized In Rhode Island. The Providence (RI) Journal (5/19, Smith) reports on Operation Royal Flush in which "a slew of federal and state law enforcement agencies cooperated in 2003-2004, and the Providence police made the largest single seizure of cocaine in department history in 2004: Nearly 23 kilos worth an estimated $575,000, which had been stashed in a minivan." In connection with the case, the Journal says the work of three members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration was noted. They include special agents Anthony Cardello and Kathleen Kelleher and intelligence analyst Andrea Metz.

Accused Pennsylvania Cocaine Trafficker Is Arrested. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/19, Ward) reports a man who federal authorities "say has been selling large amounts of cocaine for years in New Castle was arrested this week. Dion Mercer, 37, has been charged with one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 50 grams of crack. According to a six-page affidavit filed by a Drug Enforcement Administration agent, Mr. Mercer has been selling large quantities of cocaine for four years."

Supreme Court Seen As Deeply Divided On Detroit Drug-Search Case. According to The New York Times (5/19, Greenhouse), a second hearing on a Detroit drug-search case has shown "deep divisions" among U.S. Supreme Court justices. For example, the Times says Justice Breyer "proceeded to make it clear that he remained unpersuaded by [the] argument that the Michigan Court of Appeals was correct in refusing to exclude from Booker T. Hudson's trial the drugs the police found when they executed a search warrant by bursting into his home without knocking or waiting for him to open the apparently unlocked door. … Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. also appeared firmly in the state's camp. He asked…what difference it would have made had the police waited 15 or 20 seconds instead of 3 or 4 after announcing their presence." Hudson had been found guilty of drug possession and was given18 months' probation.

Alito Expected To Be Deciding Vote On Detroit Fourth Amendment Case. The New York Times (5/19, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports it "did not take very long during the Supreme Court's final argument of its term on Thursday to see why the court had decided to schedule a second hearing in this less-than-monumental case about a search for illegal drugs in a Detroit home. The justices were deeply engaged, and deeply split." It is "a logical inference that they were deadlocked at 4 to 4 after the first argument on Jan. 9, and that it is now up to Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who took his seat later that month, to break the tie." Justice Stephen Breyer made "it clear that he remained unpersuaded" by Wayne County prosecutor Timothy A. Baughman's "argument that the Michigan Court of Appeals was correct in refusing to exclude from Booker T. Hudson's trial the drugs the police found when they executed a search warrant by bursting into his home without knocking or waiting for him to open the apparently unlocked door." This "means of entry violated the 'knock and announce' rule that modern Supreme Court precedents have made part of the current understanding of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable search and seizure. There was no dispute that the Detroit officers' action violated the rule. The question for the justices was what consequences should flow from the violation."

The Washington Post (5/19, A11, Lane, 744K) reports the court "heard a rare mid-May oral argument yesterday, on the authority of police to search private homes without knocking first -- in a major privacy-rights case likely to be decided by the vote of the court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr." Liberals on the court "openly worried that Michigan's approach would carry the day -- effectively gutting the 'knock and announce' rule and, potentially, other restrictions on police searches." Michigan "does not dispute that the officers technically violated the 'knock and announce' rule. It argues, rather, that since they had a warrant, their presence in the house was legal even if the way they got inside was not."

IMMIGRATION:

Many Immigrant Smugglers Are Never Prosecuted. The AP (5/19, Spagat) reports that an internal Border Patrol document shows that the vast majority of people caught smuggling immigrants into the US across the border near San Diego are never prosecuted for the offense. According to the AP, "The report offers a stark assessment of the situation at a Border Patrol station responsible for guarding 13 miles of mountainous border east of the city. Federal officials say it reflects a reality along the entire 2,000-mile border: Judges and federal attorneys are so swamped that only the most egregious smuggling cases are prosecuted."

Additional Suspected Illegal Immigrants Caught In Kentucky. the Cincinnati Enquirer (5/19, Hannah) reports, "U.S. Marshals have detained more suspected illegal aliens as part of an ongoing investigation into the use of laborers in Northern Kentucky's home-building industry." Fort Mitchell police Chief Steve Hensley said "officers found the suspected illegal aliens while helping federal agents serve a search warrant at one of the apartments" in the 2500 block of Kirkland Court. "Last week, 76 suspected illegal aliens were arrested as part of the two-year investigation."

Bush Declares Support For Border Fence In Visit To Yuma, Arizona. President Bush yesterday visited Yuma, Arizona, yesterday, to highlight his immigration reform proposals. Much of the reporting from national papers this morning notes the President stated his backing for building some fences along parts of the US-Mexico border. While in Yuma, says the New York Times (5/19, Bumiller, 1.19M), the President "declared that he supported fencing some but not all of America's 1,950-mile border with Mexico." Bush said in his speech, "It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job." Bush, adds the Times, "has in the past indicated he is opposed to fencing, and White House officials were kept busy on Thursday trying to explain the change in his position. Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One that the White House supported a Senate amendment, passed on Wednesday, that would build 370 miles of fence in areas most often used by smugglers and illegal workers. 'We don't think you fence off the entire border,' Mr. Snow said. But, he added, 'there are places when fences are appropriate.'" The AP (5/19, Loven) reports on the fence issue, and says that "eager to win over conservative opponents, the president has been talking increasingly tough."

The Washington Times (5/19, Dinan, 90K) reports "the Bush administration announced yesterday it supported the Senate amendment calling for 370 miles of fence along the US-Mexico border, marking the first time it is has endorsed a specific amount of fencing." During his speech, says the Times, Bush said, "It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Kronholz, Lueck, Dreazen, 2.11M) adds that "almost no one disagrees with Mr. Bush that the border needs reinforcing," and the President "made a further bow to his conservative base by supporting a Senate call to build a fence along more than 300 miles of the 1,951-mile border." The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Gerstenzang, 958K) notes, "As Bush headed to Yuma Thursday morning, the White House sent to Congress a revision in its $92-billion request for emergency spending, most of it to cover costs associated with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. Within that amount, it is seeking $1.95 billion to meet the costs of deploying 1,000 new Border Patrol agents, and for fences, lights, and some of the border work of the National Guard." Snow "said the Border Patrol's Yuma sector was 'emblematic of what we're talking about in terms of border security.'" He also told reporters aboard Air Force One, "We've got an area with the fence; we've got Border Patrol there. But also this is an area where National Guardsmen are involved in non-law-enforcement roles."

The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Silva, 643K) reports Bush "has assumed a potentially perilous political role, with his own public approval ratings already at all-time lows." He "is attempting to mediate between the conservative base of the GOP, which has no patience for the president's talk of enabling millions of undocumented immigrants already living in the United States to eventually seek citizenship, and a fast-growing and traditionally Democratic-voting Hispanic population." The President "has worked hard to woo Hispanics since his days as Texas governor." USA Today (5/19, Jackson, 2.31M) notes, "The flight aboard Air Force One underscored GOP differences. Bush's guests included Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., who wants a law enforcement bill only." Hayworth "said he and Bush have profound disagreements.' 'I don't believe the House will accede to his wishes on a "guest worker" program, despite his recent protestations to the contrary,' Hayworth said."

Chertoff Emphasizes Surveillance Role For National Guard. DHS Secretary Chertoff traveled to El Paso yesterday where he discussed the administration's immigration strategy, while President Bush visited Yuma, Arizona. Most regional papers covering Chertoff's visit are focusing on his statements that the National Guard would not engage in law enforcement while working on the US-Mexico border. The Dallas Morning News (5/19, Mittelstadt) reports, "President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff traveled to the US-Mexico border Thursday in a push to convince the public – and conservatives in Congress – that they're serious about beefing up efforts to halt illegal immigration." On his way to El Paso, Secretary Chertoff said the president's plan to put National Guard troops at the US-Mexico border "offers a 'turbocharged' boost to the strategy of taming illegal immigration with a mix of added manpower, high-tech surveillance and the guest worker program." At Fort Bliss, Chertoff told reporters the Guard will be "using their eyes and…their binoculars and all the high-tech equipment they have to identify groups of migrants that are crossing."

In an article appearing on news websites in the Southwest, the AP (5/19, Caldwell) reports Chertoff "assured border residents" that the Guard plan "was 'enhancing or scaling up' operations that have long been in place as a backup for US Border Patrol agents."

The Las Cruces Sun-News (5/19, Ramirez) reports that at Fort Bliss, where he met with "with officials of Joint Task Force North," Chertoff said "that not much will change with daily security operations along the border with Mexico, even with the addition of 6,000 National Guard troops." He "emphasized that the Guard troops would have no law enforcement authority, and would mostly be used for administrative and surveillance duties along the border."

Senate Votes To Make English "National Language." Knight Ridder (5/18, James) reports that the Senate yesterday voted to make English the national language of the US. The 63-34 vote "came after an impassioned debate in which the word 'racist' was used on the Senate floor to describe the effort. It was the first time in U.S. history that the Senate had passed such legislation. More negotiations on the final bill are expected, but if a 'national language' measure cleared both the Senate and House and was signed by President Bush, it could mean a greater emphasis on the federal government providing its services in English."

The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Muskal, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "English would be declared the 'national language' of the United States under a measure approved by the Senate today, a largely symbolic move that supporters said would promote unity and ensure assimilation by immigrants." The Senate "passed two amendments, one Democratic and one Republican. The Democratic version is more specific on protecting translation and bilingual services." The GOP-backed amendment, "which passed 63 to 34, would allow the government to continue to offer publications and services -- such as bilingual ballots -- in languages other than English." It "would require all illegal immigrants seeking to legalize their status in the United States to pass English proficiency tests and would offer guidelines to the Department of Homeland Security for a revised citizenship test."

The AP (5/19, Espo) reports Sen. Jim Inhoffe "led the attempt to declare English the national language, a campaign he said began more than a century ago. The Oklahoma Republican quoted President Theodore Roosevelt as having said that among other things, those living in the United States 'must also learn one language and that language is English.'" Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said of the amendment, "I really believe this amendment is racist. I think it's directed basically to people who speak Spanish." Sen. Ken Salazar, a Democrat, "advanced the alternative that declared English to be a 'common and unifying language.'" It "passed, 58-39, leaving the outcome of the symbolic debate uncertain." Knight Ridder (5/19, Montgomery) adds that Salazar, "one of three Hispanic senators, whose family settled in Colorado before it became a state, asserted that the Inhofe amendment threatened a return 'to the dark days of American history' when Hispanic children were punished for speaking Spanish in school, sometimes by having soap thrust in their mouths."

The New York Times (5/19, Hulse, 1.19M) calls Salazar's amendment "a weaker, less-binding alternative." The House "did not include a similar provision on English in the legislation it passed in December, but there is strong support among House Republicans for such a move." AFP (5/19) notes the House of Representatives "is considering similar legislation presented by Iowa Republican Steve King. It already has the backing of 150 representatives."

Senate Kills Amendment Blocking Temporary Workers' Eventual Citizenship. The Washington Post (5/19, A1, Weisman, VandeHei, 744K) reports by 58 to 35, the Senate "killed an amendment that would have blocked eventual citizenship for future immigrants who arrive under a temporary work permit. Democrats and Republicans agreed that the amendment would have destroyed the fragile, bipartisan coalition backing the Senate bill."

Senate Allows Immigrants To Get Social Security Earned While Illegally In US. The Washington Times (5/19, Hurt, 90K) reports, "The Senate voted yesterday to allow illegal aliens to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal employment -- even if the job was obtained through forged or stolen documents. There was a felony they were committing, and now they can't be prosecuted. That sounds like amnesty to me,' said Sen. John Ensign, the Nevada Republican who offered the amendment yesterday to strip out those provisions of the immigration reform bill." Sen. John McCain replaied, "We all know that millions of undocumented immigrants pay Social Security and Medicare taxes for years and sometimes decades while they work to contribute to our economy. … The Ensign amendment would undermine the work of these people by preventing lawfully present immigrant workers from claiming Social Security benefits that they earned before they were authorized to work in our community."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Blames Approval Numbers On War; Laughs Off Comparison To Nixon. NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 2, 3:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported President Bush yesterday "brushed off the fact that his poll ratings are now similar to Richard Nixon's when he resigned the Presidency." Gregory: "You're laughing. Why do you -- " President Bush: "I'm not laughing, I just – " Gregory: "Why do you think that is?" President Bush: "Because we're at war. And war unsettles people." Gregory: "Do you think it's possible that, like Nixon and Watergate, that the American people have rendered a final judgment of disapproval on you and your war in Iraq?" President Bush: "Of course not. The enemy's got a powerful tool -- that is to get on your TV screen by killing innocent people -- and my job is to continue to remind the people it's worth it. We're not going to retreat hastily." Gregory: "What's the momentum changer in your mind for your Presidency to turn it around?" President Bush: "You know, I guess, Iraq. I mean, that's what colors everybody's vision it seems like."

Bush was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/18) whether Americans have lost faith in the Iraq mission. Bush said, "No question, Iraq has unsettled the American people. I understand that. You know, people don't like war. And war -- this war is as brutal as other wars because we face an enemy that will kill, you know, innocent people in order to achieve an objective. And, you know, I'm also -- I don't believe Americans want us to cut and run either. I think they want us to succeed. And what Americans will see is a new government, a unity government emerging. What they saw last December, and admittedly, it seems like an eternity ago, were 12 million people saying, 'We want to live in a free society.'" Asked when US troops can be expected to leave Iraq, Bush said, "When the commanders on the ground say that the Iraqis are more prepared to take over more of the security needs. This -- the temptation, of course, is to do things for political purposes in America. I don't want to fight a war based upon politics or polls or focus groups. I want to win this war based upon a strategy that's working but also based upon -- and the military decisions being based upon the advice of General Casey, who's the leader on the ground."

Gillespie Blames Slide In GOP Poll Numbers On Gasoline Prices. Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18) about Republicans' drop in the polls. Gillespie said, "I think that has something to do with gas prices that have gone over $3 per gallon but Republicans have the policies to correct that. The fact is it's Republicans who put forward ideas to increase our domestic production so we reduce our reliance on foreign source of oil. The president has put forward a very vigorous program for alternative fuel sources, drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve, which can be done while protecting the environment but increasing our domestic capacity, so that's one factor. I think as we get closer to the election, you're going to see these choices of policies between Democrats and Republicans turn those numbers around and you'll see the Republicans close that gap pretty quickly."

Shays Says Katrina Response Hurt Bush. Rep. Chris Shays said on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18), "Let me just say that I think the thing that has hurt the president most is not Iraq. It's Katrina. People saw an arrogant but confident administration but when they saw Katrina they saw arrogance and frankly incompetence and that was very unsettling."

Blackburn Says Bush Should Show "Decisive Leadership." Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18), "think that what we had to admit is that there has been a problem with perceived leadership. And what the American people are wanting to see right now is strong, decisive leadership. The American people I think and the people in my district they agree with President Bush when it comes to the war on terror. They agree with President Bush on what he has done on the economy and on taxes and on jobs growth. They disagree with him on immigration. They disagree with him when it comes to government spending and what they want to do is see him take that strong, decisive leadership role back. That is how they like him best when he is being true to his roots and when he is showing that decisive leadership."

Snow Said To Have Quickly Learned "Art Of Saying Nothing." The Washington Post (5/19, A19, 744K) reports in a "Verbatim" column that after the Bush Administration "was accused of secretly aiding militias in Somalia, new White House spokesman Tony Snow demonstrated on Wednesday that he had quickly learned the art of saying nothing." The Post quotes Snow from the briefing, in which he gave an approximately 280 word reply to a question on Somalia, after which the reporter asked, "What are you really saying?" Snow replied, "Every word will be in the transcript, every single one."

House Passes Budget Blueprint. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Rogers, 2.11M) reports House Republicans "won approval of their long-delayed budget blueprint for the new fiscal year that begins Oct.1. The 218-210 budget vote, which followed a late-night debate spilling into early yesterday morning, ended weeks of frustration for party leaders who had twice pulled back in the final hours for fear of losing." Democrats "were united in opposition, but just 12 Republicans broke ranks after moderates won promises that at least $7.1 billion would be added back to President Bush's budget for core job-training, health and education programs." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (5/19, Fagan, 90K) reports House "conservatives say they scored key spending reform victories in the $2.7 trillion budget approved early yesterday, but major changes are needed to achieve the fiscal discipline promised when Republicans took over the chamber more than a decade ago. 'The budget, while not visionary, was an important first step,' said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC)."

But the New York Times (5/19, Hulse, 1.19M), which titles its story "Future Is Cloudy For House GOP Budget Bill," calls the Republican win "more symbolic than substantive."

Lawmakers "doubt the House blueprint will ever be reconciled with a larger Senate budget. "

Specter, Feingold Clash As Senate Panel Approves Gay Marriage Amendment. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 3, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Another divisive issue resurfaced on Capitol Hill today. A Senate Committee voting along party lines approved a constitutional amendment stating that marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. The full Senate is expected to debate the ban on same-sex marriage in two weeks. It is not expected to get the approval of two-thirds of the senate, which is necessary to pass a constitutional amendment." The Washington Times (5/19, Hurt, 90K) also says that "even backers of the amendment say it's not likely to go far this year beyond becoming a hot-button political issue in the November elections." The Washington Post/AP (5/19, A3) notes Democrats "complained that bringing up the amendment is a political move designed to appeal to the GOP's conservative base in a midterm-election year."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/18, Blitzer) reported "one Democrat walked out of the session that was held in a private chamber just off the Senate floor." Sen. Russ Feingold "complained to Chairman Arlen Specter that the meeting wasn't sufficiently open to the public. We're told that led to this exchange. Specter told Feingold, 'I don't need to be lectured by you. You are no more of a protector of the Constitution than am I. If you want to leave, good riddance.' Feingold then responded, 'I've enjoyed your lecture, too, Mr. Chairman. See you.'"

USA Today (5/19, 2.31M) notes the amendment says, "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman." Specter "said he opposes the measure but wants it debated."

House Votes Against Lifting Offshore Drilling Ban. The AP (5/19, Hebert) reports, "The House rejected an attempt late Thursday to end a quarter-century ban on oil and natural gas drilling in 85 percent of the country's coastal waters despite arguments that the new supplies are needed to lower energy costs." Lawmakers from Florida and California "led the fight to maintain the long-standing drilling moratorium, contending that energy development as close as three miles from shore would jeopardize multibillion-dollar tourism industries." A measure, offered by Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida and Rep. Lois Capps of California "to continue the prohibition on drilling for natural gas -- which some lawmakers argued was less of an environmental threat than oil -- was approved 217-203 and inserted into a $25.9 billion Interior Department spending bill." Earlier, the House, by a 279-141 vote, "rejected an attempt by Rep. Ted Poe…to lift the long-standing moratorium as it applies to oil drilling." The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Simon, 958K) runs a similar report.

Measure Would Pressure Oil Firms To Renegotiate Drilling Leases. The New York Times (5/19, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "In an attempt to revoke billions of dollars worth of government incentives to oil and gas producers, the House on Thursday approved a measure that would pressure companies to renegotiate more than 1,000 leases for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico." The measure, "approved 252 to 165 over the objections of many Republican leaders, is intended to prevent companies from avoiding at least $7 billion in payments to the government over the next five years for oil and gas they produce in publicly owned waters."

Auto Companies Push Lawmakers On Alternative Fuel Measures. During a visit to Capitol Hill Thursday, the chief executives of the nation's "Big Three" auto makers, the Wall Street Journal (5/19, A5, Meckler, 2.11M) reports, "made clear to Congress what they want—and what they think they might get—from the government: financing for the pumps and other support needed to encourage Americans to use more ethanol and other gasoline alternatives." In exchange, the heads of Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler division "promised to produce millions more vehicles that can run on domestically produced alternatives to petroleum." However, the executives "didn't push for any particular piece of legislation." Rather, they said there were a lot of good ideas on the table. USA Today/AP (5/19, Thomas) says the executives "endorsed a plan to have renewable fuels meet 25% of the nation's transportation energy needs by 2025."

Noting that US automakers have "had difficulty getting their message across in Washington in the past year," the Washington Post (5/19, D2, Freeman, 744K) called the meeting "an uncharacteristic display of unity to build support for ethanol fuel and to rally legislators behind the financially strapped industry." The Post also said the automakers, which had been scheduled to meet with President Bush this week but was postponed the gathering until June 2, "said yesterday that the June 2 meeting has also been postponed."

Commerce Secretary Dismisses Concerns About Inflation. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez in an interview during a breakfast meeting with the Christian Science Monitor (5/19, 61K) was asked about concerns that "rising inflation" was a threat to "the US economy." Gutierrez said, "Everything suggests that we should be able to get through this period without seeing inflation increase to a point where it would become a problem."

Stocks Continue Slide. The New York Times/AP (5/19) reports, "Wall Street extended its losses yesterday, a day after an inflation scare sent the Dow Jones industrial average on its biggest one-day drop in three years and put the Nasdaq composite index in the red for 2006." The Dow "dropped 77.32 points, or 0.69 percent, to 11,128.29. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 8.51 points, or 0.67 percent, to 1,261.81, and the Nasdaq sank 15.48 points, or 0.7 percent, to 2,180.32." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Browning, 2.11M), among other sources, also reports the stock numbers.

Report Suggests Economic Growth Slowing. The New York Times/AP (5/19), reports, "An important gauge of the nation's future economic activity dipped in April, once again suggesting slower growth in the months ahead." The Conference Board, "a private research group, reported Thursday that its index of leading economic indicators fell by 0.1 percentage point, to 138.9, last month. Economists were predicting a small rise. In March the index climbed by 0.4 percentage point, to 139." The index "predicts economic activity three to six months in the future." Economists "said the decline reinforced the Federal Reserve's forecast that economic growth, which has been brisk, would most likely moderate to a more sustainable pace in the coming months."

Bernanke Says Housing Market Cooling. The Washington Post (5/19, D1, Tse, 744K) reports, "Confirming what home buyers suspected and real estate sales figures have indicated for months, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday that the U.S. housing market was showing clear signs of cooling off." Bernanke "said the slowdown is 'moderate' and 'orderly' and pointed to the overall strength of the economy."

Krugman Says Market "Coming Down To Earth." In a column titled "Coming Down To Earth," Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (5/19, 1.19M), "Um, wasn't the stock market supposed to bounce back after Wednesday's big drop? We shouldn't read too much into a couple of days' movements in stock prices." But "it seems that investors are suddenly feeling uneasy about the state of the economy. They should be; the puzzle is why they haven't been uneasy all along."

WSJournal Says Bernanke Must Show He Understands Inflation Dangers. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, 2.11M) editorializes, "Stocks continued their weeklong plunge yesterday, selling off again at the end of the day on more inflationary fears. The way to understand this washout -- knocking 4.4% off the Dow -- is that Adam Smith is giving the US financial establishment a warning." The consumer price index reading "that triggered Wednesday's selloff is a lagging indicator" that "tells you inflation is here only after it has already arrived. … All of which suggests that…Ben Bernanke, is facing a rough passage. He's arrived at a Fed that has clearly made a mistake in letting inflation expectations build and has been very slow to admit it. The only questions now are the magnitude of that mistake and of the resulting financial casualties. … The sooner Mr. Bernanke shows that he understands the problem, and has the fortitude to do something about it, the fewer casualties there will be. Sooner or later Adam Smith will take over if Mr. Bernanke doesn't."

Mortgage Rates Rise. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 8, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The cost of financing a home is up again. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage rose to 6.6% in the last week. That's the highest rate in almost four years. As that was being announced, the stock market was sliding again. The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 77 points to close at 11,128.29."

Bush To Nominate Casey To Open SEC Seat. The Washington Post/AP (5/19, D2) reports President Bush "will nominate Kathleen L. Casey, a Senate aide and expert on banking and securities law, to the five-member Securities and Exchange Commission, the White House said yesterday." The announcement "came four days after Cynthia A. Glassman said she did not intend to serve a second term as a commissioner and will leave after her term ends June 5."

Media Shield Law Reintroduced In Senate. The AP (5/19, Kellman) reports Senators "began a new effort to pass a media shield law Thursday, re-introducing legislation they said would protect journalists from being sent to jail for refusing to reveal their sources in most cases." The bill, "re-written with guidance from more than 30 news organizations including The Associated Press, drew new support after changes that could force reporters to disclose sources if they witnessed a crime or obtained information deemed secret by law." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "We need to protect the press, especially with a big, large government that keeps things secret more and more. We also have to have some respect for the fact that there are certain things that shouldn't be made public by statute." The AP adds, "Some lawmakers remained skeptical about shielding reporters in wartime."

GOP Negotiators Say Pension Bill Unlikely To Pass Before Memorial Day. The AP (5/19, Abrams) reports Republican negotiators said "despite recent progress, Congress is unlikely to pass by Memorial Day legislation aimed at assuring financial solvency for the nation's employer-based pension system." House and Senate conferees "originally hoped to send a bill to the president before April 15, the time some companies had to recalculate their contributions to defined-benefit pension plans. But the two sides have stalled over several intractable issues, including Senate proposals to give special breaks to financially struggling airlines and to require companies with poor credit ratings to pay more into their pension plans."

Competing FEMA Bills Advancing Through House. CQ (5/18, Hunter) reported, "A proposal to restore the Federal Emergency Management Agency to its pre-Sept. 11 status as an independent, Cabinet-level agency gained ground Thursday" with the approval of HR 5316 in he House Government Reform Committee. The bill is competing with HR 5351, which "would leave FEMA in the Homeland Security Department but grant it power to report directly to the president in a disaster." CQ added that while the "bills reflect a simmering turf war between the chairmen of the Homeland Security and Transportation and Infrastructure committees," both "would give FEMA control of disaster preparedness and response. A reorganization of Homeland stripped FEMA of its disaster preparedness duties last year."

Possible Bush Shift To Right Seen As Bad Strategy For Party. In his Washington Post column (5/19, A21), E.J. Dionne says as they "watch President Bush's approval ratings tumble, conservative activists are offering a surefire strategy for presidential recovery: Bush should move to the right and 'rally his base.'" There's "one problem with this approach: It could do the president's party far more harm than good, even within its own ranks. The conservative view ignores the roots of the president's difficulties in the disaffection of moderate voters who are more concerned with performance -- or the lack thereof -- than ideology." Bush's "best shot at a quick jolt upward in his approval ratings is among conservatives in his own party, who are already more inclined to support him than anyone else and might come home in response to a presidential tilt rightward. But Rep. Chris Shays, a moderate from Connecticut, noted that many of the House Republicans most endangered in this fall's election -- himself included -- are moderates who would be hurt if his party and his president moved farther right."

Democratic Admiration Of McCain Seen As Contradiction. In his Washington Post column (5/19, A21), Michael Kinsley says Sen. John McCain "has a unique genius for telling the truth from his heart and making people believe that he is lying. And these people are his supporters! They admire him as a straight-talking truth-teller, and they forgive him for taking positions on big issues that they find repellent, on the grounds that he doesn't really mean what he says. 'Oh, he has to say that to get the Republican nomination,' explain many Democrats with a girlish crush on the charming, funny, intelligent and heroic Republican senator from Arizona, and/or a special loathing of their party's own star, the junior senator from New York. 'That' might refer to McCain's strong right-to-life stand on abortion, or his strong support for the war in Iraq, or his recent rapprochement with Jerry Falwell. They admire McCain as a straight shooter among sneaks, a truth-teller amid bull artists. They long, understandably, for some fresh air in the fetid atmosphere of politics. And McCain delivers that."

Rita Survivors Believe They Are On Their Own. Freelance writer Joyce King, in a column for USA Today (5/19, 2.31M) writes that "Hurricane Rita's devastation to the coastal towns of southwest Louisiana is still fresh nearly eight months later." King says she continues to "meet people who talk of living through 'the forgotten hurricane.'" King continues, "Many Rita victims are still awaiting federal housing funds to rebuild." Residents of Cameron Parish "are frightened. Help is slow to arrive. New codes make rebuilding prohibitive." Many of the storm's survivors "believe they're on their own."

Brinkley's Criticism Of Nagin Seen As Prominent Feature In New Orleans Mayoral Race. The Washington Post (5/19, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports "The Great Deluge," by Tulane University historian Douglas Brinkley, has figured "prominently" in New Orleans' mayoral race for its depiction of "Mayor C. Ray Nagin as too vain, too stunned and too paranoid to have been effective in the city's crisis. Relying in part on accounts from Nagin's political rivals, the book has been characterized by his supporters as a campaign attack timed to sink his bid for reelection on Saturday." The Post adds that the "leadership abilities" of Nagin and opponent Mitch Landrieu "have become a central issue…, and that is one reason Brinkley's account of Nagin has proved to be a sensitive subject."

Nagin Says His Victory Would Send Racial Message. The Washington Times (5/19, Debose, 90K) reports "Nagin says a victory in tomorrow's election will send a message on race that 'will echo throughout America.' 'This election will say in spite of American prejudice, I was able to attract votes from all races and classes and move forward with the process of healing,' said Mr. Nagin, who has hinted that whites locally and nationally are working to unseat him from the post, which blacks have held for nearly 30 years." Landrieu, meanwhile, "said the tightly contested runoff election will turn on whether 'African-Americans [will] vote for white politicians and will whites vote for black ones.'"

Landrieu Said To Stick To Script. The New York Times (5/19, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports, "If Mr. Landrieu wins, he will offer the classic prescriptions for governing that have been his armor in debates with an unpredictable opponent, Mayor C. Ray Nagin. Unlike the mayor, Mr. Landrieu rarely throws away the script." He has used a "promise of competence" against Nagin, who "he accuses of incarnating the opposite."

Giuliani Campaigns For Reed In Georgia. CNN's The Situation Room (5/18, Blitzer) reported, "Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani headlined a fundraiser in Georgia today for the lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed. Reed is a conservative, a former leader of the Christian Coalition, founded by Pat Robertson. Giuliani is a moderate Republican who, as you probably know, is considering -- considering -- a run for the White House." CNN (Crowley) added that Reed "gets a marquee player in Giuliani, who will help him raise money for what looks to be a to-the-wire primary fight. And Giuliani, who's thinking about running for president, gets the attention of Reed's core supporters, which is to say culturally conservative Republicans, something the pro-gay rights, pro-abortion rights, pro-gun licensing former mayor of New York is not."

The AP (5/19, Bluestein) notes that Reed said just prior to the fundraiser, "I just want to say I believe Rudy Giuliani is one of the finest leaders in not only the Republican Party but in either party." Giuliani replied, "We're here to get you elected. It would be a great thing for Georgia." Reed's "campaign was looking for a boost before the July 18 Republican primary after being dogged by ties between" Reed and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." Meanwhile, the appearance "could also help Giuliani draw conservative support in a run for president. His endorsement of Reed comes weeks after the Rev. Jerry Falwell said he admired the former mayor but could not support him for president because of 'irreconcilable differences on life and family.'"

The New York Post (5/19, Haberman, 624K) adds, "Later asked by reporters about how his past pro-gay rights, pro-choice stands mesh with Reed's positions, Giuliani said, 'We are a broad party. I agree with Ralph on many things.' 'There are going to be some things I disagree with him on…in Ralph's case I know him, and I think he's going to be a really effective leader,' he said."

Giuliani Emphasizes Fiscal Conservatism. The New York Times (5/19, Healy, 1.19M) reports that Rudy Giuliani "was warmly received at a Reed fund-raiser here, though advisers to Mr. Reed noted that most of the donors were politically moderate business people, and that a truer test of Mr. Giuliani's appeal among more conservative Southerners would come in rural counties." The Times adds, "Aligning himself closely with the Bush administration," Giuliani "called for more federal tax cuts as a means of creating jobs and stimulating the economy, and argued that tax cuts would invigorate business and ultimately yield greater total tax receipts, thereby helping to reduce the deficit. 'President Bush understands that, the Republican Congress understands that, Ralph understands that, and the Democrats don't,' Mr. Giuliani told the audience of about 250 people. 'We can take a big step back, either state by state or nationally. And this election in 2006 is going to determine if we keep seeing our economy grow, or we take a real step backwards.'"

"Progressive" Democrats Said To Be Targeting Moderates. Bloomberg (5/19) reports

Democratic activist groups "that mounted an aggressive campaign against President George W. Bush in the 2004 election have a new target: Democrats who support his policies." A "loose network of organizations, ranging from women's groups to Internet bloggers, is pressuring incumbents such as Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Representatives Jane Harman of California and Melissa Bean of Illinois, in some cases by backing insurgent candidates in primary elections." The groups "charge that these and other Democrats have been too supportive of Bush on issues like Iraq and trade, and say they're trying to energize voters disillusioned with a party that has failed to draw clear distinctions with Republicans." The "organizations and Web logs that identify themselves as the party's "progressive" wing include MoveOn.org, a coalition of groups that raised $60 million and enlisted 100,000 volunteers in the 2004 elections; DailyKos, a blog that averages 20 million visitors a month; and Democracy for America, a political action committee with 500 affiliates."

Democrats Counting On Female Candidates To Help Regain Control Of House. The Christian Science Monitor (5/19, Feldmann, 61K) reports that heading into the '06 elections, EMILY's List "boasts its largest crop of candidates in its 21 years. … And as the Democratic Party seeks to regain control of Congress -- doable with a net shift of just 15 seats -- it is counting on these EMILY's List women to play a major role. Of the 24 Republican-held House seats deemed competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, 11 feature Democratic women, all of them getting help from Emily's List. By comparison, of Cook's 11 competitive Democratic-held House seats, only one features a Republican woman contender. Voter discontent with Washington is high, and women candidates could be the natural beneficiaries of that 'throw the bums out' mentality, say experts on women in politics. 'When people get disgusted with politics and they are looking for change, women embody that change,' says Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University."

Shays Says GOP Majority Is In Jeopardy. CT4 Rep. Chris Shays (R) was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18) if he agrees with former House Speaker Newt Gingrich that the GOP's majority in Congress is in jeopardy. Shays said, "Oh, absolutely. We're in grave danger for a variety of reasons but one of them is there's an ethics issue here and I think that our side of the aisle doesn't get it. I honestly think we came to change Washington. I think Washington has changed too many in Washington. So, we're not the reformers that we set out to be and we need to regain that."

Liberals From Across US Helping Lieberman's Primary Foe. The New York Times (5/19, Yardley, 1.19M) reports that "from across the nation, a determined alliance of antiwar activists is working overtime online and on doorsteps to defeat" Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman (D), "whose political moderation helped him earn the Democratic nomination for vice president six years ago. Their goal is not only to punish Mr. Lieberman for staunchly supporting the war in Iraq but also to protest what the activists consider the Democratic Party's willingness to accommodate President Bush. Without a national race to focus on, thousands of activists from other states -- encouraged by a host of liberal bloggers -- have contributed money and volunteered to help the campaign of" businessman Ned Lamont, "who is trying to unseat Mr. Lieberman in the state's Democratic primary in August." The Times notes, "Many Democrats assert that the vigorous challenge to Mr. Lieberman is overshadowing the governor's race and taking money and attention away from three closely contested House races in Connecticut that many strategists consider crucial to the Democrats' majority hopes. 'It's absolute Democratic cannibalism,'" said ex-Connecticut Democratic Chairman John F. Droney.

Unifying Message Proves Elusive For Religious Liberals. The New York Times (5/19, Banerjee, 1.19M) reports that religious liberals have been meeting this week in Washington, D.C. at the Spiritual Activism Conference in an effort to plan "how to take their message to those in power. … Since the last presidential election, liberals of various faiths have talked about taking back religion from the conservative Christians who helped bring President Bush and a Republican Congress to power. Yet liberal believers have so far been unable to approach, even modestly, the success of the religious right and command the attention of Congress." The Times notes that if the gathering at the conference "is any indication, the biggest barrier for liberals may be their regard for pluralism: for letting people say what they want, how they want to, and for trying to include everyone's priorities, rather than choosing two or three issues that could inspire a movement. 'We didn't get on the same page with everyone, and it is about getting on the same page,' said the Rev. Tony Campolo, an outspoken liberal Baptist minister from Pennsylvania who once served as a spiritual adviser to President Bill Clinton, and attended the conference."

DHS Officials Says Many States Not Ready For Bird Flu. The AP (5/19, Jordan) reports many states have a "spotty" record in preparing for bird flu and it is matter of "not if, but when" the deadly virus reaches the United States, the Homeland Security Department's top doctor said Thursday. Dr. Jeffrey Runge, the department's chief medical officer, "said state and local governments carry most of burden of preparing for an outbreak," including "readying emergency medical workers, providing hospital beds and setting up treatment centers outside of immediate disaster areas." In an interview with the AP, Runge did not identify the states he said have been slow to prepare. However, he did say that states with "experience in dealing with hurricanes or terrorist attacks are further along."

Scientists Begin Testing For Bird Flu In Alaska. The AP (5/19) reports federal scientists Wednesday began testing migratory birds on a coastal wildlife refuge in Alaska for signs of bird flu, according to Bruce Woods, spokesman with the US Fish and Wildlife Service. It is the first sampling of a $4 million federal project to study 15,000 birds for the disease throughout the state this summer, Woods said.

WHO Probes Indonesian Bird Flu Cases For Human Transmission. The Washington Post (5/19, A17, Sipress, 744K) reports, "An international team of health investigators arrived on the Indonesian island of Sumatra on Thursday to determine whether an unusually large cluster of human bird flu cases indicates that the highly lethal virus has mutated into a form easily spread among people." USA Today (5/19, A6, 2.31M) reports, "The source of bird flu that killed five members of an Indonesian family isn't known, and human-to-human transmission can't be ruled out," the World Health Organization said on its Website. The WHO said the "most plausible" source was poultry, but "the possibility of limited human-to-human transmission cannot be ruled out." If that occurred, "it has not been either efficient or sustained," the WHO said.

However, the New York Times (5/19, Gelling, 1.19M) reports under the headline "5 Bird Flu Deaths In Indonesia Not Linked To Human Exchange," that WHO officials "said Thursday that the five avian flu deaths confirmed this week on Sumatra were probably not a result of human-to-human infection and did not suggest that the virus had mutated into a more deadly form." The Times quotes WHO epidemiologist Gina Samaan, who is investigating the recent cluster, as saying "the number of deaths had raised eyebrows, but so far the outbreak was similar to others in Indonesia that were caused by close contact with infected poultry."

Author Says Virginity Pledges Need To Be Re-Thought. In a New York Times op-ed (5/19), author Lauren F. Winner says, "The recent Harvard study that found teenagers' virginity pledges to be ineffective should come as a surprise to no one. Several studies had already come to that conclusion. If we are truly to help our teenagers adopt the countercultural sexual ethic of abstinence until marriage, Christians concerned about the rampant premarital sex in our communities need to rethink, rather than simply defend, young people's abstinence pledges." Although "the church devotes an immense amount of energy to teaching about sexuality — just go to the Christian inspiration section of your nearest Barnes & Noble and compare the number of books about chastity to books that challenge, say, consumerism — many Christians still 'struggle with' (in that euphemistic evangelical phrase) premarital sex, adultery and pornography." No "retooled pledge will guarantee teenagers' chastity, but words of grace and communal commitment are perhaps a firmer basis for sexual ethics than simple assertions that true love waits."

WSJournal Says House Earmark Reform Legislation Full Of Loopholes. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "When the House passed its lobbyist-reform bill last month, we praised the earmark transparency provision as a rare bright spot. Maybe we spoke too soon. Outsiders have now had a chance to inspect the fine print, and if Sarbanes-Oxley were this full of loopholes, few businesses would complain." Perhaps with "the House's Appropriator-in-Chief, Californian Jerry Lewis, now under investigation for allegedly steering millions in appropriations to a lobbyist via earmarks, reform will take on added urgency. But GOP leaders should understand that this kind of cynical loophole-writing won't make voters feel any better about them come November."

WSJournal Says GOP Won't Get Payoff From Medicare Drug Benefit. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "Republicans have been touting new polls showing rising popularity for their Medicare drug benefit. But this week's panic in Congress to extend Monday's deadline for penalty-free enrollment is further evidence that the program has been far from the political home run the GOP once hoped." At "best, the drug benefit will be a political wash this first national election following its implementation, and there is reason for Republicans to worry that come November many seniors will be hitting the dread 'doughnut hole' where coverage stops. More ominously, Democrats are making a pledge to 'fix' the benefit -- meaning expand it -- their top campaign plank. So while Republicans might have gotten to play Santa for five minutes, they'll spend decades playing Scrooge as Democrats demagogue for more generous coverage."

NYTimes Cautions Against Investing In Emerging Markets. The New York Times (5/19, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the "lucky investors who have ridden the bull run of the emerging markets in recent years — and those still thinking about getting onboard — should remember one thing. What goes up quickly often goes down quickly as well." Investors are "stampeding, cash in hand, toward countries like Russia and India. As Landon Thomas Jr. reported in this paper yesterday, hedge funds, mutual funds and pension funds are embracing the risks and the returns in countries as far-flung as Zambia and the former Soviet republic of Georgia. Speculation may have overtaken smart investment." The "wise investors won't lose their heads and weight their portfolios too heavily toward the most exotic funds. The problem with hot money is that it's easy to get burned."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hayden Grilled On NSA Programs During Confirmation Hearing. Gen. Michael Hayden yesterday testified at the Senate Intelligence Committee hearings on his nomination to be CIA director. As expected, senators questioned Hayden closely over his handling of domestic surveillance programs while at the helm of the NSA. Media observers generally agree that nothing arose that would prevent Hayden's eventual approval. Knight Ridder (5/19, Kuhnhenn), for example, says Hayden "seems assured of Senate confirmation to take over the CIA and would become the agency's third director since the Sept. 11 attacks. The committee will vote next week." USA Today (5/19, Stone, 2.31M), meanwhile, quotes Sen. Carl Levin, the Intelligence Committee's senior Democrat, saying of Hayden, "It's very likely he'll be confirmed." And the New York Times (5/19, Mazzetti, 1.19M) reports that "for the most part, Democrats as well as Republicans praised his experience and said he was a good choice to lead an agency."

The story was the lead on NBC, and also ran early in the lineup of ABC and CBS. NBC Nightly News (5/18, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "General Hayden aggressively defended warrantless eavesdropping and a second program to track telephone numbers as legal. Under fire about government surveillance from committee Democrats, Hayden wouldn't back down." Hayden "insisted the National Security Agency targets al Qaeda, not ordinary Americans. Most committee members were not briefed on the secret programs until late yesterday, a last-minute White House effort to blunt today's questions. It didn't completely work." The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 4, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Instead of focusing on how Hayden planned to handle his new job, the senators spent most of the day asking him about his old job, head of the National Security Agency." CBS (Attkisson) added Hayden "remained cool as he faced more than six hours of questions, most of them on the fine line between protecting Americans and stepping on liberties. For the first time publicly, Hayden seemed to confirm reports that a terror surveillance program he helped devise does access phone call data but not conversations of millions of Americans." Hayden "also defended another surveillance method, eavesdropping on targeted phone conversations between people in the US and foreign countries." General Hayden's "performance has even Democrats telling me today that barring any unforeseen surprises, he's probably going to sail on through confirmation."

ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 2, 2:35, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported Hayden "disarmed the committee by promising to crack down on leaks, train better spies and obey the law. From the start, the four-star General appeared to be among friends." Still, Democrats "wasted no time grilling Hayden on the controversial warrantless wiretapping program he ran at the National Security Agency. Especially recent allegations that the NSA collected records of billions of American phone calls." ABC ran an exchange in which Sen. Carl Levin pressed Hayden over whether he had concerns about the privacy of ordinary Americans while at the NSA. CNN's The Situation Room (5/18, Blitzer) added that Hayden promised "to try to take the politics out of intelligence gathering. But…Hayden may be feeling like a political football himself, as questioning by the Senate Intelligence Committee members continues." The AP (5/19, Shrader) notes Hayden "vigorously defended the Bush administration's warrantless eavesdropping program as a legal spy tool needed to ensnare terrorists." He "portrayed himself as an independent thinker, capable of taking over the CIA as it struggles with issues ranging from nuclear threats to its place among 15 other spy agencies."

The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Hedges, 643K) reports Hayden said that "he initially doubted the legality of a Bush administration program to expand domestic wiretaps on US citizens after the Sept. 11 attacks, but that White House officials convinced him the program was lawful." The New York Times (5/19, Lichtblau, 1.19M) adds that "again and again, he cited the legal and constitutional authority for the program, the safeguards against abuses, and the need for secrecy to ensure its effectiveness." But while "the message was constant, General Hayden sought to put a more human face on the effort, explaining his role and that of his aides in running the surveillance program." The Washington Post (5/19, A1, Linzer, Babington, 744K) notes Hayden "deflected specific questions on sensitive subjects, including interrogation methods involving terrorism detainees and the scope of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping operation, telling senators he would respond only during the closed-door portion of the hearing." On the wiretapping program, Hayden "said the White House's legal basis is rooted in the opinion that Article II of the Constitution gives the president expansive authorities in a time of war to conduct domestic surveillance. Hayden said he never personally reviewed the legal opinion that was drawn up in support of the program, but 'when they came to me and we discussed its lawfulness, our discussion anchored itself on Article II.'"

The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Miller, 958K) reports, "In perhaps the clearest signal of a looming shift in course for the troubled agency, Hayden made it clear that he believes the CIA has become too bogged down tracking daily developments in Iraq and other global trouble spots." Instead, "he suggested that the CIA should surrender more of that work to the Pentagon, focus more of its energies on anticipating longer-term threats and trends, and reconcile itself to a diminished role in which it is an important, but not isolated, member of the US intelligence community." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Solomon, 2.11M) notes, "Currently, the Defense Department controls 80% of the US government's intelligence budget." Hayden's confirmation "would place active military officers in charge of all of Washington's principal spy agencies."

BellSouth Seeks Retraction From USA Today On Phone Record Database Story. USA Today (5/19, 2.31M) reports BellSouth "asked USA TODAY on Thursday to 'retract the false and unsubstantiated statements' about the company that it contends were in a May 11 story about a database of domestic calling records maintained by the National Security Agency." In a letter to USA publisher, Craig Moon, "the company noted that the story said BellSouth is 'working under contract with the NSA' to provide 'phone call records of tens of millions of Americans' that have been incorporated into the database." The letter says, "No such proof was offered by your newspaper because no such contracts exist. You have offered no proof that BellSouth provided massive calling data to the NSA as part of a warrantless program because it simply did not happen." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Searcey, Ellison, 2.11M) adds BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher "said the demand for a retraction was in part prompted by the cost BellSouth likely will incur defending against as many as five lawsuits seeking billions of dollars that have been filed against the Atlanta-based company since the article's publication."

Four Suspected Terrorists Attempt Suicide At Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Williams, 958K) reports that at Guantanamo Bay, "four terrorism suspects at the sprawling prison network here attempted suicide Thursday, and detainees at a camp for the most compliant prisoners attacked guards with improvised weapons when the guards tried to rescue a man attempting to hang himself, a spokesman for the U.S. military-run prison said." The disturbance "at Camp 4, a communal facility housing 175 prisoners, followed three overdose attempts earlier in the day at Camp 1, where about 180 detainees live in metal mesh cages." As many "as 10 detainees participated in the incident. It was unclear why the men sought to take their lives simultaneously or on this specific day."

State Department Will Not Use PRC-Made Computers On Classified Networks. Government Computer News (5/18, Wait) reports Rep. Frank Wolf announced yesterday "that the State Department has agreed that approximately 900 computers purchased from Lenovo Corp. will not be used on classified networks. The U.S.-China Commission…raised concerns with Wolf in April," and "Wolf contacted secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, FBI director Robert Mueller and John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, and asked them to look into the matter." Wolf said yesterday, "This decision would have had dire consequences for our national security, potentially jeopardizing our investment in a secure IT infrastructure. It is no secret, and becoming more obvious…that the United States is a principal target of Chinese intelligence services."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Officials Face "Grilling" Over Perceived Security Gaps, Staff Vacancies. In an article appearing on at least 40 news websites, the AP (5/19, Jordan) reports DHS officials Dwight M. Williams and K. Gregg Prillaman "sat through two hours of grilling" yesterday by members of the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee who questioned the agency's contract with Shirlington Limousine, which has been tied to the investigation surrounding former Rep. Randall 'Duke' Cunningham, and the security clearance of former spokesman Brian Doyle, who is now charged with sex offences. Williams and Prillaman, along with the associate director of the US Office of Personnel Management, "largely portrayed the department as victim to a few bad employees and constraining contracting rules." Subcommittee members "also criticized department officials about rampant staff turnover at the third-largest federal agency, leaving some high-level jobs vacant."

Government Executive (5/18, Marino) reported Prillaman said, "Recruitment is probably our highest priority right now." However, a memorandum released by the subcommittee late Thursday said "senior-level vacancies" exist at FEMA, ICE, CBP and the TSA. Rep. Bennie Thompson said that with the approach of hurricane season, FEMA "must beef up its ranks. 'When I see only 73 percent of FEMA employees on board, I'm concerned,' he said." GovExec added, "This is the second time in recent weeks DHS officials have been grilled by legislators; Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, told DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff in a memo sent in late April that the department must announce how many jobs FEMA still has open. Davis' staff is still processing the results of that request."

In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (5/19, D4, Barr) reports, "It's no secret that morale is a problem at" DHS. Bush administration officials have tried to play down turf battles and culture clashes as transitional woes that would fade after the rank and file had worked together for five to seven years, but complaints by employees continue and are starting to get to the ears of members of Congress." Prillaman and Williams acknowledged yesterday "that turnover in top management jobs…appears to be adversely affecting employee morale." Meanwhile, Rep. Kendrick B. Meek "pointed to MaxHR, the department's new performance-based pay system, as a source of anxiety for the employees."

Rogers Wants Hearing On Shirlington Contract. The Washington Times/UPI (5/19, Waterman) reports DHS officials "have repeatedly defended" the way the Shirlington contract "was awarded and the security procedures under which it is operated. They have launched a counteroffensive on Capitol Hill, visiting with lawmakers in an attempt to assuage concerns." However, aides for Rep. Mike D. Rogers say he hopes to hold a hearing on the contract award "when Congress returns in mid-June from its Memorial Day recess, but that the timing would depend on when they were able to get documentation from the department."

Bill Requiring Agencies To Conduct Privacy Review Seen As Unlikely To Become Law. Government Executive/CongressDaily (5/18, Sherman) reported the House Judiciary Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee approved legislation Wednesday that would require agencies "to assess the privacy implications of any new or proposed rule," though it "appears to have little chance of becoming law despite the recent and ongoing furor over reports that certain phone companies have been giving calling data to the federal government." George Mason University Law School Professor Sally Katzen suggested in testimony "that agencies be required to give a copy of their privacy impact assessment to the director of the Office of Management and Budget." She "also…excoriated the administration for failing to name a replacement for Nuala O'Connor Kelly, who headed privacy efforts at the Department of Homeland Security but resigned last fall." CongressDaily added that the bill was "first…introduced by panel member Steve Chabot, R-Ohio, in the 106th Congress," and that Rep. Melvin Watt said, "This may be just another show."

TSA Looking Into Machine That Would Allow Passengers To Leave Shoes On. USA Today (5/19, Frank, 2.31M) reports that a machine being developed by GE called the ShoeScanner, which "would allow airline passengers to keep their shoes on while going through security checkpoints," is being looked at "with great interest," according to TSA chief Kip Hawley. "Anything that speeds up explosive detection through the checkpoint, we want to encourage," said Hawley. The machine, which "uses technology similar to a medical MRI to detect explosives in 5 to 8 seconds," will have to "pass testing in an airport before" before it can be used for passenger screening.

Four Suspected Terrorists Attempt Suicide At Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Williams, 958K) reports that at Guantanamo Bay, "four terrorism suspects at the sprawling prison network here attempted suicide Thursday, and detainees at a camp for the most compliant prisoners attacked guards with improvised weapons when the guards tried to rescue a man attempting to hang himself, a spokesman for the U.S. military-run prison said." The disturbance "at Camp 4, a communal facility housing 175 prisoners, followed three overdose attempts earlier in the day at Camp 1, where about 180 detainees live in metal mesh cages." As many "as 10 detainees participated in the incident. It was unclear why the men sought to take their lives simultaneously or on this specific day."

Judge Dismisses Detainee Lawsuit. The New York Times (5/19, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "A federal judge on Thursday dismissed a lawsuit brought by a man who says he was an innocent victim of the United States government's program transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries." Judge T. S. Ellis III ruled against the plaintiff, Khaled el-Masri, to prevent "exposure of state secrets." The ACLU said it would consider an appeal.

WAR NEWS:

Five Americans, Two Dozen Iraqis Slain In Violent Day. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 6, 1:55, Vargas, 8.78M) reported that yesterday was "a very bad day in Iraq. Four American soldiers, one US sailor and two dozen Iraqis have been killed." ABC (Berman) also profiled one of the slain Iraqis, 37-year-old Thaier al-Ubeidi, "a police officer in Baghdad, dangerous work. But he was not killed on the job. He was killed on his way to buy dinner for his children. A group of gunmen drove past in a car, says his brother. They shot him five times. His brothers say they don't know why he was killed."

The AP (5/19, Quinn) reports that meanwhile, "the kidnappers of a United Arab Emirates diplomat in Iraq demanded the closing of the country's embassy in Baghdad in a videotape aired on Arab television. Al-Jazeera TV did not air audio with the video, which showed a man said to be the hostage, Naji Rashid al-Nuaimi, 28, who was abducted by gunmen Tuesday in Baghdad." The Washington Post (5/19, A14, Knickmeyer, Sarhan, 744K) also reports in the Iraqi violence in a story headlined "Iraqi Leader Acts To Defuse Shiite Rivalry In Basra," in which it says President Jalal Talabani "convened an emergency meeting Thursday to discuss the southern port of Basra, Iraq's second-largest city and the heart of a growing, lethal power struggle among some of the Shiite Muslim religious parties that lead Iraq's governing coalition."

Violence Said To Be Driving Middle-Class Away. The New York Times (5/19, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports, "In the latest indication of the crushing hardships weighing on the lives of Iraqis, increasing portions of the middle class seem to be doing everything they can to leave the country. In the last 10 months, the state has issued new passports to 1.85 million Iraqis, 7 percent of the population and a quarter of the country's estimated middle class." The Times adds, "The school system offers another clue: Since 2004, the Ministry of Education has issued 39,554 letters permitting parents to take their children's academic records abroad. The number of such letters issued in 2005 was double that in 2004, according to the director of the ministry's examination department. Iraqi officials and international organizations put the number of Iraqis in Jordan at close to a million. Syrian cities also have growing Iraqi populations."

Iraqi Reporters Risking Their Lives. The Washington Times (5/19, Behn, 90K) reports, "The recent killings of six Iraqi journalists have rattled the country's fledgling press corps, a battle-worn crew that has persisted in covering the nation's turmoil while suffering dozens of dead at the hands of insurgents, government troops and even American forces." Reporters Without Borders "counts 68 reporters and cameramen killed so far trying to cover Iraq at war; if translators and other assistants are counted the total is 86, making this the deadliest conflict for journalists since World War II."

Marine Officials Not Disputing Murtha Statements On Attack That Killed Civilians. The AP (5/19, Baldor) reports, "Military officials said Thursday that a criminal investigation into a firefight in western Iraq that left at least 15 civilians dead is not complete, but they did not dispute a congressman's charges that the attack by Marines was far worse than originally reported." The AP adds, "Officials in the Pentagon and at U.S. Central Command declined to say whether Rep. John Murtha…was correct in saying Marines killed innocent women and children 'in cold blood' during the attacks last November. … Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said he would not comment on the veracity of Murtha's remarks, but said individuals will be held accountable if it is determined they did something wrong."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/19, Shanker, 1.19M) says that "an official military investigation into allegations that American marines killed innocent Iraqis last November has uncovered evidence that the number of dead civilians is higher than the 15 originally reported, Congressional and Defense Department officials said."

New Iraqi Government To Be Announced Over Weekend. USA Today (5/19, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraqi leaders will announce the makeup of the country's new government this weekend, then turn to the task of running a country increasingly divided along ethnic and religious lines. After months of wrangling, those leaders say they have come up with a system that will help develop consensus on critical issues." The new government "has established oversight committees in which representatives of Iraq's various groups will debate issues and resolve problems, said Humam Hammoudi, an influential cleric with the United Iraqi Alliance, the religious Shiite alliance that is the largest political bloc in parliament." The Washington Times (5/19, Behn, 90K) says the new cabinet "will include a new Ministry of National Dialogue, in an effort to stop the sectarian killings and violence that has spread through most of the country." But "the effort might fall short, because Sunni leaders are not satisfied with the Cabinet lineup cobbled together after months of closed-door negotiations."

Rumsfeld Says Efforts To Stop Formation Of Iraqi Government Will Fail. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (5/18) what he would say to people who feel the Iraq war cannot be won. Rumsfeld said, "I can say that I can understand how some people could feel that way, given what they hear on the television and what they see in the press. And on the other hand, if you put yourself in the position of Zarqawi and the terrorists and the insurgents, they tried to stop the election last year in January, and they failed. They tried to stop the drafting of a constitution and they failed. They tried to stop the referendum on the constitution and they failed. They tried to stop the election December 15 and they failed. They're now trying to stop the formation of a new government and they're going to fail in the next few days. It's going to be completed and announced."

Senate Investigates Allegations Of Torricelli Link To Oil-For-Food Scheme. The Financial Times (5/19, Gatti) reports, "The US Senate is looking into allegations that" former US Senator Robert Torricelli "urged Baghdad to give a US company lucrative contracts under the much-criticised United Nations oil-for-food programme." It "is the first time that a leading US lawmaker has been linked to the controversial UN programme, whose shortcomings have been an important element of the Bush administration's critique of the UN." According to documents retrieved after the Saddam Hussein was overthrown, Torricelli "had a series of meetings in the late 1990s, when he was a congressman, with Nizar Hamdoun, then the Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations. During these meetings, Mr Torricelli allegedly urged the Iraqi authorities to help" Torricelli campaign contributor David Chang and his lobbying company Bright and Bright "get oil-for-food contracts on good terms."

Over 100 Killed As Taliban Violence In Afghanistan Spikes. In Afghanistan, the arrival of spring has brought a new wave of violence, as Taliban fighters cross the border from Pakistan into two southern provinces. More than 100 people, mostly Taliban fighters, were killed yesterday in ongoing attacks. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 5, :30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "There's been an explosion of violence in Afghanistan, some of the worst fighting since the US helped to overthrow the Taliban government after 9/11. Most of the fighting has been in two southern provinces, including a brazen assault by hundreds of Taliban fighters on one, small town. 87 Taliban, 15 police officers, a Canadian soldier and an American contractor have been killed. The American died in a car bombing in the northwest city of Herat."

The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 5, 1:40, Logan, 7.66M) added, "This time of year, springtime, is always the fighting season in Afghanistan, so it's no surprise to see an increase in the attacks here. But what this is really about is the fact that the Taliban have continued to have a safe haven across the Afghan border inside Pakistan, and no one has done anything about that." The Taliban, "according to the Afghans that I speak to, they say they're better equipped than the Afghan security forces."

NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 6, 2:25, Maceda, 9.87M) reported, "The Taliban's comeback is not only on the battlefield, but increasingly in the hearts and minds of Afghans. Why? Analysts say the democratic values embodied by Afghan President Hamid Karzai haven't caught on." Despite "some $12 billion in aid and the loss of over 220 US soldiers, many Afghan men in the street want the Taliban back. Increasingly, the Taliban is seen here as a protector of Islamic values against an invasion of threatening Western ways."

Knight Ridder (5/19, Landay) says the unrest "comes as thousands of British, Canadian and Dutch peacekeepers are deploying into southern Afghanistan, replacing .. troops in a major expansion of NATO's International Security Assistance Force." Some of the violence "is related to tribal rivalries and a major Afghan government drive to eradicate the poppy crops that make the country the world's largest producer of opium, from which heroin is made."

USA Today/AP (5/19, Khan) reports Karzai "said the violence was coming from the mountainous regions of neighboring Pakistan. The area is populated by ethnic Pashtuns, who make up the majority of the Taliban militants. 'In the madrassas (Islamic schools), the mullahs and teachers are saying to their students: "Go to Afghanistan for jihad,"' Karzai said." Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, "called the allegations 'baseless.'" Similar stories appear in the Washington Post (5/19, A1, Constable, 744K) and New York Times (5/19, Gall, 1.19M).

US Soldier Rewarded With Silver Star For Bravery In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (5/19, A13, Tyson, 744K) reports, "Sgt. 1st Class David Lowe and his Special Forces A-team were in their last week in Afghanistan on June 10, 2005, when their base received an urgent call: A small group of 82nd Airborne paratroopers was pinned down in a firefight near the Pakistan border and needed support. … Lowe's bravery in the Afghan mountains that sweltering summer day was rewarded Thursday with a Silver Star, which was pinned on by Brig. Gen. John F. Mulholland Jr., the head of the Special Forces Command, as Lowe and 12 fellow soldiers from 1st Battalion, 7th Special Forces Group, were honored at a ceremony here."

Army Doctor Arranges For Afghan Child's Heart Surgery In US. Army cardiologist Maj. Sloane Guy arranged for an Afghan child to travel to the US for surgery to correct a severe heart defect. The story was covered by the CBS Evening News (5/18, story 8, 2:35, Assuras, 7.66M), which reported, "His Army nickname is Blue because that's the color Mohammed Umer's lips, fingers, and toes were when Major Sloane Guy found him half a world away in Afghanistan." Mohammed is "from a remote village in northeastern Afghanistan. Last April, he was so sick, his father turned to the US military for help. Major Guy realized the equipment needed to save Mohammed's life wasn't available in Afghanistan." Maj. Guy: "I made a commitment to him to try to bring him over here." Assuras: "It took more than a year to get here. He and his father were twice denied visas, so Major Guy went to the top for help, calling Senator and surgeon Bill Frist, with whom he had trained. This week, father and Blue arrived and Major Guy was at Andrews Air Force Base in Maryland to greet them." Today, "a big thumbs up after open heart surgery at Children's National Medical Center in Washington. The next two days are critical for Mohammed but" he is expected to "return to Afghanistan within two months with a healthy heart, needing a new nickname since he will no longer be blue."

DOJ:

US Attorney Says Active Solutions' Routing Calls To Him Is Harassment. The Roanoke Times (5/19, Nair) reports that Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Hogeboom "claims in court documents that he recently received calls from six elderly customers of Active Solutions, an Ohio-based medical equipment company, requesting that he service their broken-down motorized wheelchairs" and "filed a motion seeking a temporary restraining order against Active Solutions and its parent company, CBI Co. LLC." The companies are "under federal investigation for suspected Medicare fraud," and "Active Solutions has been telling wheelchair owners that Hogeboom can 'explain why the company cannot repair chairs.'" As "the customers…are potential witnesses or victims in the case, the government is requesting that a judge deem the company's behavior harassment." Hogeboom calls the companies actions "a sick practical joke."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Second Lay Trial Begins As Enron Conspiracy Jurors End First Day Of Deliberations. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, C3, McWilliams) reports ex-Enron chairman Kenneth Lay's "'other' trial -- on charges of violating bank-lending agreements -- began Thursday with his defense attorney insisting Mr. Lay wasn't aware of any violations." Lay is charged with bank fraud and misrepresentation for borrowing $75 million from three banks, Bank of America, Chase Bank, and Compass Bank, in order to buy Enron stock. The government contends the purchases violated loan agreements. Meanwhile, jurors in the conspiracy and fraud case against Lay and ex-Enron president Jeffrey Skilling completed their first full day of deliberations without reaching a verdict, and will resume on Monday.

The New York Times (5/19, Bajaj) reports the bank fraud charges against Lay were broken off from the main

Enron case by Judge Simeon T. Lake III "after Mr. Lay's defense team sought to have the entire case against him separated from Mr. Skilling's" in what the Times calls "an unusual compromise." Lake has said he will not issue a decision "until the jury in the other case, which he also presided over, renders a verdict, which is expected to take a week or more."

USA Today (5/19, 8B, Farrell) reports prosecutor Robb Adkins said in his opening statement that Lay "repeatedly violated 'Regulation U,' a rule put in place following the 1929 stock market crash to protect banks from borrowers who speculate in the stock market. According to the rule, when a borrower uses stock as collateral for a loan, banks are only allowed to lend an amount equal to 50% of the stock's value. Every borrower has to sign a form indicating he or she understands the rule."

The Washington Post (5/19, D1, Johnson) reports ex-Bank of America executive James Shelton testified he discussed Regulation U with Lay on several occasions. But on cross-examination by Lay attorney Ken Carroll, Shelton said he "did not believe Lay had engaged in a scheme to defraud the bank." The Los Angeles Times (5/19) reports that "each of the four counts of bank fraud and false statements to banks carry prison terms of as many as 30 years and a fine of $1 million. Those penalties are in addition to the decades in prison Lay could face if convicted in the fraud and conspiracy trial."

First Enron Executive Retrial Also Gets Underway. The AP (5/19) reports, "Next door to Lay's bank fraud trial, the first of three retrials of five former Enron broadband-unit executives was winding down in its third week, with closing arguments expected as early as Friday. In that case, former unit finance chief Kevin Howard and former in-house accountant Michael Krautz are charged with conspiracy, fraud and falsifying records for allegedly using a sham deal to fake earnings in late 2000. Both testified this week that the deal was legitimate." A three-month trial in 2005 ended in a hung jury.

Ailing Lay Lead Attorney Profiled. The New York Times (5/19, Barrionuevo) runs a story on the much-covered health problems of Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, who "was forced into surgery to clear an arterial blockage" during the conspiracy trial. For Ramsey, "who describes himself as a hard-drinking, chain-smoking legal warhorse, it was the beginning of the most challenging personal odyssey of his career and an event that may turn out to play a crucial role in the outcome of Mr. Lay's case." He ultimately "missed more than a month of the 56-day trial, including the testimony of Mr. Lay."

White-Collar Law Firms Turning To Corporate Criminal Defense. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Selvin) writes that "white-shoe" law firm O'Melveny & Myers "probably won't be fully compensated" for their work defending Skilling, who "appears to have exhausted his defense fund. But the payoff down the road could be well worth it, even if Skilling is convicted. The decision to defend Skilling is seen as a business move by Petrocelli and his firm, O'Melveny & Myers, to burnish their reputation and expertise in white-collar criminal defense." Firms like O'Melveny "that had once shunned criminal work as distasteful have come to see defending alleged corporate wrongdoers as a potential growth business. Enron's collapse, other corporate scandals and passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law tightening corporate accounting rules have fueled much of this growth."

LATimes Says Enron Executives Are On Trial For Arrogance. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (5/19) says, "Jurors finally began deliberations Wednesday in the nation's latest trial of the century, the criminal case against former Enron executives Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay. Although charged with multiple counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading related to the energy company's 2001 collapse, the ex-CEOs were really on trial for arrogance -- 'extraordinary arrogance,' as one prosecutor called it in her closing argument. … Now the fates of Skilling and Lay are in the hands of 12 fatigued jurors in Houston. Their charge is to consider only the evidence in the 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading against Skilling and the six counts of fraud and conspiracy against Lay. But it's unlikely that they will forget all that they have seen and heard in the last 15 weeks. Nor will the rest of us."

Columnist Says Lay, Skilling Betting On "Nothing Happened" Defense. In his New York Times (5/19) business column, Floyd Norris writes, "In the previous trials of chief executives whose companies imploded in fraud, the defense has always been one of ignorance, that underlings pulled it off behind the boss's back. It is an embarrassing defense, given that it implies the boss got millions for doing a very bad job, but sometimes it has worked." But Lay and Skilling "went for the 'nothing happened' defense, holding that there was nothing really wrong until Enron folded because of a loss of confidence." The "audacious" argument is meant to suggest that since "there was nothing really wrong at Enron, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling seek to preserve both their freedom and their reputations."

Milberg Indicted For Kickbacks In Class Action Suits. A federal grand jury indicted Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the nation's best-known class-action law firm, for a 20-year conspiracy to funnel payments to plaintiffs in dozens of securities class-action cases as part of a scheme to improve their prospects of gaining the lucrative status of lead counsel. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, A1, Wilke, Koppel, Sanders) reports this "could prove fatal" to Milberg, as it "will find it nearly impossible to win future assignments." Discussions between the firm and the government on "a deferred-prosecution agreement that would have avoided criminal charges" collapse after Milberg wouldn't agree to "a waiver of attorney-client privilege and access to privileged internal records," and the case "is expected to bring new scrutiny of the government's tactics in its crackdown on corporate crime, including the increasingly common demand that companies under investigation waive attorney-client privilege and cut off legal-defense funds for partners or executives who have been accused -- not convicted -- of a crime."

The New York Times (5/19, Creswell) adds that this "is the first instance of a law firm with national reach facing criminal charges." However, "prosecutors have so far been stymied in efforts to charge the two primary targets of the investigation, Mr. Weiss and his former partner, William S. Lerach." Also, some "said they were disturbed that the entire law firm had been indicted, especially as the Justice Department has been reluctant to take such an action since the 2002 indictment of the accounting firm Arthur Andersen," which went out of business even though the Supreme Court overturned its conviction.

The Financial Times (5/19, Kirchgaessner) characterizes the indictment as "a sea change in the Justice Department's handling of white-collar crime and law firms." The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Reckard, Friedman), USA Today (5/19, 3B, Iwata) and Bloomberg (5/18, Pearson) also cover this story.

Government Widens Stock-Option Probe. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, A3, Bandler, Levitz) reports, "In a dramatic widening of the investigations into potential stock-option abuses, federal prosecutors in Manhattan have launched criminal probes of at least five U.S. companies," including Caremark Rx Inc., SafeNet Inc., Affiliated Computer Services Inc., Vitesse Semiconductor Corp., and UnitedHealth Group Inc. This "signals a significant ratcheting up of government scrutiny of option-granting practices." Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant for the SEC, notes that "unlike some complicated revenue-recognition cases brought by federal prosecutors in recent years, backdating would be easy for jurors to grasp." He also "predicted pressure would mount for boards to fire chief executives who had been involved in backdating." The New York Times (5/19) and AP (5/18) also cover this story.

Justice Department Joins Suit Against Abbott On Drug Pricing. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, B2, Carreyrou) reports, "The Justice Department joined a whistleblower lawsuit against Abbott Laboratories Inc. and Hospira Inc., alleging that the companies conspired to inflate Medicare and Medicaid reimbursements on some drugs from 1991 to 2001" by reporting "prices for its drugs to price publishers, such as the Drug Topics Red Book, that were as much as 1,000% higher than the prices the company charged hospitals and doctors," who could then "reap big profits by filing Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement claims that were much higher than what they had actually paid," Abbott allegedly marketed the scheme as "an inducement to buy its drugs" and "thereby increasing its own sales and profits." However, "Abbott denied the allegations and said it would defend itself vigorously." The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Japsen) notes that the suit "mirrors similar allegations brought against Abbott and dozens of other drugmakers in recent years" and is "part of a legal assault on pharmaceutical industry pricing."

HealthSouth To Pay $3 Million To Avoid Prosecution For Accounting Fraud. The New York Times (5/19, Whitmire) reports that in a deal that avoids "prosecution over a giant accounting fraud," HealthSouth "agreed to accept responsibility for crimes committed by its executives, must pay the money to the United States Postal Inspection Service's consumer fraud division, enact more stringent internal controls and commit no other illegal acts for three years." This ends "an investigation that began in March 2003" during which "15 executives, including 5 chief financial officers, have pleaded guilty or been convicted of participating in the fraud." The Los Angeles Times (5/19) also reports on the HealthSouth settlement.

NASDAQ May Delist Maces Security. The Philadelphia Business Journal (5/19) reports, "Mace Security International Inc. "faces a delisting from the NASDAQ stock exchange" as "an independent investigation into its hiring practices," including "t alleged hiring of undocumented workers at its car washes," which "was commissioned by the company's audit committee" delayed its "filing of the company's 10-K annual report for 2005 and its 10-Q quarterly report for the period ended March 31." However, Mace "received a stay of the delisting" and "a hearing before the NASDAQ Listing Qualifications Panel…is scheduled for May 25."

Financial Times Criticizes Sarbanes-Oxley. The Financial Times (5/19) editorializes, "America's smaller public companies had reason to hope the cost of complying with the Sarbanes-Oxley (Sox) act would this week be lightened. Their hopes were largely belied." Furthermore, the SEC "failed to specify when the reporting holiday for small caps would come to an end; and it forgot to clarify whether foreign companies could use this postponement." The result of all this is that "many US small businesses have reportedly avoided going public altogether, or are conducting initial public offerings on small cap exchanges in foreign markets," and "New York has lost its position as favourite port of call for the secondary listings of foreign companies in favour of London, Hong Kong and other less burdensome jurisdictions" The SEC's "most pressing concern" in its new guidelines

"must be to address the incentive for the big four accounting firms to pile ever greater disclosure requirements on companies' internal controls."

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Probes Of Ney, Jefferson To Run Parallel To DOJ Investigations. The Washington Post (5/19, A4, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the House ethics committee "plans to quickly begin its probes into the activities" of Reps. Ney and Jefferson "while working with the Justice Department to avoid interference with federal prosecutors' investigations of the same lawmakers, according to people familiar with the panel's efforts." The committee's "surprise decision Wednesday to open inquiries into allegations that the congressmen accepted bribes -- as well as a third, wider-ranging probe -- was meant to tamp down criticism that the panel is dysfunctional and that the House is not policing the ethical lapses of its members, according to the sources." But it "was not clear that the committee would have enough time to complete its work before the end of the legislative session this autumn, or that its efforts would not complicate the work of Justice Department prosecutors and investigators." The logjam "over starting new investigations was finally broken after Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) was replaced last month as the committee's ranking Democrat by a respected veteran of the panel, Rep. Howard L. Berman (D-Calif.)." Yesterday, Republicans "sought to portray Mollohan as the primary cause of the long holdup in new investigations."

The AP (5/19, Margasak) reports the House ethics committee, "fortified by a pile of new money to conduct investigations, has become a player in major bribery probes that could leave some lawmakers facing double trouble: criminal prosecution and punishment by their peers." One "potential legal obstacle for the committee could be the Justice Department, which sometimes asks the ethics panel to step aside temporarily to avoid jeopardizing a prosecution. In the cases announced Wednesday, the committee could need some of the same witnesses and documents that are crucial to the Justice Department investigations."

The NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 7, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) last night noted the investigations, reporting, "In Washington, this is the season of investigations into members of Congress. The ethics committee in the House has been paralyzed, dormant for over a year, because of a fight about its own rules of operation. But this week, it suddenly came to life and opened investigations into two members of Congress, perhaps with more to come." NBC (Reid) added, "Republican Bob Ney of Ohio and Democrat William Jefferson of Louisiana, both already under investigation by Federal prosecutors. Now, the House ethics committee, ending 16 months of partisan gridlock, has launched its own investigation into whether the two men accepted bribes. The allegations are serious, but longtime Congress watchdog Fred Wertheimer says these two cases are just the tip of an ethics iceberg." Fred Wertheimer, Congress watchdog: "We are facing the worst corruption scandals in Congress in decades."

Justice Department Goes To Trial In Safavian Case On Monday. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Cummings, 2.11M) reports the Justice Department's "investigation of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal already has produced four guilty pleas. Now, prosecutors are about to find out whether an influence-peddling probe based largely on emails and a network of low-profile Republican aides can pass muster with a jury." David Safavian, "a longtime friend of Mr. Abramoff and a former White House official, is scheduled to go on trial Monday. He is charged with making false statements and obstructing government inquiries about Mr. Abramoff's relationship with him while he served as chief of staff of the General Services Administration, which manages government property." The trial "comes at a critical moment as the focus of the Abramoff investigation appears to be broadening from staff to members of Congress, most notably Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney. While the Safavian trial is narrowly focused on the former government official's actions, a court loss could be a psychological blow to the high-profile inquiry." The prosecutors' "task is complicated by the fact that they aren't planning to call Mr. Abramoff."

DOJ Funds Texas Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force. KTBC-TV Austin, Texas (5/18, 6:07 p.m.) reported, "Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott announced a grant from the US Department of Justice. The grant will help establish an Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force responsible for investigating online child exploitation cases in southern and central Texas. The task force will be responsible for both proactive and reactive investigations as well as prevention and education."

KXAN-TV Austin, Texas (5/18, 4:05 p.m.) reported, "Fighting cyber crime in Texas gets a boost today. The US Department of Justice has given $300,000 to the Texas Attorney General's cyber crimes unit. The money will be used to create an Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, responsible for fighting child exploitation online."

Oklahoma Creating Online Predator Investigation Agency. KVII-TV Amarillo, Texas (5/18, 12:35 p.m.) reported, "Oklahoma will soon have a new crime-fighting agency. The state senate passed a bill yesterday creating a full-time crime bureau unit that will investigate cases of child pornography and pedophiles targeting children on the Internet. The bill now goes to Gov. Brad Henry, who made it a part of his legislative agenda. The Department of Justice estimates that one in every five teenagers is approached online by a sexual predator."

Former Weekly Reader Editor Guilty Of Internet Child Predator Charges. The Stamford (CT) Advocate (5/19) reports that former Weekly Reader editor Noel Neff was convicted on "charges of using the Internet to lure a minor to engage in sexual activity and traveling across state lines to engage in sexual conduct with a minor." He "faces a minimum of five year, and up to 60 years in prison." Francis O'Reilly of Fairfield, Neff's lawyer, "said his client never committed a criminal act and was only trying to share his insight as a sexually confused teenager with someone he thought was going through the same experience."

Louisiana Teacher Faces Federal Child Porn Charges. The AP (5/18) reports that a Jefferson Parish, Louisiana public school teacher "was in custody Thursday, booked on charges of possession of child pornography, federal authorities said. The FBI arrested Russell Counterman, 44, of New Orleans, after getting a tip that he allegedly downloaded files _ while at work _ containing sexually explicit images of children who ranged in age from 4 years old to teenagers, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said. … Federal agents said Counterman was accused of using a school-issued laptop to download child pornography from the Internet at the school. After agreeing to a search, authorities said some of the alleged material was found in Counterman's classroom in a briefcase as well as in his home."

Florida Man Admits To Internet Sex Solicitation Charges. WTSP-TV Tampa Bay (5/18) reports on its website that Leroy Walter Lasky, Jr., of Port Orange, Florida, plead guilty "to using a computer to entice a minor to meet and have sex," and now "faces 5 to 30 years in prison.

Pentagon Contracting Probe Shows Federal Emphasis On Fighting Corruption. The Boston Globe (5/19, Kranish, 484K) reports that after covering a $15,000 luxury trip to Miami by former Rep. Randy Cunningham in March 2004, prosecutors say defense contractor Mitchell Wade "gave $32,000 in laundered campaign funds to Representative Katherine Harris" and "funneled $46,000 into the campaign account of Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr." Wade "then discussed getting specific defense appropriations with Harris and Goode or their staffs, according to court documents." The Globe notes that in addition to Harris and Goode, federal agents are investigating Reps. Robert Ney and William Jefferson, and "the totality of these investigations marks one of the Justice Department's most concentrated public corruption efforts in recent history. In a speech last week in San Diego, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said the bureau has made those cases its top priority. 'More than ever, the FBI must be actively engaged in combating public corruption,' Mueller said."

House Ethics Committee Hopes To Avoid Conflict With DOJ Ney, Jefferson Probes. The Washington Post (5/19, A4, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "The House ethics committee plans to quickly begin its probes into the activities of Reps. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.) while working with the Justice Department to avoid interference with federal prosecutors' investigations of the same lawmakers, according to people familiar with the panel's efforts. Yet it was not clear that the committee would have enough time to complete its work before the end of the legislative session this autumn." The Post notes that DOJ "has traditionally opposed such parallel inquiries by congressional committees for fear that lawmakers might complicate its collection of testimony and information. … Stanley Brand, a lawyer and expert on congressional ethics, said that simultaneous inquiries are 'impractical' and might put the Justice Department's efforts in jeopardy."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 7, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In Washington, this is the season of investigations into members of Congress. The ethics committee in the House has been paralyzed, dormant for over a year, because of a fight about its own rules of operation. But this week, it suddenly came to life and opened investigations into two members of Congress, perhaps with more to come." NBC (Reid) added that Ney and Jefferson are "already under investigation by federal prosecutors. Now, the House ethics committee, ending 16 months of partisan gridlock, has launched its own investigation into whether the two men accepted bribes. The allegations are serious, but longtime Congress watchdog Fred Wertheimer says these two cases are just the tip of an ethics iceberg."

Gillespie Says White House Was Told Of Intended Payment For Tobin Defense. The New Hampshire Union Leader (5/19, DiStaso) reports that ex-RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie "remembers telling someone at the White House that he had decided to have the RNC pay the legal defense bills for convicted phone-jamming conspirator James Tobin, but he can't remember who." Gillespie "told the New Hampshire Union Leader yesterday he informed the White House after he decided to authorize payment. The Washington Post reported on Wednesday that Gillespie told its reporter that he had 'informed the White House, without seeking formal approval, before authorizing the payments.' Gillespie told the Union Leader the two accounts were 'consistent' because he decided to authorize the payments before telling the White House and actually authorized the payments after telling the White House." Gillespie "yesterday told the Union Leader he could not remember who at the White House he informed of his decision to pick up Tobin's legal bills. 'I'm not going to guess,' he said. 'It was years ago, but as a matter of routine, I would have told somebody over there.' If someone at the White House had expressed displeasure with his decision, Gillespie said, 'It was too late. I had made the decision and they were not involved in it.'"

Kentucky High Court Rules Fletcher's Pardon Valid. The AP (5/19, Alford) reports, "The Kentucky Supreme Court on Thursday invalidated a string of indictments charging members of Gov. Ernie Fletcher's administration with rewarding political supporters with state jobs, leaving only the misdemeanor counts against the governor himself. Fletcher had pardoned his entire administration -- other than himself -- for any charges that could result from a probe into allegations of hiring misconduct. The state's high court said Thursday that Fletcher had the authority to issue the blanket pardon, something prosecutors had questioned. 'A gubernatorial pardon operates to cease any further legal proceeding concerning the pardon conduct including indictments,' Justice Martin Johnstone wrote in the court's 4-2 opinion. A special grand jury indicted Fletcher last week on misdemeanor charges of criminal conspiracy, official misconduct and violating a prohibition against political discrimination. It was among 29 indictments issued in the case -- 14 of which remain sealed by the court."

Former CDC Director Pleads Guilty On Padded Expense Accounts. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (5/19, Torpy) reports that Donna Stroup, former director of the Coordinating Center for Health Promotion for the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, "pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to a charge of theft of government funds for padding her travel expense accounts by an estimated $7,500."

Shootings Culminated Teen's Descent Into Madness. A front page story in the Washington Post (5/19, A1, Duggan) reports that friends of Michael W. Kennedy, who killed two police officers outside a Fairfax County police station last week, say the 18 year old "longed to have his mental health back, saying he felt tortured by strange delusions and might kill himself to find peace." The shootings "marked the end of a half-year descent from normalcy to homicidal madness. His decline began suddenly in the fall, they said, with the unexplained onset of chronic severe headaches and bouts of sleeplessness."

Deputy US Marshal Killed In Gun Battle With Police. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (5/19, Conley) reports, "A deputy U.S. marshal was shot numerous times by Memphis police before dying in an exchange of gunfire, a Shelby County Medical Examiner's report revealed Thursday. Mary Fisher, 46, died Sunday morning after she began shooting at two police officers in the driveway of her Cordova home at 1143 Palmina Cove." The Appeal adds, "The circumstances that sparked the shooting remain a mystery, and Shelby County Sheriff's deputies hope toxicology tests will help."

Homeland Security Officer Facing Murder Charge. The AP (5/18) reported, "A Department of Homeland Security officer faces a murder charge in connection with a shooting outside his apartment after authorities dismissed a lesser charge as his trial was about to begin. Douglas William Bates, 44, had been scheduled to go to trial Wednesday on a voluntary manslaughter charge, which carried a possible 11-year sentence. He now faces a sentence of 40 years to life on a second-degree murder charge with a gun enhancement, authorities said." Bates, who worked at Los Angeles International Airport, "is accused of firing his gun outside his apartment at 20-year-old Bassim Chmait after a dispute with Chmait and his friends in February of 2005."

Judge Won't Fast Track Duke Rape Case. The AP (5/19) reports that while one of the three Duke University lacrosse players charged with rape wants the case resolved in time for the next school year, Superior Court Judge Ronald L. Stephens said he will not fast track the proceedings. After the hearing, District Attorney Mike Nifong "said that he intends to try all three players together and that he does not expect any trial to begin before next year. [Reade] Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., and Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., were indicted last month on charges of raping a woman who had been hired to strip at a team party in March. A third player, co-captain David Evans, was indicted on Monday."

Fugitive Millionaire Hinckley Turns Himself In. The Des Moines Register (5/19) reports, "One of Iowa's most-wanted federal fugitives, a suspected millionaire swindler who disappeared nearly two years ago, has surrendered to federal marshals in Laredo, Texas, with only $40, a Mexican calling card and a pack of cigarettes. Federal authorities say Scott William Hinckley Sr., 57, surrendered to U.S. Marshals at the Mexican border on Sunday. Hinckley had been missing for nearly two years since he bolted from his Des Moines apartment with 33 months of probation left."

The AP (5/18, Beltran) reports, "Scott Hinckley served 47 months in prison for stealing an estimated $5.5 million from 330 investors in his Iowa and Missouri Rural Investment companies. He was released in March 2004 but missed an appointment with his parole officer four months later and had not been seen since."

DOJ Charges Online Casino Duo On 12 Counts. TechWeb (5/18, Keizer) reports on DOJ's announcement of a "dozen money-laundering charges against the fugitive owners of an online gambling Web site who walked away with a quarter of a billion dollars." William Scott and Jessica Davis "laundered some $250 million raked in by their Internet betting site, which they sold in 2003 to an Australian company, Betcorp."

Kansas Man Charges As "Kingpin" Of Fraud Scheme. KMBC-TV Kansas City (5/18, Flink) reports on its website that F. Jeffrey Miller, operator of Miller Enterprises and Star Land Development, is charged with "60 counts, including conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering" connected to "a $25 million fraud scheme." Prosecutors say he was the "kingpin of an operation that included loan officers who forged signatures, appraisers who inflated values, realtors and developers -- all allegedly designed to con banks and down-and-out home buyers out of millions of dollars."

The Kansas City Business Journal (5/19) reports Miller "is charged with one count of conspiracy, 53 counts of bank fraud and five counts of money laundering. Miller also faces one count of criminal forfeiture, in which the government seeks forfeiture of proceeds traceable to the alleged crimes, including $25 million, a residence in Stilwell, Kan., and an airplane."

Former North Carolina Lottery Commissioner Indicted For Fraud. The AP (5/18, Robertson) reports that a federal grand jury has indicted former North Carolina state lottery commissioner Kevin Geddings on fraud charges yesterday, saying he failed to disclose his work for a leading supplier of scratch-off lottery tickets. Geddings "was indicted on multiple counts of mail and wire fraud. If found guilty, he could face up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each charge, said U.S. Attorney Frank Whitney."

The Winston-Salem Journal (5/19, Ingram) reports, "The release said that the indictment 'is part of an ongoing investigation' by federal and state authorities. It did not elaborate, but several lobbyists and state officials have appeared at the federal courthouse in Raleigh on days when the grand jury was expected to meet."

Two Elderly Women Investigated For Insurance Fraud. The AP (5/18, Nguyen) reports, "Two women in their 70s were arrested Thursday for investigation of insurance fraud after they collected more than $2 million in benefits from policies issued on the lives of homeless men who were killed in hit-and-run crashes, authorities said. Police believe the women may have committed the fatal accidents and were befriending other men to set up more insurance policies. … Helen Golay, 75, and Olga Rutterschmidt, 72, allegedly paid for the men to stay in apartments for as long as two years, police said. In exchange, they obtained the victims' signatures and opened more than a dozen life insurance policies that named the women as beneficiaries. In the November 1999 and June 2005 hit-and-runs, both victims were struck in street alleys in the early morning hours and no witnesses were found, police said. In both cases, Golay and Rutterschmidt came forward claiming to be relatives or fiancees of the men."

Missing Couple Found. The Charlotte (FL) Sun-Herald (5/19) reports that police near Nashville, Tenn. Detained Shannon Gordon and Nathan Myers, who were "reported missing and endangered" by "a family member for Myers," who said they were "missing for a week" and that "family members had received anonymous calls saying Gordon had been beaten up and Myers had been killed."

New Jersey University's Records Subpoenaed. The New York Times (5/19, Smothers) reports, "Federal prosecutors subpoenaed a wide range of documents on Thursday from the southern campus of the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey as part of their investigation into allegations of corruption and patronage at the institution, a lawyer for the university said. The action came one day after F.B.I. agents raided the state university's 366-student Stratford campus to stop the shredding of documents in the office of Warren S. Wallace, the senior associate dean for academic and student affairs at the School of Osteopathic Medicine."

Tax Fraud Nets Eight Years In Jail. The Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal (5/19) reports, "David Carroll Stephenson of Tacoma was sentenced to eight years in jail" and "ordered to pay $8.5 million in restitution to the IRS" after his conviction on "conspiring to defraud the United States and for not filing income tax returns for three years." He "formed and operated 'pure equity trusts,' where he told his clients to place their money so they could avoid paying income taxes." John Imhoff Jr., acting IRS chief, criminal investigation, released a statement that said the case, "should serve as a warning that taxpayers should be wary of tax planning arrangements that claim to drastically reduce or eliminate their tax liability while still allowing them unlimited access to their money."

Ex-Old Mutual Manager Makes Guilty Plea On Fraud Charges. The Baltimore Business Journal (5/19) reports that Bryn D. Phillips, a former treasury operations manager at Old Mutual Financial Network, "pleaded guilty to" one count of bank fraud and one count of mail fraud" alleging "she defrauded Old Mutual and banks of more than $850,000." She took the money "by falsely representing to

Wachovia Bank that she had authority to transfer money from Old Mutual bank accounts into accounts that she controlled."

California Panel Calls For Recording Of Police Interrogations. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Hong) reports the California Commission on the Fair Administration of Justice "called for police to tape interrogations of crime suspects in serious felonies and to videotape homicide interrogations. The proposal is meant to prevent wrongful convictions." The panel "called on the Legislature to mandate the taping through a new statute. Under the law, if interrogations are not recorded, jurors would be instructed to view confessions with caution."

CIVIL LAW:

Povich Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Sexual Harassment Case. The AP (5/18) reports, "Lawyers for television talk-show host Maury Povich have asked a court to dismiss a $100 million sex harassment lawsuit against him and members of his staff and to compel the producer who filed it to arbitrate the dispute. Bianca Nardi, 28, of Fort Lee, N.J., complained in a lawsuit filed last month that some of her supervisors at The Maury Povich Show barraged her with sexual remarks and made her watch pornographic movies, wear revealing clothing and expose her body. … The lawsuit names Povich, NBC Universal Television Inc. and Povich's production company, Mopo, among others, as defendants."

Amazon.com Online Order Patent To Face Review. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, B2, Clark) reports, "The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has agreed to re-examine Amazon.com Inc.'s high-profile patent on 'one-click' online shopping, after" Peter Calveley, an actor from New Zealand, "claimed there were possible prior inventions in the field." An agency examiner ruled that the re-examination "raised a 'substantial new question of patentability' affecting Amazon's patent."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Supreme Court Finds No Misconduct By Late Judge. The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Dolan) reports the California Supreme Court "rejected claims that a judge advised a prosecutor to remove prospective jurors from a death penalty trial because they were Jewish. The justices found insufficient evidence of misconduct by Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde, who died in 1998. A misconduct finding could have led the courts to overturn dozens of death sentences." The court "also discounted claims that the Alameda County district attorney had a policy of barring not only Jews but also African American women from death penalty juries. A former Alameda County prosecutor had alleged that Golde, who was Jewish, had advised removing Jewish jurors because of their perceived aversion to the death penalty."

Judge Rejects Tennessee Senator's Claim Of Racial Bias In FBI Probe. The Memphis Commercial-Appeal (5/19, Buser) reports US District Judge Jon McCalla yesterday "rejected former state senator Roscoe Dixon's claims of unfair selective prosecution and refused to delay his upcoming Tennessee Waltz public corruption trial. … McCalla said federal prosecutors have 'broad discretion' to enforce federal laws within boundaries set by the constitution. He said that Dixon's claim of race-based prosecution in the FBI sting operation is not supported by any evidence that there are non-black individuals who could have been prosecuted for similar offenses but were not." The AP (5/19, Baird) adds that "McCalla rejected a petition to dismiss the bribery and extortion charges…or to delay his trial set for May 30. In that petition, Dixon claimed he is the victim of selective prosecution because he is black. … Dixon also sought more access to government files to search for evidence of racial bias and for a trial delay until October. McCalla rejected those requests, too."

West Virginia To Seek Compensation For Election Systems Costs. The AP (5/18) reports that West Virginia "Secretary of State Betty Ireland is asking county clerks to submit detailed information about how much voting machine snafus cost them," which will "be used to seek compensation from Election Systems & Software." The day after the primary, "Ireland complained to federal officials… blaming the voting machine vendor for 'vast delays' and 'broken promises.'"

Charges Dropped Against Mother In Mall Incident. The Columbia (MO) Tribune (5/18, Agnew) reports, "Charges have been dropped against a Columbia mother who was wrestled to the floor and handcuffed by Columbia police officers trying to contain a disturbance at the Columbia Mall. The incident was one of several involving Columbia police and black residents described last month to a U.S. Department of Justice official during a meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Columbia attorney David Tyson Smith said his client, Alva Scott, who is black, was simply trying to protect her children and leave the mall when officers prevented her from returning to her children, ages 2 and 8. Scott was eventually arrested and charged with trespassing, assaulting a police officer and resisting arrest."

GOP Constituents' Letters Seeking Probe Of NAACP Were Forwarded To IRS. The AP (5/19) reports that several Congressional Republicans "forwarded constituents' letters to the" IRS "claiming the NAACP had veered into political advocacy, a potential violation of the civil rights group's tax-exempt status, according to documents released by the NAACP." The IRS began scrutinizing the NAACP "about a month before the 2004 presidential election after a speech by NAACP Chairman Julian Bond that was largely critical of President Bush's policies. Political campaigning is prohibited under the NAACP's tax-exempt status. The IRS said its inquiry would focus on whether Bond's speech was too political." The NAACP "received more than 500 pages of documents the IRS has gathered to begin its inquiry and posted them on its Web site. … The documents include letters that members of Congress sent to the IRS on behalf of their constituents. The lawmakers include Sens. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee and Susan M. Collins of Maine, Rep. Jo Ann Davis of Virginia, the late Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and former Reps. Larry Combest of Texas and Joe Scarborough of Florida. All are Republicans. Spokespeople for those members of Congress still in office said they simply forwarded the concerns of their constituents, as they would for any constituent, and took no position on the issue."

Southern Lawmakers Block Voting Rights Act Renewal. The Dallas Morning News (5/19, Gillman) reports, "A revolt by Texas Republicans and other Southern lawmakers is threatening the Voting Rights Act, the landmark civil-rights law enacted to overcome the legacy of poll taxes and literacy tests. House leaders planned a routine vote this week to extend the LBJ-era law for 25 years, avoiding a potentially ugly eruption of racial politics. But a Georgia-Texas coalition of conservatives slammed on the brakes, angry over the special regulatory burdens of the act."

Georgia DA's Office Faces Discrimination Charges. The Jonesboro (GA) News-Daily (5/19, Boron) reports, "The Clayton County District Attorney's office has been hit with a trio of discrimination claims from current and former employees, at least one of whom has named the top assistant prosecutor in the office, John Turner, for retaliation and discrimination against a minority woman. The allegations come during the first term of Jewel Scott, the county's first black district attorney. … Two victims advocates — Andrea Rhymes, who is black, and Rebecca Miller, who is Latino — allege in formal complaints they were retaliated against. Rhymes alleges it was on the basis of race and a disability. Miller alleges it was on the basis of sex and national origin."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Antitrust Division To investigation Florida Utility Contracts. The Southwest Florida News-Press (5/19, Ruane) reports that the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department will run the "federal investigation of Cape Coral utilities contracts" to "extended water, sewer and irrigation lines into portions of southwest Cape Coral." These projects are "controversial among residents," who "turned out in large numbers at City Council meetings to protest the $12,000 assessments they received to pay for" them.

Knight Vinke Drops Opposition To VNU Deal. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, C3, Singer) reports that Valcon Acquisition BV, A group of six private-equity firms, "is likely to win its €7.7 billion ($9.82 billion) takeover bid for Dutch media giant VNU NV as activist shareholder Knight Vinke Asset Management LLC, leader of a revolt against the bid, has thrown in the towel and said it will tender its shares by the Friday deadline." This "was the first time a big private-equity buyout, agreed to on friendly terms, met opposition from shareholders threatening to reject it and impose their own plan for turning around the firm," one offered by Knight Vinke. However, Valcon "raised its offer by 2.6% to €29.50 a share," and "the higher price, combined with the difficulty and time that would be needed to implement the Knight Vinke plan, led many shareholders that had been backing Mr. Knight to defect and say they would accept the offer."

Symantec Sues Microsoft Over Volume Manager Software. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, B4, Richmond) reports, "Symantec Corp. sued Microsoft Corp. on Thursday, citing misappropriation of intellectual property and breach of contract." The suit "involves Symantec's Volume Manager product, software it acquired with its purchase of Veritas Software Corp. Volume Manager allows operating systems to store and manipulate large amounts of data and protect systems from data loss when storage hardware fails. Symantec alleged that Microsoft, which had licensed the Volume Management technology from Veritas, violated terms of its license agreement by using the technology to develop competing features and products."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Says US, Mexico Developing Joint Meth Trafficking Strategy. The Washington Times (5/19, Seper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said the United States and Mexico are developing a strategy to attack large methamphetamine trafficking organizations operating on both sides of the border. Mr. Gonzales, speaking at a National Methamphetamine Chemical Initiative conference in Dallas, said the two countries had reached an agreement for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the Mexican government to establish specialized anti-meth enforcement teams." Gonzales said strong US demand for methamphetamines "is fueling its production and that the public needs to be better informed about its dangers. He said the trafficking organizations combine the 'sophistication of a contemporary corporation with the brutality of a street gang.'"

CNSNews.com (5/19) reports, "Appearing with the Mexican attorney general at a conference in Dallas, Gonzales stressed the importance of international cooperation in fighting meth production and trafficking. 'Approximately 80 percent of all meth purchases in the U.S. originate from Mexican labs,' Gonzales said. 'Accordingly, we are refocusing our investigative resources on large meth trafficking organizations. DEA enforcement teams will now concentrate on meth transportation and distribution cells in the U.S. and Mexico.'"

WFAA-TV Dallas (5/18, 5:07 p.m.) reported, "The US and Mexico are joining forces to fight the growing meth trade. Today, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Mexican counterpart announced the plan to go after traffickers. About 80% of the meth distributed here is now made south of the border. US drug enforcement agents will train about 1,000 Mexican police, Specialized teams will then focus on breaking up the most wanted meth gangs."

Gonzales Praises Grants To Fight Gangs. The AP (5/18) reports that at a news conference in Dallas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "praised federal grants intended to combat gangs, saying it is never too late to help youths. … The Dallas-Fort Worth metroplex was awarded $2.5 million in March as part a $15 million pilot program that includes equal grants to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Cleveland; Milwaukee and other cities deemed to have serious gang problems. The money will go to prevention, enforcement and rehabilitation of former gang members."

Six High-Ranking Gang Members Caught By Operation Triggertown. The Chicago Sun-Times News Group (5/18) reports, "Federal and local authorities on Thursday announced" that "a six-month investigation dubbed 'Operation Triggertown'" lead to "the arrest of six high-ranking gang members and drug traffickers:" Rashod "Fatman" Bethany, Quenten Hawkins, Shannon Evans, Charles "TuTu" Golden, Roosevelt "Jimmy Mac" Adams, and Rickey "L'il Rickey" Long. Conducted by both Chicago police's Narcotics and Gang Investigation Section and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the operation involved "undercover buys and police used a variety of electronic and technical devices that assisted the investigation."

FBI Continues Intense Search For Hoffa's Remains On Michigan Farm. FBI agents continued their search for Jimmy Hoffa's remains at a Michigan horse farm yesterday, and the story garnered even heavier media coverage than on Wednesday evening TV and in yesterday's newspapers. FBI Detroit SAC Daniel Roberts held a briefing for reporters yesterday, and every print and network news story included at least one of his comments, "In the last two years, I've been here as the agent in charge, this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation," and "You can see from the amount of FBI and police department personnel out here that this is probably a fairly credible lead."

ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 9, 2:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The FBI began digging yesterday, not far from where the legendary former Teamsters union boss disappeared." ABC (Reynolds) added, "With the help of architects, anthropologists, and archaeologists, the FBI acted on what is clearly a very compelling tip." SAC Daniel Roberts: "In the last two years, I've been here as the agent in charge, this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation. … We plan to be out here for probably a couple of weeks, at least." Reynolds: "No discoveries today. And local residents remain pretty skeptical." The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 2, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported that "the FBI has a new tip that he may be buried near where he was last seen alive in Michigan." CBS (Stewart) added, "Law enforcement officials suggest it's the best lead they've had in years…and are prepared to dig here for up to two weeks to check it out." Roberts: "You can see from the amount of FBI and police department personnel out here that this is probably a fairly credible lead." Stewart: "Law enforcement officials say several months ago, a jailed informant offered detailed information that Hoffa was buried on the farm, near a large barn," and "the prisoner's information was checked several ways, officials said, including polygraph tests."

NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 5, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "When we entered this new century, there were two enduring mystery in the American life left over from the last century: the identity of Deep Throat and the location of Jimmy Hoffa. We now know the answer to the first one and it's possible we may soon know the second as a huge dig is underway tonight in a farm in suburban Michigan." NBC also shows Roberts saying, "In the last two years I've been here as the agent in charge, this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation." In a very widely-distributed story, the AP (5/19, Krisher) adds, "A law enforcement official in Washington said the latest search was based on information developed several years ago and verified more recently. Among other things, there was a high level of suspicious activity on the farm the day Hoffa vanished, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The Detroit News (5/19, Wisely) reports, "The farm once was owned by Rolland McMaster, often described at Hoffa's right-hand man in the union. McMaster was not in Michigan at the time of Hoffa's…disappearance from the Machus Red Fox restaurant, said Mayer Morganroth, McMaster's attorney. … 'They went through that place with a fine-toothed comb in 1975,' Morganroth said. 'There is nothing there. It is ridiculous.'" In a story widely-distributed by Knight Ridder, The Detroit Free Press (5/19, Ashenfelter, Swickard) adds, "The tip that Hoffa was buried on the farm came from Donovan Wells, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison two years ago in a marijuana smuggling scheme." He "is a former associate of McMaster, who was a top Detroit Teamsters official until a reputed falling-out with Hoffa in the late 1960s. ... During an interview Thursday, McMaster said that account was worthy of a drug-addled imagination," and "some old Hoffa hands were skeptical of the new tip. Retired FBI agent John Anthony said the horse farm is a new theory to him, and doubted its value: 'Even if they find something, will it be able to lead to a prosecution?'"

Under the headline "Hoffa Tip 'Fairly Credible,' FBI Says," The Washington Post (5/19, A8, Lengel, 744K) reports, "Authorities said the latest search for Hoffa is the most intensive in decades. Privately, some expressed skepticism, though they said the information is credible enough to pursue." The New York Times (5/19, Maynard, Bunkley, 1.19M) notes, "The latest search is the third in the past two years by the F.B.I. in the Detroit area. Mr. Roberts acknowledged those efforts, saying, 'We do not leave any leads uncovered, obviously.' Or any stones unturned, apparently. He said the F.B.I. might have to move a barn in order to dig for evidence of Mr. Hoffa's remains." The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Jones, 643K) adds that "the FBI, by all appearances, seems determined to exhaust this latest lead. Graduate students schooled in geology will be used to determine whether the earth has been removed and then replaced, Roberts said. If anything is found they will check for a DNA match."

WXYZ-TV Detroit, WWJ-TV Detroit, WDIV-TV Detroit and WJRT-TV Flint, among other local TV stations across Michigan, covered the FBI search yesterday. The story also was prominently reported on cable news programs last night, including CNN's American Morning, CNN's Paula Zahn Now, MSNBC's Countdown with Keith Olbermann, MSNBC's Abrams Report, MSNBC's Scarborough Country, FOX News' Live PM, FOX News's Big Story with John Gibson and FOX News' Studio B with Shepard Smith.

Neighbors Say Mobsters Used To Gather At Farm, Until Hoffa Disappeared. The CBS Evening News (5/18, story 3, 0:55, Alfonsi, 7.66M) also reported from the scene, "We can actually see a fresh pile of dirt that earlier they had some police tape around. And I was talking to neighbors out here. They told me this old horse farm is a place where mobsters used to come and have lunch, an out-of-the-way spot. They say after Jimmy Hoffa disappeared, the lunches stopped and they saw a backhoe show up on the property. … There's about 50 FBI agents out here right now. We also learned that a famous forensic anthropologist from Michigan State University by the name of Norman Sauer is out here. I spoke to him on the phone, he confirms he's out here with seven students today. So, it's a little like CSI but in the country."

New Technology Expected To Aid Search. The Detroit News (5/19, Donnelly) reports that the geologists and forensic anthropologists working at the site "have at their command technology that wasn't around when the former Teamster leader disappeared 31 years ago. … If any human remains are located, modern DNA testing may be used for comparison with Hoffa's genetic code. The FBI wouldn't discuss the search in detail but a Colorado expert who heads a team of scientists that searches for bodies said today's technology will save police a lot of time. … Should searchers come across bones, forensic anthropologists from Michigan State University will quickly be able to tell whether they are human or animal," and "since the FBI is searching a horse farm, they're likely to come across many bones of horses."

FBI Investigating USAF Generals Over Thunderbirds Contract. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 4, 2:50, Vargas, 8.78M) reported that an investigation of the US Air Force Thunderbirds has "the FBI and the Pentagon inspector general reaching into the highest ranks of the military. They involve Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley, the man he replaced." ABC (Ross) added, "The FBI's investigation is focused on a $49 million contract for an audio/visual system for spectators that the Thunderbirds have said they didn't ask for, but that was pushed through at the Pentagon anyway. … Documents submitted to the Air Force and obtained by ABC News show the contract went to a company partially owned by a recently-retired four-star General, Hal Hornburg, who…had been in charge of the Thunderbirds and initially requested the improved audio/visual system." Hornburg "says he did not get involved in soliciting the contract until a year after he left the military, as provided by law. But a document obtained by ABC News from the US Trademark office shows the General was listed as co-owner of the company just six months after he retired. The general says that was an error."

Newark FBI Agents To Meet With Egyptian-American Group. The AP (5/19, Parry) reports, "In September, a group of Muslim men praying near the main air intake duct at Giants Stadium was detained by suspicious FBI agents. On Saturday, the federal agency and an Egyptian-American group plan to meet at the stadium in the latest FBI push to recruit Arab-Americans and repair relations strained in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks. 'It's an effort to build bridges with this community,' said Les Wiser Jr., special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark bureau, who has made improving ties with New Jersey's Muslim community a priority. 'We think it's important for them to get to know us. We're fighting perceptions we think are skewed against us.'" Egyptian American Group member Suzanne Loutfy noted, "We were afraid of them, and they were suspicious of us. It was thought by many people that the FBI is the enemy. That's the perception we're fighting against."

Detective Testifies NYPD Recruited Him As "Walking Camera" Among Muslims. The New York Times (5/19, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "A young police detective testified yesterday at the Herald Square bombing plot trial that he was recruited from the Police Academy 13 months after 9/11 to work deep undercover in the Muslim community to investigate Islamic extremists." The Bangladeshi immigrant, identified only by his alias, Kamil Pasha, "took an apartment in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, where, he testified, his assignment was to be a 'walking camera' among Muslims there." Over two years, "he was involved in 'numerous' investigations, he testified, and was at times shadowed by a field team to ensure his safety." The Times notes, "His testimony confirmed what many Muslims have believed since the Sept. 11 attacks: that law enforcement agencies have worked to infiltrate their community during terrorism investigations. … He said he was told 'never to push for information,' but instead to 'take a back seat' and 'observe, be the ears and eyes.'" The AP (5/19, Hays) adds, "One place he hung out was an Islamic bookstore near a Brooklyn mosque, where he said he heard" Shahawar Matin Siraj "openly praise Osama bin Laden while damning the U.S."

Grand Jury Doesn't Indict In Police Attacker's Death. The Baton Rouge Advocate (5/19, Angelette) reports, "A grand jury Thursday decided against charging anyone in the death of motorist George Temple II," who was "shot and killed by" Perry Stephens, a civilian Stephens "came to help the officer" after Temple fought the officer when he was arrested. "The U.S. Justice Department is still investigating the case."

New York Measure Would Require DNA Samples For All Convicts. The Christian Science Monitor (5/19, Scherer) reports that under a proposal being considered by state lawmakers, New York "would be the first state in the nation to require DNA samples for all convicted offenders. Gov. George Pataki (R), who is asking the Legislature to expand DNA collection, argues that a larger database will help solve more crimes. Supporters add it will help solve future crimes because criminals who start off committing petty crimes sometimes graduate to more serious offenses." The New York proposal would require "DNA collection for all convicted of misdemeanors. This would add about 80,000 additional DNA profiles per year to the DNA bank, say researchers at the state's Division of Criminal Justice."

States Seek To Bar Marketing Of "Little Cigars." The Washington Post (5/19, D1, Day) reports, "Forty states have asked the U.S. Treasury Department to bar tobacco companies from marketing products they say are identical to cigarettes as 'little cigars,' a designation the states say lets the firms evade taxes and target younger consumers. Attorneys general from the 40 states, including Maryland, want the department's Alcohol and Tobacco Tax and Trade Bureau to reverse decades-old rules that permit products the size, shape and weight of cigarettes, but have brown rather than white wrappers, to be labeled as little cigars. … The 'little cigar' label allows the companies to pay lower federal and state taxes, and to avoid payments and advertising restrictions required for cigarettes under the 1998 master agreement between tobacco companies and all 50 states, according to the petition for rule changes."

Chicago FBI Informant Slain During Weapons Sting. The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Rybarczyk, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "An FBI-orchestrated weapons buy in a Dolton parking lot went awry late Wednesday, leading to the fatal shooting of an informant who was wearing a wire and being watched by surveillance teams, officials said. … FBI agents watched as the man meeting" informant Timothy Forrest "exited his vehicle and got into Forrest's car. They did not suspect anything amiss until the man hurried away and drove off, officials said. The suspect's name was known to investigators, who captured him more than 10 hours later at a house in Alsip. He was being held for questioning Thursday night." The Tribune notes, "FBI Special Agent Tom Simon said every safety precaution was taken as the weapons buy was set up, but events like this happen 'once every blue moon.' … FBI spokesman Frank Bochte confirmed that Forrest was wearing a wire but said the gunshots were inaudible to those listening." The Chicago Sun-Times (5/19, Main) notes, "The FBI's Evidence Response Team was helping Dolton police process the murder scene, officials said. In 2003, an FBI informant committed suicide while wearing a hidden recording device outside the police station in south suburban Chicago Heights. Otis Moore, 43, died of a bullet wound to the mouth, the medical examiner's office said. … He was key to a federal corruption investigation that led to the 1995 racketeering conviction of Sam Mangialardi, Chicago Heights' deputy police chief."

WMAQ-TV Chicago (5/18, Rogers), WBBM-TV Chicago (5/18, Hartman) and WLS-TV Chicago (5/18, Bradley) also reported on the informant's murder and noting Moore's 2003 suicide.

Reporting On Operation Twin Oceans Continues. The UK's Guardian (5/19) reports, "By the end of the operation, more than 100 people in nine different countries had been taken into custody, including one of the big cheeses in the cocaine trade, the Colombian-born Pablo Rayo-Montano, known as El Tio (the uncle) who was captured in Brazil. The prime catch, as far as the DEA officials and their colleagues in Brazil were concerned, was Rayo-Montano, who had been on the run for 10 years."

The UK's Telegraph (5/19) writes, "Colombia's biggest drug baron has been captured in Brazil in a raid that stretched from Indianapolis to the Pacific Coast of Panama and involved police forces in nine different countries. 'Don Pablo' Rayo-Montano, 46, successor to the late Pablo Escobar, had been on the run for a decade before he was caught by American drug enforcement agents at his hideout in Sao Paulo. Thirty-six of his henchmen were apprehended in simultaneous raids in Miami, Indianapolis and Los Angeles."

Australia's Daily Telegraph (5/19) notes Rayo-Montano's arrest, saying it toppled an empire that "used submarines to put 15 tons of cocaine a month into the U.S. and Europe." On its Web site, Australia's Melbourne Herald Sun (5/19) posts a similar but longer story attributed to the AP.

More Than 400 Arrested In Seattle Drug Investigation. The Seattle Times (5/18) reports DEA Special Agent in Charge Rodney Benson and others yesterday announced the arrests of 403 people, including 14 juveniles, since mid-September. "Of those arrested, 239 had prior drug arrests, and of those, 39 had been arrested 10 or more times for drug violations, 86 were considered violent drug offenders, and 46 had been previously charged for weapons violations. At least 25 of the arrestees admitted they were members of gangs," according to Benson.

Public Defender Criticizes Operation. The Seattle Post Intelligencer (5/19) reports, "While police were proud of the joint effort and community members pleased to see drug dealers get arrested, there were critics of the operation. 'What the Seattle Police Department, as well as the DEA, is interested in doing is the same old failed policies toward drug enforcement,' said Sunil Abraham, a local public defender. Abraham and his colleagues argue that 'buy-bust' operations, by focusing on street dealers, unfairly target minorities and the poor -- ignoring drug sales in other neighborhoods or behind closed doors."

Indiana Woman Faces Drug, Money Laundering Charges Following Sting. The Indianapolis Star (5/18) reports, "A 32-year-old Plainfield woman was among those arrested in a multination drug sting this week. Monica Patricia Ruiz-Matorel faces four counts: importation of drugs, conspiracy to distribute, smuggling and money laundering. The money-laundering component of the charges involves about $150 million in assets, said Steve Robertson, a special agent with the Drug Enforcement Agency at its Washington headquarters."

Sentencing Delayed In Rhode Island For Accused Mob Associate. The Providence (RI) Journal (5/19, Stanton) reports the case of Alan Blamires, "the mob associate caught guarding a shipment of cocaine in an undercover FBI sting, encountered another detour yesterday. … Some confusion over the value of cooperation that Blamires…has provided the authorities prompted Chief U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres, reluctantly, to postpone the sentencing." The Journal reports Blamires has claimed to have "pertinent information" regarding lawyer Joseph Bevilacqua, who also has been a target of an investigation by the DEA.

DEA Agents' Work In "Operation Royal Flush" Recognized In Rhode Island. The Providence (RI) Journal (5/19, Smith) reports on Operation Royal Flush in which "a slew of federal and state law enforcement agencies cooperated in 2003-2004, and the Providence police made the largest single seizure of cocaine in department history in 2004: Nearly 23 kilos worth an estimated $575,000, which had been stashed in a minivan." In connection with the case, the Journal says the work of three members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration was noted. They include special agents Anthony Cardello and Kathleen Kelleher and intelligence analyst Andrea Metz.

Accused Pennsylvania Cocaine Trafficker Is Arrested. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (5/19, Ward) reports a man who federal authorities "say has been selling large amounts of cocaine for years in New Castle was arrested this week. Dion Mercer, 37, has been charged with one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 50 grams of crack. According to a six-page affidavit filed by a Drug Enforcement Administration agent, Mr. Mercer has been selling large quantities of cocaine for four years."

Supreme Court Seen As Deeply Divided On Detroit Drug-Search Case. According to The New York Times (5/19, Greenhouse), a second hearing on a Detroit drug-search case has shown "deep divisions" among U.S. Supreme Court justices. For example, the Times says Justice Breyer "proceeded to make it clear that he remained unpersuaded by [the] argument that the Michigan Court of Appeals was correct in refusing to exclude from Booker T. Hudson's trial the drugs the police found when they executed a search warrant by bursting into his home without knocking or waiting for him to open the apparently unlocked door. … Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. also appeared firmly in the state's camp. He asked…what difference it would have made had the police waited 15 or 20 seconds instead of 3 or 4 after announcing their presence." Hudson had been found guilty of drug possession and was given18 months' probation.

Alito Expected To Be Deciding Vote On Detroit Fourth Amendment Case. The New York Times (5/19, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports it "did not take very long during the Supreme Court's final argument of its term on Thursday to see why the court had decided to schedule a second hearing in this less-than-monumental case about a search for illegal drugs in a Detroit home. The justices were deeply engaged, and deeply split." It is "a logical inference that they were deadlocked at 4 to 4 after the first argument on Jan. 9, and that it is now up to Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who took his seat later that month, to break the tie." Justice Stephen Breyer made "it clear that he remained unpersuaded" by Wayne County prosecutor Timothy A. Baughman's "argument that the Michigan Court of Appeals was correct in refusing to exclude from Booker T. Hudson's trial the drugs the police found when they executed a search warrant by bursting into his home without knocking or waiting for him to open the apparently unlocked door." This "means of entry violated the 'knock and announce' rule that modern Supreme Court precedents have made part of the current understanding of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable search and seizure. There was no dispute that the Detroit officers' action violated the rule. The question for the justices was what consequences should flow from the violation."

The Washington Post (5/19, A11, Lane, 744K) reports the court "heard a rare mid-May oral argument yesterday, on the authority of police to search private homes without knocking first -- in a major privacy-rights case likely to be decided by the vote of the court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr." Liberals on the court "openly worried that Michigan's approach would carry the day -- effectively gutting the 'knock and announce' rule and, potentially, other restrictions on police searches." Michigan "does not dispute that the officers technically violated the 'knock and announce' rule. It argues, rather, that since they had a warrant, their presence in the house was legal even if the way they got inside was not."

IMMIGRATION:

Many Immigrant Smugglers Are Never Prosecuted. The AP (5/19, Spagat) reports that an internal Border Patrol document shows that the vast majority of people caught smuggling immigrants into the US across the border near San Diego are never prosecuted for the offense. According to the AP, "The report offers a stark assessment of the situation at a Border Patrol station responsible for guarding 13 miles of mountainous border east of the city. Federal officials say it reflects a reality along the entire 2,000-mile border: Judges and federal attorneys are so swamped that only the most egregious smuggling cases are prosecuted."

Additional Suspected Illegal Immigrants Caught In Kentucky. the Cincinnati Enquirer (5/19, Hannah) reports, "U.S. Marshals have detained more suspected illegal aliens as part of an ongoing investigation into the use of laborers in Northern Kentucky's home-building industry." Fort Mitchell police Chief Steve Hensley said "officers found the suspected illegal aliens while helping federal agents serve a search warrant at one of the apartments" in the 2500 block of Kirkland Court. "Last week, 76 suspected illegal aliens were arrested as part of the two-year investigation."

Bush Declares Support For Border Fence In Visit To Yuma, Arizona. President Bush yesterday visited Yuma, Arizona, yesterday, to highlight his immigration reform proposals. Much of the reporting from national papers this morning notes the President stated his backing for building some fences along parts of the US-Mexico border. While in Yuma, says the New York Times (5/19, Bumiller, 1.19M), the President "declared that he supported fencing some but not all of America's 1,950-mile border with Mexico." Bush said in his speech, "It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job." Bush, adds the Times, "has in the past indicated he is opposed to fencing, and White House officials were kept busy on Thursday trying to explain the change in his position. Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One that the White House supported a Senate amendment, passed on Wednesday, that would build 370 miles of fence in areas most often used by smugglers and illegal workers. 'We don't think you fence off the entire border,' Mr. Snow said. But, he added, 'there are places when fences are appropriate.'" The AP (5/19, Loven) reports on the fence issue, and says that "eager to win over conservative opponents, the president has been talking increasingly tough."

The Washington Times (5/19, Dinan, 90K) reports "the Bush administration announced yesterday it supported the Senate amendment calling for 370 miles of fence along the US-Mexico border, marking the first time it is has endorsed a specific amount of fencing." During his speech, says the Times, Bush said, "It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Kronholz, Lueck, Dreazen, 2.11M) adds that "almost no one disagrees with Mr. Bush that the border needs reinforcing," and the President "made a further bow to his conservative base by supporting a Senate call to build a fence along more than 300 miles of the 1,951-mile border." The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Gerstenzang, 958K) notes, "As Bush headed to Yuma Thursday morning, the White House sent to Congress a revision in its $92-billion request for emergency spending, most of it to cover costs associated with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. Within that amount, it is seeking $1.95 billion to meet the costs of deploying 1,000 new Border Patrol agents, and for fences, lights, and some of the border work of the National Guard." Snow "said the Border Patrol's Yuma sector was 'emblematic of what we're talking about in terms of border security.'" He also told reporters aboard Air Force One, "We've got an area with the fence; we've got Border Patrol there. But also this is an area where National Guardsmen are involved in non-law-enforcement roles."

The Chicago Tribune (5/19, Silva, 643K) reports Bush "has assumed a potentially perilous political role, with his own public approval ratings already at all-time lows." He "is attempting to mediate between the conservative base of the GOP, which has no patience for the president's talk of enabling millions of undocumented immigrants already living in the United States to eventually seek citizenship, and a fast-growing and traditionally Democratic-voting Hispanic population." The President "has worked hard to woo Hispanics since his days as Texas governor." USA Today (5/19, Jackson, 2.31M) notes, "The flight aboard Air Force One underscored GOP differences. Bush's guests included Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., who wants a law enforcement bill only." Hayworth "said he and Bush have profound disagreements.' 'I don't believe the House will accede to his wishes on a "guest worker" program, despite his recent protestations to the contrary,' Hayworth said."

Chertoff Emphasizes Surveillance Role For National Guard. DHS Secretary Chertoff traveled to El Paso yesterday where he discussed the administration's immigration strategy, while President Bush visited Yuma, Arizona. Most regional papers covering Chertoff's visit are focusing on his statements that the National Guard would not engage in law enforcement while working on the US-Mexico border. The Dallas Morning News (5/19, Mittelstadt) reports, "President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff traveled to the US-Mexico border Thursday in a push to convince the public – and conservatives in Congress – that they're serious about beefing up efforts to halt illegal immigration." On his way to El Paso, Secretary Chertoff said the president's plan to put National Guard troops at the US-Mexico border "offers a 'turbocharged' boost to the strategy of taming illegal immigration with a mix of added manpower, high-tech surveillance and the guest worker program." At Fort Bliss, Chertoff told reporters the Guard will be "using their eyes and…their binoculars and all the high-tech equipment they have to identify groups of migrants that are crossing."

In an article appearing on news websites in the Southwest, the AP (5/19, Caldwell) reports Chertoff "assured border residents" that the Guard plan "was 'enhancing or scaling up' operations that have long been in place as a backup for US Border Patrol agents."

The Las Cruces Sun-News (5/19, Ramirez) reports that at Fort Bliss, where he met with "with officials of Joint Task Force North," Chertoff said "that not much will change with daily security operations along the border with Mexico, even with the addition of 6,000 National Guard troops." He "emphasized that the Guard troops would have no law enforcement authority, and would mostly be used for administrative and surveillance duties along the border."

Senate Votes To Make English "National Language." Knight Ridder (5/18, James) reports that the Senate yesterday voted to make English the national language of the US. The 63-34 vote "came after an impassioned debate in which the word 'racist' was used on the Senate floor to describe the effort. It was the first time in U.S. history that the Senate had passed such legislation. More negotiations on the final bill are expected, but if a 'national language' measure cleared both the Senate and House and was signed by President Bush, it could mean a greater emphasis on the federal government providing its services in English."

The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Muskal, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "English would be declared the 'national language' of the United States under a measure approved by the Senate today, a largely symbolic move that supporters said would promote unity and ensure assimilation by immigrants." The Senate "passed two amendments, one Democratic and one Republican. The Democratic version is more specific on protecting translation and bilingual services." The GOP-backed amendment, "which passed 63 to 34, would allow the government to continue to offer publications and services -- such as bilingual ballots -- in languages other than English."

It "would require all illegal immigrants seeking to legalize their status in the United States to pass English proficiency tests and would offer guidelines to the Department of Homeland Security for a revised citizenship test."

The AP (5/19, Espo) reports Sen. Jim Inhoffe "led the attempt to declare English the national language, a campaign he said began more than a century ago. The Oklahoma Republican quoted President Theodore Roosevelt as having said that among other things, those living in the United States 'must also learn one language and that language is English.'" Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said of the amendment, "I really believe this amendment is racist. I think it's directed basically to people who speak Spanish." Sen. Ken Salazar, a Democrat, "advanced the alternative that declared English to be a 'common and unifying language.'" It "passed, 58-39, leaving the outcome of the symbolic debate uncertain." Knight Ridder (5/19, Montgomery) adds that Salazar, "one of three Hispanic senators, whose family settled in Colorado before it became a state, asserted that the Inhofe amendment threatened a return 'to the dark days of American history' when Hispanic children were punished for speaking Spanish in school, sometimes by having soap thrust in their mouths."

The New York Times (5/19, Hulse, 1.19M) calls Salazar's amendment "a weaker, less-binding alternative." The House "did not include a similar provision on English in the legislation it passed in December, but there is strong support among House Republicans for such a move." AFP (5/19) notes the House of Representatives "is considering similar legislation presented by Iowa Republican Steve King. It already has the backing of 150 representatives."

Senate Kills Amendment Blocking Temporary Workers' Eventual Citizenship. The Washington Post (5/19, A1, Weisman, VandeHei, 744K) reports by 58 to 35, the Senate "killed an amendment that would have blocked eventual citizenship for future immigrants who arrive under a temporary work permit. Democrats and Republicans agreed that the amendment would have destroyed the fragile, bipartisan coalition backing the Senate bill."

Senate Allows Immigrants To Get Social Security Earned While Illegally In US. The Washington Times (5/19, Hurt, 90K) reports, "The Senate voted yesterday to allow illegal aliens to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal employment -- even if the job was obtained through forged or stolen documents. There was a felony they were committing, and now they can't be prosecuted. That sounds like amnesty to me,' said Sen. John Ensign, the Nevada Republican who offered the amendment yesterday to strip out those provisions of the immigration reform bill." Sen. John McCain replaied, "We all know that millions of undocumented immigrants pay Social Security and Medicare taxes for years and sometimes decades while they work to contribute to our economy. … The Ensign amendment would undermine the work of these people by preventing lawfully present immigrant workers from claiming Social Security benefits that they earned before they were authorized to work in our community."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Blames Approval Numbers On War; Laughs Off Comparison To Nixon. NBC Nightly News (5/18, story 2, 3:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported President Bush yesterday "brushed off the fact that his poll ratings are now similar to Richard Nixon's when he resigned the Presidency." Gregory: "You're laughing. Why do you -- " President Bush: "I'm not laughing, I just – " Gregory: "Why do you think that is?" President Bush: "Because we're at war. And war unsettles people." Gregory: "Do you think it's possible that, like Nixon and Watergate, that the American people have rendered a final judgment of disapproval on you and your war in Iraq?" President Bush: "Of course not. The enemy's got a powerful tool -- that is to get on your TV screen by killing innocent people -- and my job is to continue to remind the people it's worth it. We're not going to retreat hastily." Gregory: "What's the momentum changer in your mind for your Presidency to turn it around?" President Bush: "You know, I guess, Iraq. I mean, that's what colors everybody's vision it seems like."

Bush was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (5/18) whether Americans have lost faith in the Iraq mission. Bush said, "No question, Iraq has unsettled the American people. I understand that. You know, people don't like war. And war -- this war is as brutal as other wars because we face an enemy that will kill, you know, innocent people in order to achieve an objective. And, you know, I'm also -- I don't believe Americans want us to cut and run either. I think they want us to succeed. And what Americans will see is a new government, a unity government emerging. What they saw last December, and admittedly, it seems like an eternity ago, were 12 million people saying, 'We want to live in a free society.'" Asked when US troops can be expected to leave Iraq, Bush said, "When the commanders on the ground say that the Iraqis are more prepared to take over more of the security needs. This -- the temptation, of course, is to do things for political purposes in America. I don't want to fight a war based upon politics or polls or focus groups. I want to win this war based upon a strategy that's working but also based upon -- and the military decisions being based upon the advice of General Casey, who's the leader on the ground."

Gillespie Blames Slide In GOP Poll Numbers On Gasoline Prices. Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18) about Republicans' drop in the polls. Gillespie said, "I think that has something to do with gas prices that have gone over $3 per gallon but Republicans have the policies to correct that. The fact is it's Republicans who put forward ideas to increase our domestic production so we reduce our reliance on foreign source of oil. The president has put forward a very vigorous program for alternative fuel sources, drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve, which can be done while protecting the environment but increasing our domestic capacity, so that's one factor. I think as we get closer to the election, you're going to see these choices of policies between Democrats and Republicans turn those numbers around and you'll see the Republicans close that gap pretty quickly."

Shays Says Katrina Response Hurt Bush. Rep. Chris Shays said on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18), "Let me just say that I think the thing that has hurt the president most is not Iraq. It's Katrina. People saw an arrogant but confident administration but when they saw Katrina they saw arrogance and frankly incompetence and that was very unsettling."

Blackburn Says Bush Should Show "Decisive Leadership." Rep. Marsha Blackburn said on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18), "think that what we had to admit is that there has been a problem with perceived leadership. And what the American people are wanting to see right now is strong, decisive leadership. The American people I think and the people in my district they agree with President Bush when it comes to the war on terror. They agree with President Bush on what he has done on the economy and on taxes and on jobs growth. They disagree with him on immigration. They disagree with him when it comes to government spending and what they want to do is see him take that strong, decisive leadership role back. That is how they like him best when he is being true to his roots and when he is showing that decisive leadership."

Snow Said To Have Quickly Learned "Art Of Saying Nothing." The Washington Post (5/19, A19, 744K) reports in a "Verbatim" column that after the Bush Administration "was accused of secretly aiding militias in Somalia, new White House spokesman Tony Snow demonstrated on Wednesday that he had quickly learned the art of saying nothing." The Post quotes Snow from the briefing, in which he gave an approximately 280 word reply to a question on Somalia, after which the reporter asked, "What are you really saying?" Snow replied, "Every word will be in the transcript, every single one."

House Passes Budget Blueprint. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Rogers, 2.11M) reports House Republicans "won approval of their long-delayed budget blueprint for the new fiscal year that begins Oct.1. The 218-210 budget vote, which followed a late-night debate spilling into early yesterday morning, ended weeks of frustration for party leaders who had twice pulled back in the final hours for fear of losing." Democrats "were united in opposition, but just 12 Republicans broke ranks after moderates won promises that at least $7.1 billion would be added back to President Bush's budget for core job-training, health and education programs." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (5/19, Fagan, 90K) reports House "conservatives say they scored key spending reform victories in the $2.7 trillion budget approved early yesterday, but major changes are needed to achieve the fiscal discipline promised when Republicans took over the chamber more than a decade ago. 'The budget, while not visionary, was an important first step,' said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC)."

But the New York Times (5/19, Hulse, 1.19M), which titles its story "Future Is Cloudy For House GOP Budget Bill," calls the Republican win "more symbolic than substantive." Lawmakers "doubt the House blueprint will ever be reconciled with a larger Senate budget. "

Specter, Feingold Clash As Senate Panel Approves Gay Marriage Amendment. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 3, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Another divisive issue resurfaced on Capitol Hill today. A Senate Committee voting along party lines approved a constitutional amendment stating that marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. The full Senate is expected to debate the ban on same-sex marriage in two weeks. It is not expected to get the approval of two-thirds of the senate, which is necessary to pass a constitutional amendment." The Washington Times (5/19, Hurt, 90K) also says that "even backers of the amendment say it's not likely to go far this year beyond becoming a hot-button political issue in the November elections." The Washington Post/AP (5/19, A3) notes Democrats "complained that bringing up the amendment is a political move designed to appeal to the GOP's conservative base in a midterm-election year."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/18, Blitzer) reported "one Democrat walked out of the session that was held in a private chamber just off the Senate floor." Sen. Russ Feingold "complained to Chairman Arlen Specter that the meeting wasn't sufficiently open to the public. We're told that led to this exchange. Specter told Feingold, 'I don't need to be lectured by you. You are no more of a protector of the Constitution than am I. If you want to leave, good riddance.' Feingold then responded, 'I've enjoyed your lecture, too, Mr. Chairman. See you.'"

USA Today (5/19, 2.31M) notes the amendment says, "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman." Specter "said he opposes the measure but wants it debated."

House Votes Against Lifting Offshore Drilling Ban. The AP (5/19, Hebert) reports, "The House rejected an attempt late Thursday to end a quarter-century ban on oil and natural gas drilling in 85 percent of the country's coastal waters despite arguments that the new supplies are needed to lower energy costs." Lawmakers from Florida and California "led the fight to maintain the long-standing drilling moratorium, contending that energy development as close as three miles from shore would jeopardize multibillion-dollar tourism industries." A measure, offered by Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida and Rep. Lois Capps of California "to continue the prohibition on drilling for natural gas -- which some lawmakers argued was less of an environmental threat than oil -- was approved 217-203 and inserted into a $25.9 billion Interior Department spending bill." Earlier, the House, by a 279-141 vote, "rejected an attempt by Rep. Ted Poe…to lift the long-standing moratorium as it applies to oil drilling." The Los Angeles Times (5/19, Simon, 958K) runs a similar report.

Measure Would Pressure Oil Firms To Renegotiate Drilling Leases. The New York Times (5/19, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "In an attempt to revoke billions of dollars worth of government incentives to oil and gas producers, the House on Thursday approved a measure that would pressure companies to renegotiate more than 1,000 leases for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico." The measure, "approved 252 to 165 over the objections of many Republican leaders, is intended to prevent companies from avoiding at least $7 billion in payments to the government over the next five years for oil and gas they produce in publicly owned waters."

Auto Companies Push Lawmakers On Alternative Fuel Measures. During a visit to Capitol Hill Thursday, the chief executives of the nation's "Big Three" auto makers, the Wall Street Journal (5/19, A5, Meckler, 2.11M) reports, "made clear to Congress what they want—and what they think they might get—from the government: financing for the pumps and other support needed to encourage Americans to use more ethanol and other gasoline alternatives." In exchange, the heads of Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler division "promised to produce millions more vehicles that can run on domestically produced alternatives to petroleum." However, the executives "didn't push for any particular piece of legislation." Rather, they said there were a lot of good ideas on the table. USA Today/AP (5/19, Thomas) says the executives "endorsed a plan to have renewable fuels meet 25% of the nation's transportation energy needs by 2025."

Noting that US automakers have "had difficulty getting their message across in Washington in the past year," the Washington Post (5/19, D2, Freeman, 744K) called the meeting "an uncharacteristic display of unity to build support for ethanol fuel and to rally legislators behind the financially strapped industry." The Post also said the automakers, which had been scheduled to meet with President Bush this week but was postponed the gathering until June 2, "said yesterday that the June 2 meeting has also been postponed."

Commerce Secretary Dismisses Concerns About Inflation. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez in an interview during a breakfast meeting with the Christian Science Monitor (5/19, 61K) was asked about concerns that "rising inflation" was a threat to "the US economy." Gutierrez said, "Everything suggests that we should be able to get through this period without seeing inflation increase to a point where it would become a problem."

Stocks Continue Slide. The New York Times/AP (5/19) reports, "Wall Street extended its losses yesterday, a day after an inflation scare sent the Dow Jones industrial average on its biggest one-day drop in three years and put the Nasdaq composite index in the red for 2006." The Dow "dropped 77.32 points, or 0.69 percent, to 11,128.29. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 8.51 points, or 0.67 percent, to 1,261.81, and the Nasdaq sank 15.48 points, or 0.7 percent, to 2,180.32." The Wall Street Journal (5/19, Browning, 2.11M), among other sources, also reports the stock numbers.

Report Suggests Economic Growth Slowing. The New York Times/AP (5/19), reports, "An important gauge of the nation's future economic activity dipped in April, once again suggesting slower growth in the months ahead." The Conference Board, "a private research group, reported Thursday that its index of leading economic indicators fell by 0.1 percentage point, to 138.9, last month. Economists were predicting a small rise. In March the index climbed by 0.4 percentage point, to 139." The index "predicts economic activity three to six months in the future." Economists "said the decline reinforced the Federal Reserve's forecast that economic growth, which has been brisk, would most likely moderate to a more sustainable pace in the coming months."

Bernanke Says Housing Market Cooling. The Washington Post (5/19, D1, Tse, 744K) reports, "Confirming what home buyers suspected and real estate sales figures have indicated for months, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday that the U.S. housing market was showing clear signs of cooling off." Bernanke "said the slowdown is 'moderate' and 'orderly' and pointed to the overall strength of the economy."

Krugman Says Market "Coming Down To Earth." In a column titled "Coming Down To Earth," Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (5/19, 1.19M), "Um, wasn't the stock market supposed to bounce back after Wednesday's big drop? We shouldn't read too much into a couple of days' movements in stock prices." But "it seems that investors are suddenly feeling uneasy about the state of the economy.

They should be; the puzzle is why they haven't been uneasy all along."

WSJournal Says Bernanke Must Show He Understands Inflation Dangers. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, 2.11M) editorializes, "Stocks continued their weeklong plunge yesterday, selling off again at the end of the day on more inflationary fears. The way to understand this washout -- knocking 4.4% off the Dow -- is that Adam Smith is giving the US financial establishment a warning." The consumer price index reading "that triggered Wednesday's selloff is a lagging indicator" that "tells you inflation is here only after it has already arrived. … All of which suggests that…Ben Bernanke, is facing a rough passage. He's arrived at a Fed that has clearly made a mistake in letting inflation expectations build and has been very slow to admit it. The only questions now are the magnitude of that mistake and of the resulting financial casualties. … The sooner Mr. Bernanke shows that he understands the problem, and has the fortitude to do something about it, the fewer casualties there will be. Sooner or later Adam Smith will take over if Mr. Bernanke doesn't."

Mortgage Rates Rise. ABC World News Tonight (5/18, story 8, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The cost of financing a home is up again. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage rose to 6.6% in the last week. That's the highest rate in almost four years. As that was being announced, the stock market was sliding again. The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 77 points to close at 11,128.29."

Bush To Nominate Casey To Open SEC Seat. The Washington Post/AP (5/19, D2) reports President Bush "will nominate Kathleen L. Casey, a Senate aide and expert on banking and securities law, to the five-member Securities and Exchange Commission, the White House said yesterday." The announcement "came four days after Cynthia A. Glassman said she did not intend to serve a second term as a commissioner and will leave after her term ends June 5."

Media Shield Law Reintroduced In Senate. The AP (5/19, Kellman) reports Senators "began a new effort to pass a media shield law Thursday, re-introducing legislation they said would protect journalists from being sent to jail for refusing to reveal their sources in most cases." The bill, "re-written with guidance from more than 30 news organizations including The Associated Press, drew new support after changes that could force reporters to disclose sources if they witnessed a crime or obtained information deemed secret by law." Sen. Charles Schumer said, "We need to protect the press, especially with a big, large government that keeps things secret more and more. We also have to have some respect for the fact that there are certain things that shouldn't be made public by statute." The AP adds, "Some lawmakers remained skeptical about shielding reporters in wartime."

GOP Negotiators Say Pension Bill Unlikely To Pass Before Memorial Day. The AP (5/19, Abrams) reports Republican negotiators said "despite recent progress, Congress is unlikely to pass by Memorial Day legislation aimed at assuring financial solvency for the nation's employer-based pension system." House and Senate conferees "originally hoped to send a bill to the president before April 15, the time some companies had to recalculate their contributions to defined-benefit pension plans. But the two sides have stalled over several intractable issues, including Senate proposals to give special breaks to financially struggling airlines and to require companies with poor credit ratings to pay more into their pension plans."

Competing FEMA Bills Advancing Through House. CQ (5/18, Hunter) reported, "A proposal to restore the Federal Emergency Management Agency to its pre-Sept. 11 status as an independent, Cabinet-level agency gained ground Thursday" with the approval of HR 5316 in he House Government Reform Committee. The bill is competing with HR 5351, which "would leave FEMA in the Homeland Security Department but grant it power to report directly to the president in a disaster." CQ added that while the "bills reflect a simmering turf war between the chairmen of the Homeland Security and Transportation and Infrastructure committees," both "would give FEMA control of disaster preparedness and response. A reorganization of Homeland stripped FEMA of its disaster preparedness duties last year."

Possible Bush Shift To Right Seen As Bad Strategy For Party. In his Washington Post column (5/19, A21), E.J. Dionne says as they "watch President Bush's approval ratings tumble, conservative activists are offering a surefire strategy for presidential recovery: Bush should move to the right and 'rally his base.'" There's "one problem with this approach: It could do the president's party far more harm than good, even within its own ranks. The conservative view ignores the roots of the president's difficulties in the disaffection of moderate voters who are more concerned with performance -- or the lack thereof -- than ideology." Bush's "best shot at a quick jolt upward in his approval ratings is among conservatives in his own party, who are already more inclined to support him than anyone else and might come home in response to a presidential tilt rightward. But Rep. Chris Shays, a moderate from Connecticut, noted that many of the House Republicans most endangered in this fall's election -- himself included -- are moderates who would be hurt if his party and his president moved farther right."

Democratic Admiration Of McCain Seen As Contradiction. In his Washington Post column (5/19, A21), Michael Kinsley says Sen. John McCain "has a unique genius for telling the truth from his heart and making people believe that he is lying. And these people are his supporters! They admire him as a straight-talking truth-teller, and they forgive him for taking positions on big issues that they find repellent, on the grounds that he doesn't really mean what he says. 'Oh, he has to say that to get the Republican nomination,' explain many Democrats with a girlish crush on the charming, funny, intelligent and heroic Republican senator from Arizona, and/or a special loathing of their party's own star, the junior senator from New York. 'That' might refer to McCain's strong right-to-life stand on abortion, or his strong support for the war in Iraq, or his recent rapprochement with Jerry Falwell. They admire McCain as a straight shooter among sneaks, a truth-teller amid bull artists. They long, understandably, for some fresh air in the fetid atmosphere of politics. And McCain delivers that."

Rita Survivors Believe They Are On Their Own. Freelance writer Joyce King, in a column for USA Today (5/19, 2.31M) writes that "Hurricane Rita's devastation to the coastal towns of southwest Louisiana is still fresh nearly eight months later." King says she continues to "meet people who talk of living through 'the forgotten hurricane.'" King continues, "Many Rita victims are still awaiting federal housing funds to rebuild." Residents of Cameron Parish "are frightened. Help is slow to arrive. New codes make rebuilding prohibitive." Many of the storm's survivors "believe they're on their own."

Brinkley's Criticism Of Nagin Seen As Prominent Feature In New Orleans Mayoral Race. The Washington Post (5/19, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports "The Great Deluge," by Tulane University historian Douglas Brinkley, has figured "prominently" in New Orleans' mayoral race for its depiction of "Mayor C. Ray Nagin as too vain, too stunned and too paranoid to have been effective in the city's crisis. Relying in part on accounts from Nagin's political rivals, the book has been characterized by his supporters as a campaign attack timed to sink his bid for reelection on Saturday." The Post adds that the "leadership abilities" of Nagin and opponent Mitch Landrieu "have become a central issue…, and that is one reason Brinkley's account of Nagin has proved to be a sensitive subject."

Nagin Says His Victory Would Send Racial Message. The Washington Times (5/19, Debose, 90K) reports "Nagin says a victory in tomorrow's election will send a message on race that 'will echo throughout America.' 'This election will say in spite of American prejudice, I was able to attract votes from all races and classes and move forward with the process of healing,' said Mr. Nagin, who has hinted that whites locally and nationally are working to unseat him from the post, which blacks have held for nearly 30 years." Landrieu, meanwhile, "said the tightly contested runoff election will turn on whether 'African-Americans [will] vote for white politicians and will whites vote for black ones.'"

Landrieu Said To Stick To Script. The New York Times (5/19, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports, "If Mr. Landrieu wins, he will offer the classic prescriptions for governing that have been his armor in debates with an unpredictable opponent, Mayor C. Ray Nagin. Unlike the mayor, Mr. Landrieu rarely throws away the script." He has used a "promise of competence" against Nagin, who "he accuses of incarnating the opposite."

Giuliani Campaigns For Reed In Georgia. CNN's The Situation Room (5/18, Blitzer) reported, "Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani headlined a fundraiser in Georgia today for the lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed. Reed is a conservative, a former leader of the Christian Coalition, founded by Pat Robertson. Giuliani is a moderate Republican who, as you probably know, is considering -- considering -- a run for the White House." CNN (Crowley) added that Reed "gets a marquee player in Giuliani, who will help him raise money for what looks to be a to-the-wire primary fight. And Giuliani, who's thinking about running for president, gets the attention of Reed's core supporters, which is to say culturally conservative Republicans, something the pro-gay rights, pro-abortion rights, pro-gun licensing former mayor of New York is not."

The AP (5/19, Bluestein) notes that Reed said just prior to the fundraiser, "I just want to say I believe Rudy Giuliani is one of the finest leaders in not only the Republican Party but in either party." Giuliani replied, "We're here to get you elected. It would be a great thing for Georgia." Reed's "campaign was looking for a boost before the July 18 Republican primary after being dogged by ties between" Reed and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." Meanwhile, the appearance "could also help Giuliani draw conservative support in a run for president. His endorsement of Reed comes weeks after the Rev. Jerry Falwell said he admired the former mayor but could not support him for president because of 'irreconcilable differences on life and family.'"

The New York Post (5/19, Haberman, 624K) adds, "Later asked by reporters about how his past pro-gay rights, pro-choice stands mesh with Reed's positions, Giuliani said, 'We are a broad party. I agree with Ralph on many things.' 'There are going to be some things I disagree with him on…in Ralph's case I know him, and I think he's going to be a really effective leader,' he said."

Giuliani Emphasizes Fiscal Conservatism. The New York Times (5/19, Healy, 1.19M) reports that Rudy Giuliani "was warmly received at a Reed fund-raiser here, though advisers to Mr. Reed noted that most of the donors were politically moderate business people, and that a truer test of Mr. Giuliani's appeal among more conservative Southerners would come in rural counties." The Times adds, "Aligning himself closely with the Bush administration," Giuliani "called for more federal tax cuts as a means of creating jobs and stimulating the economy, and argued that tax cuts would invigorate business and ultimately yield greater total tax receipts, thereby helping to reduce the deficit. 'President Bush understands that, the Republican Congress understands that, Ralph understands that, and the Democrats don't,' Mr. Giuliani told the audience of about 250 people. 'We can take a big step back, either state by state or nationally. And this election in 2006 is going to determine if we keep seeing our economy grow, or we take a real step backwards.'"

"Progressive" Democrats Said To Be Targeting Moderates. Bloomberg (5/19) reports Democratic activist groups "that mounted an aggressive campaign against President George W. Bush in the 2004 election have a new target: Democrats who support his policies." A "loose network of organizations, ranging from women's groups to Internet bloggers, is pressuring incumbents such as Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Representatives Jane Harman of California and Melissa Bean of Illinois, in some cases by backing insurgent candidates in primary elections." The groups "charge that these and other Democrats have been too supportive of Bush on issues like Iraq and trade, and say they're trying to energize voters disillusioned with a party that has failed to draw clear distinctions with Republicans." The "organizations and Web logs that identify themselves as the party's "progressive" wing include MoveOn.org, a coalition of groups that raised $60 million and enlisted 100,000 volunteers in the 2004 elections; DailyKos, a blog that averages 20 million visitors a month; and Democracy for America, a political action committee with 500 affiliates."

Democrats Counting On Female Candidates To Help Regain Control Of House. The Christian Science Monitor (5/19, Feldmann, 61K) reports that heading into the '06 elections, EMILY's List "boasts its largest crop of candidates in its 21 years. … And as the Democratic Party seeks to regain control of Congress -- doable with a net shift of just 15 seats -- it is counting on these EMILY's List women to play a major role. Of the 24 Republican-held House seats deemed competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, 11 feature Democratic women, all of them getting help from Emily's List. By comparison, of Cook's 11 competitive Democratic-held House seats, only one features a Republican woman contender. Voter discontent with Washington is high, and women candidates could be the natural beneficiaries of that 'throw the bums out' mentality, say experts on women in politics. 'When people get disgusted with politics and they are looking for change, women embody that change,' says Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University."

Shays Says GOP Majority Is In Jeopardy. CT4 Rep. Chris Shays (R) was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/18) if he agrees with former House Speaker Newt Gingrich that the GOP's majority in Congress is in jeopardy. Shays said, "Oh, absolutely. We're in grave danger for a variety of reasons but one of them is there's an ethics issue here and I think that our side of the aisle doesn't get it. I honestly think we came to change Washington. I think Washington has changed too many in Washington. So, we're not the reformers that we set out to be and we need to regain that."

Liberals From Across US Helping Lieberman's Primary Foe. The New York Times (5/19, Yardley, 1.19M) reports that "from across the nation, a determined alliance of antiwar activists is working overtime online and on doorsteps to defeat" Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman (D), "whose political moderation helped him earn the Democratic nomination for vice president six years ago. Their goal is not only to punish Mr. Lieberman for staunchly supporting the war in Iraq but also to protest what the activists consider the Democratic Party's willingness to accommodate President Bush. Without a national race to focus on, thousands of activists from other states -- encouraged by a host of liberal bloggers -- have contributed money and volunteered to help the campaign of" businessman Ned Lamont, "who is trying to unseat Mr. Lieberman in the state's Democratic primary in August." The Times notes, "Many Democrats assert that the vigorous challenge to Mr. Lieberman is overshadowing the governor's race and taking money and attention away from three closely contested House races in Connecticut that many strategists consider crucial to the Democrats' majority hopes. 'It's absolute Democratic cannibalism,'" said ex-Connecticut Democratic Chairman John F. Droney.

Unifying Message Proves Elusive For Religious Liberals. The New York Times (5/19, Banerjee, 1.19M) reports that religious liberals have been meeting this week in Washington, D.C. at the Spiritual Activism Conference in an effort to plan "how to take their message to those in power. … Since the last presidential election, liberals of various faiths have talked about taking back religion from the conservative Christians who helped bring President Bush and a Republican Congress to power. Yet liberal believers have so far been unable to approach, even modestly, the success of the religious right and command the attention of Congress." The Times notes that if the gathering at the conference "is any indication, the biggest barrier for liberals may be their regard for pluralism: for letting people say what they want, how they want to, and for trying to include everyone's priorities, rather than choosing two or three issues that could inspire a movement. 'We didn't get on the same page with everyone, and it is about getting on the same page,' said the Rev. Tony Campolo, an outspoken liberal Baptist minister from Pennsylvania who once served as a spiritual adviser to President Bill Clinton, and attended the conference."

DHS Officials Says Many States Not Ready For Bird Flu. The AP (5/19, Jordan) reports many states have a "spotty" record in preparing for bird flu and it is matter of "not if, but when" the deadly virus reaches the United States, the Homeland Security Department's top doctor said Thursday. Dr. Jeffrey Runge, the department's chief medical officer, "said state and local governments carry most of burden of preparing for an outbreak," including "readying emergency medical workers, providing hospital beds and setting up treatment centers outside of immediate disaster areas." In an interview with the AP, Runge did not identify the states he said have been slow to prepare. However, he did say that states with "experience in dealing with hurricanes or terrorist attacks are further along."

Scientists Begin Testing For Bird Flu In Alaska. The AP (5/19) reports federal scientists Wednesday began testing migratory birds on a coastal wildlife refuge in Alaska for signs of bird flu, according to Bruce Woods, spokesman with the US Fish and Wildlife Service. It is the first sampling of a $4 million federal project to study 15,000 birds for the disease throughout the state this summer, Woods said.

WHO Probes Indonesian Bird Flu Cases For Human Transmission. The Washington Post (5/19, A17, Sipress, 744K) reports, "An international team of health investigators arrived on the Indonesian island of Sumatra on Thursday to determine whether an unusually large cluster of human bird flu cases indicates that the highly lethal virus has mutated into a form easily spread among people." USA Today (5/19, A6, 2.31M) reports, "The source of bird flu that killed five members of an Indonesian family isn't known, and human-to-human transmission can't be ruled out," the World Health Organization said on its Website. The WHO said the "most plausible" source was poultry, but "the possibility of limited human-to-human transmission cannot be ruled out." If that occurred, "it has not been either efficient or sustained," the WHO said.

However, the New York Times (5/19, Gelling, 1.19M) reports under the headline "5 Bird Flu Deaths In Indonesia Not Linked To Human Exchange," that WHO officials "said Thursday that the five avian flu deaths confirmed this week on Sumatra were probably not a result of human-to-human infection and did not suggest that the virus had mutated into a more deadly form." The Times quotes WHO epidemiologist Gina Samaan, who is investigating the recent cluster, as saying "the number of deaths had raised eyebrows, but so far the outbreak was similar to others in Indonesia that were caused by close contact with infected poultry."

Author Says Virginity Pledges Need To Be Re-Thought. In a New York Times op-ed (5/19), author Lauren F. Winner says, "The recent Harvard study that found teenagers' virginity pledges to be ineffective should come as a surprise to no one. Several studies had already come to that conclusion. If we are truly to help our teenagers adopt the countercultural sexual ethic of abstinence until marriage, Christians concerned about the rampant premarital sex in our communities need to rethink, rather than simply defend, young people's abstinence pledges." Although "the church devotes an immense amount of energy to teaching about sexuality — just go to the Christian inspiration section of your nearest Barnes & Noble and compare the number of books about chastity to books that challenge, say, consumerism — many Christians still 'struggle with' (in that euphemistic evangelical phrase) premarital sex, adultery and pornography." No "retooled pledge will guarantee teenagers' chastity, but words of grace and communal commitment are perhaps a firmer basis for sexual ethics than simple assertions that true love waits."

WSJournal Says House Earmark Reform Legislation Full Of Loopholes. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "When the House passed its lobbyist-reform bill last month, we praised the earmark transparency provision as a rare bright spot. Maybe we spoke too soon. Outsiders have now had a chance to inspect the fine print, and if Sarbanes-Oxley were this full of loopholes, few businesses would complain." Perhaps with "the House's Appropriator-in-Chief, Californian Jerry Lewis, now under investigation for allegedly steering millions in appropriations to a lobbyist via earmarks, reform will take on added urgency. But GOP leaders should understand that this kind of cynical loophole-writing won't make voters feel any better about them come November."

WSJournal Says GOP Won't Get Payoff From Medicare Drug Benefit. The Wall Street Journal (5/19, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "Republicans have been touting new polls showing rising popularity for their Medicare drug benefit. But this week's panic in Congress to extend Monday's deadline for penalty-free enrollment is further evidence that the program has been far from the political home run the GOP once hoped." At "best, the drug benefit will be a political wash this first national election following its implementation, and there is reason for Republicans to worry that come November many seniors will be hitting the dread 'doughnut hole' where coverage stops. More ominously, Democrats are making a pledge to 'fix' the benefit -- meaning expand it -- their top campaign plank. So while Republicans might have gotten to play Santa for five minutes, they'll spend decades playing Scrooge as Democrats demagogue for more generous coverage."

NYTimes Cautions Against Investing In Emerging Markets. The New York Times (5/19, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the "lucky investors who have ridden the bull run of the emerging markets in recent years — and those still thinking about getting onboard — should remember one thing. What goes up quickly often goes down quickly as well." Investors are "stampeding, cash in hand, toward countries like Russia and India. As Landon Thomas Jr. reported in this paper yesterday, hedge funds, mutual funds and pension funds are embracing the risks and the returns in countries as far-flung as Zambia and the former Soviet republic of Georgia. Speculation may have overtaken smart investment." The "wise investors won't lose their heads and weight their portfolios too heavily toward the most exotic funds. The problem with hot money is that it's easy to get burned."

TERRORISM NEWS:

CIA Nominee Defends Eavesdropping Program (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn
Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006
WASHINGTON - Justice Department lawyers had signed off and the president of the United States had issued his orders.

DOJ_NMG_0028894

So less than a month after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden decided to carry out a covert warrantless eavesdropping program to help thwart future attacks.

"The math was pretty straightforward," Hayden told the Senate Intelligence Committee on Thursday during his confirmation hearing to head the Central Intelligence Agency. "I could not not do this."

Hayden, who headed the National Security Agency when it began the eavesdropping program, defended the Bush administration's effort to wiretap calls between suspected al-Qaida allies and U.S. residents, saying the practice is subject to strict internal reviews to prevent civil rights violations.

Hayden seems assured of Senate confirmation to take over the CIA and would become the agency's third director since the Sept. 11 attacks. The committee will vote next week. President Bush has pressed for a full Senate vote before the Memorial Day recess begins at the end of next week, but that's uncertain.

Even so, Hayden faced tough questions about his credibility, the breadth of the eavesdropping program, the role of the CIA in the treatment of foreign detainees, and the reliability of intelligence on Iran's nuclear program. On key points, Hayden demurred, putting off his answers for the classified, closed-door portion of the hearing.

Indeed, the more than six-hour public session revealed more about the frustrations of lawmakers who'd been kept in the dark about the NSA's activities - some until Wednesday - than it did about Hayden's views.

"The Congress was really never really consulted or informed in a manner that we could truly perform our oversight role as co-equal branches of government, not to mention, I happen to believe, (as) required by law," said Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine.

Hayden promised to keep senators informed about intelligence activities, but he urged lawmakers to stop the "endless picking apart of the archaeology of every past intelligence success or failure."

CIA officers, he said, "deserve not to have every action analyzed, second-guessed and criticized on the front pages of the morning paper."

As for the NSA's eavesdropping activities, Hayden stressed that the program targets al-Qaida communications. In one of the most detailed descriptions that the administration has offered about internal safeguards on the program, Hayden said that NSA officers listen in on calls only after establishing probable cause that the calls involve al-Qaida suspects. He said each targeted call is documented and includes a detailed rationale for linking a phone number with a suspected terrorist.

He said the NSA's inspector general, the agency's internal watchdog, and Department of Justice lawyers routinely examine the targeting documents to make sure the program isn't being abused.

"To the best of my knowledge, the folks out there are batting a thousand," he said. "No one has said that there has been a targeting decision made that wasn't well-founded in a probable cause standard."

He declined to describe the breadth of the program. He also wouldn't confirm a USA Today report last week that the NSA had access to a database of millions of records of phone calls placed in the United States.

After Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., sparred with Hayden over the privacy issues associated with warrantless wiretaps, Levin asked: "Is that the whole program?"

"Senator, I'm not at liberty to talk about that in open session," Hayden replied.

Later, Levin told a reporter: "He's made generally a positive impression on me."

While the revelations of NSA eavesdropping have caused an outcry among civil libertarians and a vigorous debate in Congress, the Senate hearing was a civil encounter. Administration critics sat quietly in the audience, clapping softly at the occasional pointed question from a senator.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., encouraged Hayden to develop a new sense of public trust in the intelligence community.

"America has lost confidence in the leadership of this country," Hagel said.

Hayden conceded flaws in the intelligence gathering about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. He faulted the Pentagon's former Office of Special Plans, headed by former Undersecretary of Defense of Policy Douglas Feith, for not adequately filtering intelligence data when reaching conclusions about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and about links between Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and al-Qaida.

Displaying a gift for metaphor, Hayden said:

DOJ_NMG_0028895

"I've got three great kids, but if you tell me, `Go out and find all the bad things they've done, Hayden,' I can build you a pretty good dossier, and you'd think they were pretty bad people because that was what I was looking for and that's what I'd build up.

"That would be very wrong. That would be inaccurate. That would be misleading."

Asked to compare current assessments about Iran's nuclear capabilities with prewar intelligence about Iraq, Hayden said, "Our data is better ... and our judgments are far more clear."

At another point he noted: "Iran is a difficult problem."

Hayden Says NSA Program Is Legal (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee to head the CIA defended the administration's warrantless surveillance program Thursday and said media reports about it have had a "corrosive effect" on the nation's intelligence gatherers.

Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden told the Senate Intelligence Committee that the National Security Agency (NSA) eavesdrops without warrants only on the phone calls or e-mails of terrorism suspects. He said officials use a "probable cause" standard that makes it unlikely that ordinary Americans would be targeted.

"The privacy of American citizens is a concern constantly," said Hayden, who as NSA director designed the surveillance program. "We always balance privacy and security."

During nearly eight hours of testimony, Hayden said repeatedly that when Bush pushed the NSA to step up its surveillance after the Sept. 11 attacks, he consulted with government lawyers. He said they told him eavesdropping on international communications was legal.

"I could not not do this," he said.

But Hayden said he was "not here to confirm or deny" last week's report by USA TODAY that the NSA has been secretly collecting the domestic phone call records of tens of millions of Americans. Bush has confirmed the NSA surveillance program but not the call database report.

After Hayden's open testimony, the confirmation hearing went into closed session so he could discuss the phone database issue as well as other sensitive subjects such as detainee interrogations.

Before going into the closed session, Democrats expressed concern over the clandestine programs and what they said was the administration's failure to keep Congress informed. The full Senate and House intelligence committees were briefed for the first time Wednesday.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said he left the briefing "more convinced than ever" that the phone surveillance program is illegal and "the president misled the public."

Hayden said that in 30 briefing sessions with members of Congress, no one had said that the surveillance program should be stopped or that it broke the law. "I came away with no course corrections," he said.

Hayden did acknowledge a series of mistakes by the U.S. intelligence community before the invasion of Iraq in 2003 — principally the conclusion that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. "We just took too much for granted. We didn't challenge our basic assumptions," he said.

The four-star general opened his testimony by saying that intelligence-gathering had become "the football in American political discourse" and that the "CIA needs to get out of the news — as source or subject."

A vote by the full Senate on Hayden's nomination to replace Porter Goss could come as early as next week. "It's very likely he'll be confirmed," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the committee's senior Democrat.

C.I.A. Choice Says He's Independent Of The Pentagon (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — Gen. Michael V. Hayden sought on Thursday to distance himself from the Pentagon and its role in prewar intelligence on Iraq, in an appearance that put him on track to win swift confirmation as the next director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0028896

In a confirmation hearing before the Senate Intelligence Committee, General Hayden appeared in the pristine blue uniform he has worn for 36 years as an Air Force officer.

But he repeatedly professed his independence from the Defense Department and its leadership, saying he had been "uncomfortable" with the work of a Pentagon intelligence office run by Douglas J. Feith, a former under secretary of defense, which asserted in the months before the Iraq war that Iraq had established ties with operatives for Al Qaeda in the Middle East.

General Hayden also recounted disagreements with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld about the Pentagon's control over a large part of America's annual intelligence budget. In characterizing one such conversation, he said, "I think it's what diplomats would call that frank and wide-ranging exchange of views."

General Hayden flatly defended as legal the secret domestic eavesdropping program he ran until last year as director of the National Security Agency, and that argument was directly challenged by only a handful of Democratic senators.

But he notably declined to endorse a Bush administration stance that has severely limited the number of senators who could be briefed on the program. "It was not my decision," he said.

The questioning of General Hayden in more than seven hours of public testimony included moments of tension. But, for the most part, Democrats as well as Republicans praised his experience and said he was a good choice to lead an agency that has been buffeted by recriminations over intelligence failures and the stormy service of its current director, Porter J. Goss, who will leave next week.

None of the 15 senators on the committee indicated that they planned to vote against General Hayden's nomination. By day's end, Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican chairman of the committee, said he hoped to hold votes in the committee and the full Senate next week that could install General Hayden at the C.I.A. by Memorial Day.

General Hayden's assertions of independence appeared intended to address his critics' concerns that a four-star general running the spy agency might be too beholden to the Pentagon at a time when the military is expanding its foreign intelligence operations.

In his current job, as principal deputy to John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, General Hayden is not in the direct military chain of command. Yet his testimony on Wednesday was the first time that a senior general on active duty had criticized the intelligence office run by Mr. Feith, who left the Pentagon last year after overseeing a critical part of the Pentagon's effort to build the case for war against Saddam Hussein.

In stark contrast to Mr. Goss, who in confirmation hearings 19 months ago pledged "tough love" for the embattled agency, General Hayden went out of his way to praise the work of C.I.A. officials and pledged to "reaffirm the C.I.A.'s proud culture of risk-taking and excellence."

General Hayden, who would become the third C.I.A. director in two years, said he was also eager to restore a sense of continuity at the agency, which has been shaken by turnover at its highest levels. He said the possible return of Stephen R. Kappes, a veteran of the agency's clandestine service who is said to be the leading candidate to become General Hayden's deputy, would help in that effort.

"You get a lot more authority when the work force doesn't think it's amateur hour on the top floor," he said. "You get a lot more authority when you've got somebody welded to your hip whom everybody unarguably respects as someone who knows the business."

He said he also believed it was "time to move past what seems to me to be an endless picking apart of the archeology of every past intelligence failure and success," including those related to the Sept. 11 attacks and faulty assessments about prewar intelligence on Iraq. C.I.A officers, he said, "deserve not to have every action analyzed, second-guessed and criticized on the front pages of the morning paper."

The sharpest criticism from senators came during questions about General Hayden's role in the domestic eavesdropping program. General Hayden said the surveillance program broke no laws and had been carefully vetted by National Security Agency lawyers. He said no lawmaker had ever suggested significant changes to the program in more than a dozen classified briefings before it was publicly revealed in December.

"I never left those sessions thinking I had to change anything," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0028897

Yet some lawmakers challenged whether General Hayden had been upfront about the highly classified program in public statements and in past visits to Capitol Hill.

One committee Democrat, Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, questioned whether General Hayden had "simply said one thing and done another, or whether you have just parsed your words like a lawyer to intentionally mislead the public."

Mr. Wyden asked, "What's to say that if you're confirmed to head the C.I.A., we won't go through exactly this kind of drill with you over there?"

"Well, senator," the general replied, "you're going to have to make a judgment on my character."

While several senators expressed concern that the Pentagon was muscling onto the C.I.A.'s territory by expanding its intelligence capabilities, General Hayden denied that there was a turf battle between the military and civilian intelligence operatives.

In fact, General Hayden said on several occasions Thursday that Pentagon intelligence-gathering had helped the C.I.A. break free from the military's constant demands to support troops with tactical intelligence.

In Iraq and Afghanistan, General Hayden said, the C.I.A. had initially "picked up a large burden" in providing direct support to military forces.

"To have D.O.D. step up to those kinds of responsibilities doesn't seem to me to be a bad thing," he said. "And if that frees up C.I.A. activity to go back toward the more traditional C.I.A. realm of strategic intelligence, there's a happy marriage to be made here."

At the same time, General Hayden said it was necessary to "create a bright line" distinguishing the field activities of the Pentagon and the C.I.A., which historically has had broader legal authority to run covert operations overseas.

He said his first priority was to strengthen the C.I.A.'s abilities to collect human intelligence, yet he also said the spy agency needed to remain the government's "center of excellence" for intelligence analysis.

At the same time, he said the C.I.A.'s workforce of analysts, known as the directorate of intelligence, suffered from a lack of seasoned veterans who could coach the younger analysts who had joined the agency since the Sept. 11 attacks.

To illustrate this, General Hayden said that for every 10 analysts at the agency with less than four years of intelligence experience, there was only one with more than 10 years of experience.

"This is the least experienced analytic workforce in the history of the Central Intelligence Agency," he said.

CIA Nominee Says Was Convinced On Legality Of Domestic Spying (CHIT)

By Stephen J. Hedges

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gen. Michael Hayden, nominated to be the next director of the CIA, told a Senate committee Thursday that he initially doubted the legality of a Bush administration program to expand domestic wiretaps on U.S. citizens after the Sept. 11 attacks, but that White House officials convinced him the program was lawful.

Hayden headed the National Security Agency, which conducts electronic eavesdropping, when the controversial program was proposed to monitor international calls between suspected Al Qaeda operatives and people in the United States. A furor erupted when its existence was revealed in December, with some Democrats and a few Republicans claiming it was illegal.

Hayden told the Senate Intelligence Committee, which is considering his CIA nomination, he at first told then-CIA Director George Tenet that the NSA was doing all that the law allowed on surveillance.

"Director Tenet came back to me and said, 'Is there anything more you can do?'" Hayden said. "And I said, 'Not within my current authorities.' And he invited me to come down and talk to the administration about what more could be done."

After that talk, Hayden said, he was convinced the NSA could go further. Then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft provided the NSA with a memo giving a basis for that eavesdropping authority, he said.

Hayden said he did not read the memo, but on Oct. 6, 2001, the NSA launched what the Bush administration has called a terrorist surveillance program. That program—along with the reported NSA collection of millions of domestic phone records from telephone companies for analysis—has complicated Hayden's confirmation. The programs also have raised questions about the influence the administration has exerted over the intelligence agencies, and about who is accountable for their activities.

DOJ_NMG_0028898

NSA eavesdropping was just one concern committee members raised with Hayden, who has spent much of his career working in military intelligence. If the committee approves Hayden's nomination, the full Senate would then vote on his confirmation.

The hearing also touched on politicization of intelligence analysis, treatment of CIA terrorism detainees, improved human intelligence sources, press leaks and whether committee members or Congress receive enough briefings on intelligence matters.

None of those issues seemed to entangle Hayden, though he insisted on answering some of the most sensitive questions in a closed session after the public hearing. Hayden enjoys solid support among Republicans and has won initial praise from some Democrats.

During the hearing, Hayden received mostly genteel treatment from committee members. But senators from both parties criticized the administration, and by inference Hayden, for failing to brief the full committee on the domestic eavesdropping initiative until Wednesday. That decision, they suggested, seemed designed to defuse congressional complaints that only a handful of lawmakers had been briefed about the wiretapping.

Hayden found himself acting as the public face of a still-brewing controversy over domestic surveillance approved by the administration. He was repeatedly asked to explain how the terrorism surveillance wiretaps were started, how extensive they are and what the White House had done to ensure that the program did not sweep innocent citizens into its dragnet.

"When I had to make this personal decision in early October 2001," Hayden said, "it was a personal decision. The math was pretty straightforward. I could not not do this."

In adopting the program, the administration and NSA avoided the usual method of obtaining a warrant for such wiretaps from a special court formed under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Though that court has approved almost all such requests, the White House has argued the NSA needed to move quickly to capture some calls and that the special court process would have delayed the intercepts.

Committee Chairman Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) seemed defensive that he and not the entire committee had been told early on about the surveillance. He answered criticism from Sen. Ron Wyden, (D-Ore.) that Hayden and the administration had failed to keep the full committee informed.

"We as a country weren't part of any effort to set the standards in these programs," Wyden said, "and most of the members of this committee were kept in the dark and weren't part of any informed debate about these programs."

To that Roberts replied: "I would like to make it very clear that I was briefed on all 13 occasions, along with the vice chairman and the leadership of the Congress. You might think we're not independent. I am independent. And I asked very tough questions, and they were answered to my satisfaction by the general [Hayden] and other members of the briefing team."

Wyden, however, noted that Hayden had testified publicly that the privacy of U.S. citizens was being protected when the NSA was conducting the surveillance.

Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine took up that theme, arguing that Hayden and his intelligence colleagues in the administration could have briefed the committee well before Wednesday.

"I happen to believe that with the programs in question, that the Congress was really, never really consulted or informed in a manner that we could truly perform our oversight role as co-equal branches of government," Snowe said.

The White House contends the program is legal under broad constitutional authority Bush has to protect the nation and that citizens' privacy rights were protected. Hayden, who left the NSA in 2005 to become deputy director of national intelligence, echoed the White House response.

"Are there privacy concerns?" he said. "Of course there are privacy concerns. But I'm fairly, I'm very comfortable with what the agency did and what I did personally to inform those people responsible for oversight."

But he declined to answer specific questions about the wiretapping, telling senators that he would provide extensive answers in the committee's closed-door session.

Hayden also said he would work as CIA director to take the politics out of intelligence analysis and briefings.

DOJ_NMG_0028899

"True accountability is not served by inaccurate, harmful or illegal public disclosures," he said. "I will draw a clear line between what we owe the American public by way of openness and what must remain secret in order for us to continue to do our job."

Nominee Says N.S.A. Stayed Within Law On Wiretaps (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — Less than a month after the Sept. 11 attacks, Gen. Michael V. Hayden summoned 80 or 90 staff members to a conference room at the National Security Agency. President Bush had just approved the use of wiretapping on the international calls and e-mail of Americans without warrants, and the general, then leading the spy agency, was setting his troops in motion.

As General Hayden recounted the meeting at his Senate confirmation hearing on Thursday, he explained what the president had authorized and ended his remarks by saying, "We're going to do exactly what he said, and not one photon or one electron more."

"And I think that's what we've done," he told the senators considering his nomination to lead the Central Intelligence Agency.

General Hayden faced sharp questioning from Democrats about whether the eavesdropping operation was legal and whether he had misled Congress and the public about it. But even under attack, he did not stray from the points that he and other administration officials have stressed in defending the operation in recent months. Again and again, he cited the legal and constitutional authority for the program, the safeguards against abuses, and the need for secrecy to ensure its effectiveness.

But while the message was constant, General Hayden sought to put a more human face on the effort, explaining his role and that of his aides in running the surveillance program.

He told, for instance, of meeting with N.S.A. employees after the disclosure of the program in December in The New York Times and seeking to rally them "at the height of the first fur ball about this."

"You know, they're doing their jobs, but it was a difficult time," he told the committee. "But the only emotion they expressed to me was they wanted to be able to continue to do their work. You know, their fear was not for themselves or that they had done anything wrong, but that they wanted to be able to continue to do what it is they had been doing."

He also told of his talks with a handful of agency lawyers about the legality of the program under the president's authority as commander in chief under Article II of the Constitution. "I talked to the N.S.A. lawyers, most of my personal dialogue with them, they were very comfortable with the Article II arguments and the president's inherent authorities," General Hayden said.

At the same time, however, he acknowledged under questioning from Democrats that he did not read the Justice Department's formal opinion laying out the legal rationale for the program. He also said he did not recall any substantive discussion about the Congressional authorization in September 2001 to use all necessary force against Al Qaeda — a resolution that the White House now says helped give it legal authority for the wiretapping operation.

"Our discussion anchored itself on Article II," he said.

He acknowledged that there had been significant discussion within the administration — and between the White House and the security agency — about undertaking the program.

BellSouth Wants Retraction

ATLANTA, May 19 (AP) — The BellSouth Corporation is pressing USA Today to retract assertions that the telecommunications company provided customers' phone records to the National Security Agency.

The Atlanta-based company's chief lawyer, Marc Gary, sent a letter on Thursday to the publisher of USA Today, the Gannett Company's flagship paper, to retract "false and unsubstantiated statements" made in a May 11 article, said a BellSouth spokesman, Jeff Battcher.

A newspaper spokesman, Steve Anderson, said, "We are reviewing it and will be responding."

Hayden Urges CIA Critics To Refrain (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, President Bush's choice to lead the CIA, strongly defended the administration's policies on domestic surveillance and the treatment of detainees during his confirmation hearing yesterday, and urged senators to suspend debate about CIA failures and give the agency a chance to rebound.

"It's time to move past what seems to me to be an endless picking apart of the archaeology of every past intelligence success or failure," Hayden said. "CIA officers . . . deserve recognition of their efforts, and they also deserve not to have every action analyzed, second-guessed and criticized on the front pages of the morning paper."

Although accountability is important, he said the "CIA needs to get out of the news as source or subject and focus on protecting the American people by acquiring secrets and providing high-quality all-source analysis."

Hayden vowed to remake the CIA into the premier intelligence agency, in part by encouraging officers to take risks and to admit uncertainties even when top officials press for definitive findings. He promised to "speak truth to power," and said that he and the intelligence community had learned the lessons of Iraq.

"While the bulk of the agency's work must, in order to be effective, remain secret, fighting this long war on the terrorists who seek to do us harm requires that the American people and you, their elected representatives, know that the CIA is protecting them effectively and in a way consistent with the core values of our nation," Hayden said.

In more than six hours of testimony before the Senate intelligence committee, Hayden, a four-star Air Force general, offered assurances in some areas, saying he is committed to safeguarding privacy, to working effectively with other intelligence agencies and to improving the CIA's record of accomplishment. He also acknowledged serious disagreements with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Douglas J. Feith, the former No. 3 official in the Pentagon who is considered an architect of the Iraq invasion.

But Hayden deflected specific questions on sensitive subjects, including interrogation methods involving terrorism detainees and the scope of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping operation, telling senators he would respond only during the closed-door portion of the hearing.

Hayden, 61, designed the administration's eavesdropping program in the immediate days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, when he ran the National Security Agency. He defended the effort as helpful in the hunt for al-Qaeda though he provided no specific example of the program's success. Under the program, revealed in December, the NSA eavesdropped, without obtaining warrants, on overseas telephone calls by Americans that involved people the government considered terrorism suspects. Earlier this month, USA Today reported that the NSA had obtained phone records of millions of U.S. residents and businesses.

Hayden shed some new light on the program's inception, noting that he was asked by then-CIA Director George J. Tenet to provide a list of NSA's capabilities after the al-Qaeda attacks, even those that Hayden believed would not be permissible under the law. Hayden suggested the scope of the program may go beyond what is publicly known, but he said there was no White House push for eavesdropping on calls in which both parties were in the United States, and that every measure was taken to protect the privacy of Americans whose overseas calls were monitored.

"I understand there are privacy concerns involved in all of this. There's privacy concerns involved in the routine activities of NSA," he said. He said the warrantless eavesdropping was carefully targeted against al-Qaeda suspects.

"No one has said that there has been a targeting decision made that wasn't well-founded in a probable-cause standard," Hayden said.

Some Democrats questioned the claim, noting that thousands of Americans' calls have reportedly been intercepted.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) asked Hayden "whether people that were not associated with al-Qaeda have been trapped in this sort of thing," Hayden replied that if someone is targeted and then dropped, it "doesn't mean that the first decision was wrong. It just means this was not a lucrative target for communications intelligence."

Senators questioned the nominee closely and at length on the constitutionality of the program, which some legal scholars have challenged.

Hayden said the White House's legal basis is rooted in the opinion that Article II of the Constitution gives the president expansive authorities in a time of war to conduct domestic surveillance. Hayden said he never personally reviewed the legal opinion that was drawn up in support of the program, but "when they came to me and we discussed its lawfulness, our discussion anchored itself on Article II."

He said the administration did not attempt to rest its case on a congressional war resolution passed in the days after the al-Qaeda attacks, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said after the program was disclosed.

Among other subjects, Hayden said the intelligence community "had to win back the trust of the American people" after failing to accurately assess Iraq's weapons programs, and that it was working hard to avoid such mistakes when judging the threat posed by Iran's nuclear program.

He took particular aim at the intelligence-gathering being done at the Pentagon at the time under Feith, who promoted connections between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda. "I wasn't comfortable," Hayden said. "And I wasn't aware of a lot of the activity going on, you know, when it was contemporaneous with running up to the war."

But he sidestepped other questions in the public session, declining to embrace or distance himself from the Bush administration's policies on treatment of al-Qaeda suspects. When Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) asked if he thought "individuals may be secretly detained for decades," Hayden said he would be "happy to answer" in the closed session.

He gave the same answer when Feinstein asked if he condoned the interrogation practice of "waterboarding," in which a detainee is made to feel he is on the verge of drowning. Hayden defended the administration's policy of allowing the CIA to treat detainees more harshly than the military may treat prisoners of war, but said civilian agencies such as the CIA were legally obligated to refrain from "cruel, inhuman and degrading" treatment.

The committee's nine Republicans and seven Democrats signaled that Hayden's confirmation by the Senate is likely. Several congratulated him in advance. "You're going to be one of America's best CIA directors," said Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), who has criticized the administration on some intelligence matters.

Last year, Hayden became deputy director for national intelligence, and was nominated to lead the CIA days after Porter J. Goss was forced out of the job earlier this month, ending a turbulent 18-month tenure.

Hayden honored Goss in his opening statement but repeatedly sought to assure the committee, and those inside the agency, that he plans to run the CIA differently.

Hayden, who has often won high marks on the Hill for his detailed briefings, maintained a calm demeanor through the hours of questioning, although he bristled slightly when Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) said, "General, having evaluated your words, I now have a difficult time with your credibility."

"Well, Senator," Hayden said, "you're going to have to make a judgment on my character."

Wyden said Hayden had used speeches and congressional testimony to suggest that the NSA's surveillance techniques are narrowly focused, a claim that he said does not comport with news accounts. "So with all due respect, General, I can't tell now if you've simply said one thing and done another, or whether you have just parsed your words like a lawyer to intentionally mislead the public," Wyden said.

Hayden, citing his Jan. 23 speech at the National Press Club, said: "I chose my words very carefully because I knew that some day I would be having this conversation."

Hayden Defends Wiretapping In Contentious Hearing (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden vigorously defended the legality of the Bush administration's domestic wiretapping program and declared that the CIA "must be transformed" to stay abreast of terrorist and other threats during an often contentious hearing on his nomination to be the next CIA director.

Hayden spent much of the day fending off questions about his previous job as director of the National Security Agency. The four-star general acknowledged playing a larger than previously understood role in the creation of the controversial domestic eavesdropping program, and repeatedly refused to respond to questions about details of the operation during the public portion of his testimony before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.

But Hayden also described ambitious plans for the beleaguered agency he hopes to lead next, saying he intends to push the CIA to be more aggressive in mounting clandestine operations and more rigorous in the assessments it produces to avoid the mistakes that plagued the prewar estimates on Iraq.

In perhaps the clearest signal of a looming shift in course for the troubled agency, Hayden made it clear that he believes the CIA has become too bogged down tracking daily developments in Iraq and other global trouble spots.

Instead, he suggested that the CIA should surrender more of that work to the Pentagon, focus more of its energies on anticipating longer-term threats and trends, and reconcile itself to a diminished role in which it is an important, but not isolated, member of the U.S. intelligence community.

At one point, Hayden likened the CIA to "a top player on a football team -- critical, but part of an integrated whole. Even the top player needs to focus on the scoreboard, not on their individual achievement."

Hayden, 61, currently serves as the deputy director for national intelligence, the principal deputy to the nation's top spymaster, John D. Negroponte, who oversees the activities of all 16 U.S. spy agencies. The general played a behind-the-scenes role in ousting former CIA director Porter J. Goss, who resigned two weeks ago amid criticism that he was too turf-conscious and resistant to reforms.

Lawmakers and Senate aides emerged from Thursday's session saying that Hayden was likely to be confirmed by the Senate as early as next week. Even so, the hearing made it clear that Hayden's standing among some members has been diminished by his involvement in domestic surveillance programs that have been major sources of controversy for the Bush administration in recent months.

Shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, President Bush authorized the NSA to intercept communications between people in the United States and individuals overseas suspected of having ties to al-Qaida. In doing so, the NSA bypassed the usual requirement that the government obtain permission from a court before placing wiretaps on a U.S. resident. The Bush administration also kept the program hidden from all but a handful of lawmakers until it was exposed in news reports last year.

During one particularly tense exchange Thursday, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., challenged Hayden to reconcile details that have emerged on the scope of the surveillance operation with previous public comments downplaying its significance or suggesting that the government was not eavesdropping on Americans without court warrants.

"General, I can't tell now if you've simply said one thing and done another, or whether you have just parsed your words like a lawyer to intentionally mislead the public," Wyden said. "What's to say that if you're confirmed to head the CIA, we won't go through exactly this kind of drill with you over there?"

Hayden shot back: "Well, Senator, you're going to have to make a judgment on my character."

Hayden acknowledged that the program raised privacy concerns, but said repeatedly that he believed it was lawful. "I'm very comfortable with what the agency did, what I did," he said.

He resisted pressure to provide more details, saying he would address matters in a closed session with senators scheduled later in the day. He similarly deflected questions about the CIA's interrogation methods and handling of detainees.

But Hayden did provide some new information on the origins of the domestic surveillance program, indicating that he proposed the idea after being prompted by then-CIA director George J. Tenet to consider what else the NSA might do to combat terrorism.

Tenet "invited me to come down and talk to the administration about what more could be done," Hayden said. "There then followed a discussion as to why or how we could make that possible."

He did not elaborate, but disputed reports that Vice President Cheney or other administration officials put pressure on the NSA to be even more aggressive in spying on Americans.

Some lawmakers have questioned whether Hayden's lengthy military career is a liability at a time when the Pentagon is increasingly encroaching on the CIA's traditional turf. Hayden expressed support for the expanding military role in intelligence-gathering, saying that the burden on the CIA has been so taxing that "we welcome additional players on the field."

But he also sought to distance himself from the Pentagon, noting that he and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had disagreed over reforms that eroded the military's influence over intelligence operations and budgets.

Hayden was also sharply critical of the activities of a controversial intelligence analytic unit set up within the Pentagon by former Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith, a leading advocate for the war in Iraq.

The team Feith assembled helped make the case for war by uncovering supposed links between Saddam Hussein's regime and al-Qaida. Their findings were presented to the CIA and officials at the White House, but have since been discredited.

Feith's team, Hayden said, had set out to prove a case by assembling "every possible ounce of evidence" and ignoring contradictory information. Using that method, he continued, analysts can build a convincing case against even innocent targets.

"I got three great kids, but if you tell me, 'Go out and find all the bad things they've done, Hayden,' I could build you a pretty good dossier," Hayden said. "You'd think they were pretty bad people because that's what I was looking for and that's what I built up. That'd be very wrong, OK? That would be inaccurate. That would be misleading."

Hayden said he was concerned that numerous investigations and public criticism have taken a toll on the agency.

"It is time to move past what seems to me to be an endless picking apart of the 'archaeology' of every past intelligence failure and success," Hayden said. "CIA needs to get out of the news -- as source or subject -- and focus on protecting the American people by acquiring secrets and providing high-quality all-source analysis."

CIA Nominee Hayden Is Grilled About Surveillance Programs (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Under cordial questioning from U.S. senators, President Bush's nominee to head the Central Intelligence Agency, Gen. Michael Hayden, defended White House programs to monitor American telecommunications traffic but stressed he would operate independently from the Pentagon.

The four-star Air Force general declined in his confirmation hearing to publicly address charges that Mr. Bush authorized much broader surveillance activity, carried out by the Defense Department's National Security Agency, to catalog millions of domestic phone calls. But Gen. Hayden, who headed the NSA from 1999 to 2005, said that the NSA's warrantless wiretaps of international calls believed tied to terrorists were legal and had been sufficiently cleared with Congress.

"When I had to make this personal decision in October 2001...the math was pretty straightforward," Gen. Hayden told the 15 members of the Senate Intelligence Committee yesterday. "I could not not do this."

Gen. Hayden's confirmation process comes amid increased attacks by Democratic lawmakers and civil-liberties proponents on the Bush administration's counterterrorism measures, in particular the NSA programs. Both Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee used much of their allotted time yesterday trying to learn more about reports that the NSA has developed an extensive database of domestic phone calls. (Yesterday, BellSouth Corp. demanded that USA Today retract "the false and unsubstantiated statements" in an article naming the company as having provided domestic calling records to the NSA. See article on page A5.)

On Wednesday, the White House gave classified briefings to both the Senate and House intelligence committees on the NSA's activities. Yesterday, some Democratic lawmakers said they remained concerned about legalities of the programs and their threats to civil liberties. Some accused Gen. Hayden of assisting the White House in trying to cover up the extent of the NSA activities. "I now have a difficult time with your credibility," Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon told the general.

In a closed-door session with Gen. Hayden yesterday afternoon, Intelligence Committee members were expected to question him more closely on NSA operations. The committee is expected to vote on his nomination next week.

Gen. Hayden used his opening remarks to outline his vision of how to resurrect the CIA's morale after the intelligence failures leading up to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the invasion of Iraq. He stressed that as CIA director he would play a leading role in setting higher standards for collecting human intelligence at all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies and would seek to better integrate the agencies. He said another goal is depoliticizing the CIA and getting it off the front pages of U.S. newspapers.

The CIA has been widely criticized in recent years for using inaccurate sources and failing to share information with U.S. law-enforcement agencies. Last year, Congress established a new office, the Director of National Intelligence, to better manage U.S. intelligence agencies. Gen. Hayden helps oversee that office, and many of the senators said they believed Gen. Hayden's experience at the DNI and NSA made him the best choice to head the CIA.

"You have the vision thing right," Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California told the 61-year-old general.

During the hearing, Gen. Hayden emphasized his independence from the Pentagon and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. He portrayed himself as a foil to Mr. Rumsfeld's ambitions and said he would resist any intelligence grab by the Pentagon. He also said that as CIA director he would serve as a coordinator of all U.S. human intelligence gathering and would regulate the Defense Department's clandestine activities. "We're trying to create a bright line" to distinguish the CIA's and Pentagon's overseas activities, Gen. Hayden said. "It gets sometimes merged. That's why we need to manage this."

Currently, the Defense Department controls 80% of the U.S. government's intelligence budget. Gen Hayden's confirmation would place active military officers in charge of all of Washington's principal spy agencies.

BellSouth Calls For A Retraction Of Report It Gave Records To NSA (USAT)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — BellSouth asked USA TODAY on Thursday to "retract the false and unsubstantiated statements" about the company that it contends were in a May 11 story about a database of domestic calling records maintained by the National Security Agency.

In a letter to the newspaper's publisher, Craig Moon, the company noted that the story said BellSouth is "working under contract with the NSA" to provide "phone call records of tens of millions of Americans" that have been incorporated into the database.

"No such proof was offered by your newspaper because no such contracts exist," stated the letter, portions of which were read by spokesman Jeff Battcher. "You have offered no proof that BellSouth provided massive calling data to the NSA as part of a warrantless program because it simply did not happen."

Steve Anderson, a USA TODAY spokesman, said "We did receive the letter this afternoon. We are reviewing it, and we will be responding."

BellSouth and two other companies named in the story, Verizon and AT&T, have since been sued in federal court for $200 billion by plaintiffs alleging violations of privacy, telecommunications law and the Constitution. BellSouth and Verizon have denied providing information to the NSA. AT&T has said it won't comment on national security matters.

USA TODAY first contacted BellSouth more than five weeks ago. On the night before the story was published, the newspaper described the story in detail to BellSouth, and the company did not challenge the newspaper's account. The company's official response at that time: "BellSouth does not provide any confidential customer information to the NSA or any governmental agency without proper legal authority."

BellSouth first raised questions on Monday. It said, "Based on our review to date, we have confirmed no such contract exists and we have not provided bulk customer calling records to the NSA."

BellSouth Demands Retraction From USA Today On NSA Article (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey And Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

BellSouth Corp. yesterday demanded that USA Today retract "the false and unsubstantiated statements" outlined in an article naming the company as having provided domestic calling records to the National Security Agency.

In a letter to USA Today president and publisher Craig Moon, as well as to the general counsel of the newspaper's parent company, Gannett Co., the phone company asks for an immediate retraction of the article's characterization of BellSouth's relationship to the NSA.

"We did receive a letter this afternoon. We are reviewing it and we will be responding," said Steve Anderson, a spokesman for USA Today.

A BellSouth spokesman, Jeff Battcher, described the letter as quoting phrases from the May 11, USA Today article7, which describes a massive database of domestic calls that BellSouth -- as well as Verizon Communications Inc. and AT&T Inc. -- allegedly provided to the NSA.

When asked about the letter's content, Mr. Battcher said it cites passages from the article alleging that BellSouth is "under contract with the NSA" to provide "phone call records of tens of millions of Americans" that have been incorporated into a database. The letter also notes that USA Today said the alleged actions "raised legal questions," noting that "telecom law assesses hefty fines on phone companies that violate customer privacy by divulging phone records without warrants."

"BellSouth now insists the newspaper retract the false and unsubstantiated statements you've made regarding our company," the letter said, according to Mr. Battcher.

Since the story appeared Verizon has also denied aspects of it. Neither Verizon nor AT&T would comment on BellSouth's action or say whether they were considering similar moves.

Mr. Battcher said the demand for a retraction was in part prompted by the cost BellSouth likely will incur defending against as many as five lawsuits seeking billions of dollars that have been filed against the Atlanta-based company since the article's publication. The company considers the suits without merit, Mr. Battcher said, and plans to hire outside lawyers to defend the company.

On Monday, BellSouth publicly denied turning over bulk calling records to the NSA, saying the agency had never contacted it to provide information about domestic calls. "We would have thought USA Today would have acted responsibly and retracted the statements," Mr. Battcher said.

The company, he said, "has worked hard to earn the trust of our customers and we hope that USA Today will fulfill its responsibilities to its readers and the public at large by immediately correcting the inaccurate reporting that may undermine that trust."

4 Guatanamo Prisoners Attempt Suicide In One Day (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba — Four terrorism suspects at the sprawling prison network here attempted suicide Thursday, and detainees at a camp for the most compliant prisoners attacked guards with improvised weapons when the guards tried to rescue a man attempting to hang himself, a spokesman for the U.S. military-run prison said.

The disturbance at Camp 4, a communal facility housing 175 prisoners, followed three overdose attempts earlier in the day at Camp 1, where about 180 detainees live in metal mesh cages.

Those involved in the disturbance were moved to maximum-security confinement, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, public affairs director for the prison and interrogation network.

Neither the identities nor the nationalities of the prisoners were disclosed.

"When the guard force entered the [Camp 4] compound to intervene and save the life of the detainee, some detainees attempted to prevent them from rescuing the detainee by using fans, light fixtures and other items as improvised weapons," Durand said.

"Minimum force was used to quell the disturbance and prevent the suicide."

As many as 10 detainees participated in the incident.

It was unclear why the men sought to take their lives simultaneously or on this specific day.

Several "distinguished visitors" have toured the prison network this week, including a four-star general, an FBI official and several prominent attorneys seeking to represent prisoners in U.S. court challenges, and international media are here to report on war-crimes tribunal proceedings.

"At this point, I have no idea of the motive, no idea of any coordination and no idea of any intended message," Durand said.

Two of the four men who attempted suicide were hospitalized and under observation, he said.

In a statement announcing the first two attempts to overdose on hoarded prescription medication, Durand said that there had been 39 suicide attempts at Guantanamo by 23 detainees since the prison opened in 2002.

"A single detainee accounts for 12 of the 39 attempts," he said, apparently referring to Juma al Dosari, a 31-year-old Bahraini whose lawyer said he tried to kill himself in March by ripping out stitches from a previously self-inflicted wound.

Durand's figures fall far short of the number of previous incidents officials called "self-harm events" and "hanging gestures."

In 2003, there were 350 such attempts, according to the public affairs officer for the military's Southern Command at the time, Army Col. David McWilliams.

DOJ_NMG_0028906

In a single week that year, 23 prisoners tried to hang themselves with nooses fashioned from ripped sheets.

The number of suicide attempts dropped to 110 in 2004, Southern Command reported.

Military authorities haven't disclosed last year's figure.

On Wednesday, the commander of the prison hospital, who declined to be identified beyond his rank as a Navy captain, confirmed that three detainees continue to refuse to eat and are force-fed through a nasal-gastric tube each day.

A mass hunger strike last autumn at one point involved about 130 prisoners until camp medics intervened with force-feedings.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Lawmakers Rip Homeland Security Management (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, May 18, 2006

Lawmakers railed against security gaps at the Homeland Security Department on Thursday, demanding to know why a man now charged with sex offenses had access to classified information and a convicted felon's limousine company was paid millions of dollars to chauffeur top officials.

Two Homeland Security officials and the associate director of the U.S. Office of Personnel Management who sat through two hours of grilling largely portrayed the department as victim to a few bad employees and constraining contracting rules.

But members of the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee said the agency has not been vigilant enough.

In the limousine case, Homeland Security awarded $25 million in contracts to the Virginia-based company whose owner, Christopher Baker, has numerous felony convictions. Other clients used the company to chauffeur people to poker parties attended by House members, CIA officials and, allegedly, prostitutes.

"This is not rocket science," said committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., adding, "This involves kickbacks, gambling, prostitution, and we're talking about people who were driving the highest people in the department around."

Dwight M. Williams, the department's chief security officer, said Homeland Security may not have had the authority to look at Baker's criminal past. He said it only checked the backgrounds of drivers who had access to department headquarters and employees.

"We have to decide how far we want to take the security," Williams said. "It's been focused on those with access."

Brian Doyle was the department's fourth-ranking spokesman, and had top-security clearance, when he was arrested last month on 23 felony charges of sexually preying on a detective posing as a 14-year-old girl in explicit Internet conversations. Doyle, 55, has since resigned from the department.

Noting reports that Doyle had downloaded pornography while on a previous job, King questioned whether the issue could have been detected before the former spokesman joined the department, perhaps with lie-detector tests.

He did not get an answer.

Lawmakers also criticized department officials about rampant staff turnover at the third-largest federal agency, leaving some high-level jobs vacant. K. Gregg Prillaman, Homeland Security's chief personnel director, said the department is still feeling growing pains from merging 185,000 employees from 22 disparate agencies in 2003.

"Executives who were charged up, had high energy after 9/11 — they were highly motivated, and they're tired. They've worked very hard," Prillaman said.

DHS Officials Grilled On Vacancies In High-level Jobs (GovExec)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, May 18, 2006

Lingering senior-level job vacancies at Homeland Security Department agencies including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Transportation Security Administration and two bureaus involved in border control are worrisome, lawmakers told witnesses at a hearing Thursday.

"Recruitment is probably our highest priority right now," K. Gregg Prillaman, DHS' chief human capital officer, told members of the House Homeland Security Subcommittee on Management, Integration and Oversight.

But FEMA has failed to fill senior-level jobs, according to a memorandum the subcommittee released late Thursday. Subcommittee member Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., whose district was hit by Hurricane Katrina, said with just two weeks left before this year's storm season begins, the agency must beef up its ranks.

"When I see only 73 percent of FEMA employees on board, I'm concerned," he said.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection and TSA also are listed in the memo as still having senior-level vacancies.

"We have a very real problem in DHS with retention, recruitment and morale," said subcommittee chairman Mike Rogers, R.-Ala. "The number of vacancies is a growing problem."

At the hearing, lawmakers also raised concerns about DHS' ability to conduct thorough security checks of individual contractors. Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr., D-N.J., said Shirlington Limousines, with which the department signed deals only to see the contractor become engulfed in the "Duke" Cunningham scandal, was run by a man "with a 62-page rap sheet" and multiple convictions. Pascrell and other subcommittee members expressed concern about the department's lack of knowledge about this.

The department had conducted background checks of the company's drivers, said Dwight Williams, director of DHS' Office of Security.

This is the second time in recent weeks DHS officials have been grilled by legislators; Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, told DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff in a memo sent in late April that the department must announce how many jobs FEMA still has open. Davis' staff is still processing the results of that request.

DHS officials maintained that the situation will improve.

"My sense is DHS will be better during the next three years than it was in the last three years," Prillaman said.

Homeland Security Turnover Hurts Morale, Officials Testify (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

It's no secret that morale is a problem at the Homeland Security Department, created three years ago in a mega-merger that pulled together 185,000 employees working in more than 220 occupations.

Bush administration officials have tried to play down turf battles and culture clashes as transitional woes that would fade after the rank and file had worked together for five to seven years, but complaints by employees continue and are starting to get to the ears of members of Congress.

Yesterday, two senior department officials acknowledged that turnover in top management jobs there appears to be adversely affecting employee morale.

Answering questions at a House hearing, K. Gregg Prillaman , the department's chief human capital officer, and Dwight M. Williams , the department's chief security officer, suggested that the turnover rate at the top of the department spills downward into the ranks and influences morale.

Williams said senior leaders -- many are political appointees -- burn out because of long hours and then leave, creating gaps in the top management team. He said the department is more stable than it was 18 months ago but added, "We are not there yet."

The creation of the department, to some extent, was a "hostile takeover" and not something employees would have voted for, Prillaman said. Efforts are underway to train line managers how to better deal with employee issues, he said.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), chairman of the House Homeland Security subcommittee on management and oversight, raised the issue of vacant leadership posts at the outset of the hearing. His list included the undersecretary for science and technology, the commissioner for Customs and Border Protection, the chief financial officer, the assistant secretary for cyber security and the chief privacy officer.

The first three positions require Senate confirmation, and the department has nominees in various stages of the appointment process. But some jobs have been vacant for several months, and Rogers said "other key vacancies are expected soon.

"I am concerned this high turnover undermines the department's effectiveness," he said. "It could also very well weaken our efforts to integrate the department's many agencies and further erode employee morale."

Rogers held the hearing at the urging of Rep. Kendrick B. Meek (D-Fla.), who held up a sheaf of letters that he said had been sent him from Homeland Security employees. The employees, he said, think the department is driving away talent and that managers are struggling to motivate employees.

Meek pointed to MaxHR, the department's new performance-based pay system, as a source of anxiety for the employees. He questioned the fairness of new rules for how employees will appeal major disciplinary actions and for how unions negotiate on behalf of employees. Unions have successfully blocked the new rules in federal court, and the issues are before an appeals court.

Prillaman, who joined the department eight months ago, said the agency thinks the new pay and personnel system will improve morale, in part because managers and supervisors must undergo training to improve their skills in communication.

He noted that 8,000 managers have undergone training on MaxHR and that 6,000 more will be trained by the end of this year.

"We are doing what Fortune 500 companies have been doing over the last 15 years," Prillaman said.

But two union presidents, John Gage of the American Federation of Government Employees and Colleen M. Kelley of the National Treasury Employees Union, testified that some department bureaus have created unnecessary friction, such as adopting new rules for shift assignments regardless of an employee's seniority or family considerations.

In addition, Gage said, inconsistent treatment of employees regarding overtime pay and foreign-language proficiency pay "need to be cured right away."

House Will Probe Limo Contract (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

Lawmakers say they will hold hearings to probe a Department of Homeland Security transportation contract, which members of Congress from both parties say raises procurement and security concerns.

Department officials have repeatedly defended both the way the contract was awarded and the security procedures under which it is operated. They have launched a counteroffensive on Capitol Hill, visiting with lawmakers in an attempt to assuage concerns.

Despite their efforts, Rep. Mike D. Rogers, Alabama Republican, chairman of the oversight subcommittee of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said yesterday that he wanted to hold a hearing on the contract award -- to Alexandria-based Shirlington Limousine and Transportation.

Aides said later that he hoped the hearing could happen when Congress returns in mid-June from its Memorial Day recess, but that the timing would depend on when they were able to get documentation from the department.

The hearing is the latest in a series of moves that lawmakers have taken since the Shirlington contract came into the spotlight at the end of last month amid press reports that the company was under scrutiny as part of a congressional bribery probe.

The company has been accused of providing limousines that took prostitutes to parties where lawmakers -- including former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican now in federal prison after being convicted of corruption -- were being entertained by intelligence and defense contractors. Shirlington's owner, Christopher Baker, reportedly has a lengthy criminal record and a troubled financial history.

Last week, the committee's ranking Democrat, Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson, wrote to the department's inspector general, asking about how the contract was awarded.

He expressed concerns that the contract was not bid out properly, that the company might not qualify for the special "set-aside" status under which it was entitled to bid and that the department might not have fulfilled its due-diligence requirements in ascertaining that the company was a responsible contractor.

With a speed that surprised some familiar with the department's often arthritic response to congressional requests, Chief Procurement Officer Elaine Duke met with Mr. Thompson last week and Wednesday provided written answers to the questions he had posed the inspector general.

In the letter, Miss Duke explained that Shirlington first won the contract in April 2004, under the set-aside provisions of a small-business program for "historically underutilized business zones," known as HUBZone.

The program is administered by the Small Business Administration, which ruled that Shirlington qualified.

Fliers Could Keep Their Shoes On If New Airport Scanner Is Approved (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, May 19, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. — A government lab is testing a "very promising" new machine that would allow airline passengers to keep their shoes on while going through security checkpoints, the nation's aviation security chief said Thursday.

The machine, which detects explosive material on shoes when people stand on a platform, is getting a "highly expedited" review at the lab, said Kip Hawley, head of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

"We are looking at this with great interest," Hawley said. "Anything that speeds up explosive detection through the checkpoint, we want to encourage."

He wouldn't give a timetable for deploying the machines. They must pass testing in an airport before they are used to screen passengers.

The ShoeScanner uses technology similar to a medical MRI to detect explosives in 5 to 8 seconds. It shoots radio waves at shoes to agitate molecules and analyze their structure.

Readings are sent to a computer that holds a library of explosives characteristics and makes a rapid comparison.

Removing shoes at checkpoints has been one of the biggest inconveniences for passengers in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Passengers have been urged to remove thick-soled shoes at checkpoints since Richard Reid tried to blow up a Paris-to-Miami plane in late 2001 using plastic explosive hidden in his sneakers.

"The question is: Can you operate and deploy (the machine) and have people walk on it without it breaking down?" Hawley said. "It's sensitive electronic equipment."

The TSA has been searching for technology that detects explosives better than the X-ray machines and metal detectors now used at checkpoints.

The ShoeScanner is being developed by GE Security, a General Electric subsidiary that makes the "puffer" portals deployed at dozens of U.S. airports that blow air jets at passengers to detect explosives residue.

The government's Transportation Security Lab in New Jersey also is testing GE's Itemiser, which detects explosives on passengers when they press a finger on an electronic reader.

The ShoeScanner and Itemiser would first be used only in checkpoint lanes reserved for travelers who pass a background check and pay an annual fee to get faster security under a Registered Traveler program starting in June. Airports and private companies will run the voluntary program. The TSA wants them to pay for new detection machines that may let participants keep their shoes or coats on through checkpoints.

Those machines could ultimately be used for ordinary travelers. "That could be the big payoff for the Registered Traveler program," Hawley said.

GE Security is a minority owner of Verified Identity Pass, a Manhattan company with contracts to run Registered Traveler in Orlando, Cincinnati, Indianapolis and San Jose airports.

"Registered Travelers would be far more secure than anybody going through the regular (security) lanes," Verified Identity CEO Steven Brill said. The ShoeScanner "is a better way to test shoes than putting them through an X-ray."

Federal Judge Dismisses Lawsuit By Man Held In Terror Program (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0028910

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — A federal judge on Thursday dismissed a lawsuit brought by a man who says he was an innocent victim of the United States government's program transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation.

Judge T. S. Ellis 3d ruled in favor of the Bush administration, which had argued that the "state secrets" privilege provided an absolute bar to the lawsuit against a former C.I.A. director and transportation companies. Judge Ellis said the suit's going forward, even if the government denied the contentions, would risk an exposure of state secrets.

The case involves Khaled el-Masri, a Kuwaiti-born German, who was arrested on Dec. 31, 2003, in Macedonia, where he had gone for a vacation. From there, he was flown to a prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he was held for five months before being released. During his incarceration in Kabul, he has said, he was shackled, beaten and injected with drugs.

United States officials have acknowledged the principal elements of Mr. Masri's account, saying intelligence authorities may have confused him with an operative of Al Qaeda with a similar name. The officials also said he was released in May 2004 on the direct orders of Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, after she learned he had been mistakenly identified as a terrorism suspect.

Judge Ellis said Mr. Masri's claim involved the clandestine program of transferring terrorism suspects known as "extraordinary rendition" and "the means and methods the foreign intelligence service of this and other countries used to carry out the program."

Citing an affidavit by Porter J. Goss, who will leave as director of the Central Intelligence Agency next week, Judge Ellis added, "Any admission or denial of these allegations by defendants in this case would reveal the means and methods employed pursuant to this clandestine program and such a revelation would present a grave risk of injury to national security."

Mr. Masri's lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union had argued that there were no state secrets to protect as his story has been widely reported and officials had even acknowledged the existence of the rendition program. But Judge Ellis said there was an important distinction between "a general admission the program exists and the admission or denial of the specific facts at issue in this case."

Ben Wizner, an A.C.L.U. lawyer for Mr. Masri, said, "The idea that the court must close its eyes and ears to common sense and protect the nation from disclosure of information that the whole world knows is absurd." He said an appeal would be considered.

Judge Ellis said Mr. Masri's interests in having his rights vindicated in court must yield to "the national interest in preserving state secrets." But he noted that if Mr. Masri's account were true, he "suffered injuries as a result of our country's mistake and deserves a remedy." He said only the legislative or executive branches could provide such a remedy, presumably in the form of compensation or apology.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Leader Acts To Defuse Shiite Rivalry In Basra (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 18 -- President Jalal Talabani convened an emergency meeting Thursday to discuss the southern port of Basra, Iraq's second-largest city and the heart of a growing, lethal power struggle among some of the Shiite Muslim religious parties that lead Iraq's governing coalition.

Violence in the south Thursday included a bombing at the home of Basra's police chief. In Najaf, another major city in the Shiite-dominated region, the head of local militias loyal to the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr was shot dead by police allied with a rival Shiite party.

DOJ_NMG_0028911

Political violence across Iraq killed at least two dozen Iraqis. Four U.S. soldiers and their Iraqi interpreter were killed when their patrol hit a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad, and the U.S. military reported the death Wednesday of an American sailor in the western province of Anbar.

The deaths brought the number of U.S. fatalities in May to about 50, a pace that threatens to make this month one of the deadliest this year for American forces in Iraq.

In Baghdad, Talabani summoned Iraq's two vice presidents to discuss the situation in Basra, where one of the smaller Shiite groups, the Islamic Virtue Party, has been engaging in increasingly open hostilities against other Shiite religious parties.

Basra, which is under the control of British forces, was long seen as one of the more peaceful areas of Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The homogeneity of its Shiite population spared it from much of the sectarian violence that racked western and central Iraq.

However, the British troops, who are more hands-off than their American counterparts, are increasingly being accused of allowing militias of the governing Shiite religious parties to infiltrate security forces and seize a large measure of control.

Although the killings of foreign and Iraqi journalists in Basra have limited coverage in the city, residents describe political violence that leaves corpses on the streets daily. Iraqi newspapers this week reported Basra residents fleeing to comparative safety abroad or even in Baghdad.

The governor of Basra province, a member of the Islamic Virtue Party, last week demanded the removal of Basra's police chief and local military leader, accusing them of failing to rein in political and sectarian killings. Since then, the unrest has included an attack on a police station; burning of offices of Iraq's most powerful Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq; and marches Wednesday that drew thousands of participants.

Talabani assigned Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi, a member of the Supreme Council, to a task force on the Basra crisis. On Thursday, Abdul Mahdi invoked "the responsibility of the political powers to calm down the situation." In a news conference with his fellow vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, and Talabani, Abdul Mahdi urged leaders in Basra "not to be diverted by political and party interests when handling the issues of the city."

In Najaf, meanwhile, police shot dead Abbas al-Chillabi, commander of the local regiments of the Mahdi Army militia. An official with Sadr's organization, Sahib al-Amiry, said police shot Chillabi in the head at a checkpoint, and he called it a deliberate political killing.

The Najaf police chief, Brig. Gen. Abbas Moadal, called the shooting an accident. Police at the checkpoint had believed they were under attack when a wedding party that apparently included Chillabi approached the checkpoint, firing shots into the air in celebration, the police chief said.

The killing had the potential to heighten tensions between Sadr's followers and those of the Supreme Council, which controls many government and security offices in Najaf. Both the Supreme Council and Sadr command tens of thousands of militia members.

In Baghdad, the same Shiite parties are among those competing with Sunni Arab, Kurdish and secular blocs for seats in Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki's cabinet. Maliki faces a Monday deadline to name the new government, which U.S. officials say they hope will bring calm and stability.

Also in Baghdad, coaches, athletes and families gathered Thursday at the capital's taekwondo union, consoling one another and waiting for news about 15 martial arts competitors -- including five members of Iraq's national taekwondo team and the only Iraqi to win a medal at an Asian regional competition in April -- who were abducted Monday on the dangerous desert road between Fallujah and Ramadi. The athletes, dressed in track suits and athletic shoes, had been heading to neighboring Jordan for a vacation.

Jamal Abdul Karim, head of the Iraqi Taekwondo Union, said he and other employees of the club each gave a year's salary Thursday to raise the $100,000 ransom demanded by someone claiming to be an intermediary for the captors.

"We've been praying from the bottom of our hearts to get them released," said Aqeel Abdul-Karim, 26, an employee of the club and friend of the kidnapped athletes.

As Death Stalks Iraq, Middle-Class Exodus Begins (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0028912

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 18 — Deaths run like water through the life of the Bahjat family. Four neighbors. A barber. Three grocers. Two men who ran a currency exchange shop.

But when six armed men stormed into their sons' primary school this month, shot a guard dead, and left fliers ordering it to close, Assad Bahjat knew it was time to leave.

"The main thing now is to just get out of Iraq," said Mr. Bahjat, standing in a room heaped with suitcases and bedroom furniture in eastern Baghdad.

In the latest indication of the crushing hardships weighing on the lives of Iraqis, increasing portions of the middle class seem to be doing everything they can to leave the country. In the last 10 months, the state has issued new passports to 1.85 million Iraqis, 7 percent of the population and a quarter of the country's estimated middle class.

The school system offers another clue: Since 2004, the Ministry of Education has issued 39,554 letters permitting parents to take their children's academic records abroad. The number of such letters issued in 2005 was double that in 2004, according to the director of the ministry's examination department. Iraqi officials and international organizations put the number of Iraqis in Jordan at close to a million. Syrian cities also have growing Iraqi populations.

Since the bombing of a shrine in Samarra in February touched off a sectarian rampage, crime and killing have spread further through Iraqi society, paralyzing neighborhoods and smashing families. Now, on the brink of a new, permanent government, Iraqis are expressing the darkest view of their future in three years. "We're like sheep at a slaughter farm," said a businessman, who is arranging a move to Jordan. "We are just waiting for our time." The Samarra bombing produced a new kind of sectarian violence. Gangs of Shiites in Baghdad pulled Sunni Arabs out of houses and mosques and killed them in a spree that prompted retaliatory attacks and displaced 14,500 families in three months, according to the Ministry for Migration.

Most frightening, many middle-class Iraqis say, was how little the government did to stop the violence. That failure boded ominously for the future, leaving them feeling that the government was incapable of protecting them and more darkly, that perhaps it helped in the killing. Shiite-dominated government forces have been accused of carrying out sectarian killings.

"Now I am isolated," said Monkath Abdul Razzaq, a middle-class Sunni Arab, who decided to leave after the bombing. "I have no government. I have no protection from the government. Anyone can come to my house, take me, kill me and throw me in the trash."

Traces of the leaving are sprinkled throughout daily life. Mr. Abdul Razzaq, who will move his family to Syria next month, where he has already rented an apartment, said a fistfight broke out while he waited for five hours in a packed passport office to fill out applications for his two young sons. In Salheyah, a commercial district in central Baghdad, bus companies that specialize in Syria and Jordan say ticket sales have surged.

Karim al-Ani, the owner of one of the firms, Tiger Company, said a busy day last year used to be three buses, but in recent months it comes close to 10. "Before it was more tourists," he said. "Now we are taking everything, even furniture."

The impact can be seen in neighborhoods here. While much of the city bustles during daytime hours, the more war-torn areas, like in the south and in Ameriya, Ghazaliya, and Khadra in the west, are eerily empty at midday. On Mr. Bahjat's block in Dawra, only about 5 houses out of 40 remain occupied. Empty houses in the area are scrawled with the words "Omar Brigade," a Sunni group that kills Shiites.

Residents have been known to protest, at least on paper. In an act of helpless fury this winter, a large banner hung across a house in Dawra that read, "Do God and Islam agree that I should leave my house to live in a camp with my five children and wife?"

"Shadows," said Eileen Bahjat, Mr. Bahjat's wife, standing with her two sons and describing what is left in the neighborhood. "Shadows and killing."

In Dawra, one of the worst areas in all of Baghdad, public life has ground to a halt. Four teachers have been killed in the past 10 days in Mr. Bahjat's area alone, and the Ahmed al-Waily primary school where the Bahjat boys, ages 12 and 8, studied, may not be able to hold final exams because of the killings. And three teachers from the Batoul secondary school were shot in late April.

DOJ_NMG_0028913

Trash is collected only sporadically. On April 3, insurgents shot seven garbage collectors to death near their truck, and their bodies lay in the area for eight hours before the authorities could collect them, said Naeem al-Kaabi, deputy mayor for municipal affairs in Baghdad. In all, 312 trash workers have been killed in Baghdad in the past six months.

"Sunnis, Shiites, Christians," said Mr. Bahjat, a Christian who this month moved his family to New Baghdad, an eastern suburb, to live with a relative, before leaving for Syria. "They just want to empty this place of all people."

"We must start from zero," he said. "Maybe under zero. But there is no other choice. Even with more time, the security will not improve."

It is more than just the killing that has sapped hope for the future. Iraqis have waited for five months for a permanent government, after voting in a national election in December, and though political leaders are on the brink of announcing it, some Iraqis say the amount of haggling it took to form it makes them skeptical that it will be able to solve bigger problems.

Abd al-Kareem al-Mahamedawy, a tribal sheik from Amara in southern Iraq who fought for years against Saddam Hussein, compared the process to "giving birth to a deformed child."

As if to underscore the point, a scene of sorrow unfolded just outside Mr. Mahamedawy's gate, where an extended family gathered, full of nervous movement, and absorbed the news of the strangling death of their 13-year-old boy by kidnappers. A woman brought her hands to her head in the timeworn motion of mourning.

Even with the resolve to leave, many departing Iraqis said they consider the move only temporary and hope to return if Iraq's fractious groups are united and stem the tide of the killings.

Cars and furniture are sold, but those who can afford it, like the Abdul Razzaq family, hang on to their properties. In Khadra in western Baghdad, Nesma Abdul Razzaq, Mr. Abdul Razzaq's wife, has spent the past months carefully wrapping their photographs, vases and furniture in cloth and packing them in boxes. She spoke of the sadness of the empty rooms and the pain of having to build a new life in a strange place.

"I have a rage inside myself," Mrs. Abdul Razzaq said by telephone, as her area, since last autumn, has become unsafe for a Western reporter to visit. "I feel desperate."

"I don't want to leave Iraq. But I have to for the kids. They have seen enough."

In a quiet block in Mansour, a wealthy neighborhood in central Baghdad, where stately, gated homes are lined with pruned hedges, the Kubba family spends most of its time indoors. They have hung onto their lifestyle: three of their children study violin, flute, and ballet in an arts school outside the neighborhood despite encroaching violence.

Last fall, a foul smell led neighbors to the bodies of seven family members in a house several doors down from the Kubbas. They had been robbed. Fehed Kubba, 15, went to buy bread last year and saw a crowd near the bakery that he assumed was watching a backgammon game. When he pushed in to look, he saw a man who had just been shot to death.

But it was the increasingly sectarian nature of the violence, deeply painful to Iraqis who are proud of their intermarried heritage, that tipped the scales as Falah Kubba and his wife, Samira, considered leaving with Fehed, Roula, 13, and Heya, 12.

"The past few months convinced us," said Mr. Kubba, a businessman whose wife is Sunni. "Now they are killing by ID's. The killing around Americans was something different, but the ID's, you can't move around on the streets."

"At the beginning we said, 'Let's wait, maybe it will be better tomorrow,' " Mr. Kubba said.

"Now I know it is time to go."

Inquiry Implies Civilian Deaths In Iraq Topped Initial Report (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — An official military investigation into allegations that American marines killed innocent Iraqis last November has uncovered evidence that the number of dead civilians is higher than the 15 originally reported, Congressional and Defense Department officials said.

The inquiry, which Pentagon officials said was still weeks from completion, has already raised fundamental questions about the propriety of actions by the troops, one Defense Department official said. But the official said that a characterization this week by a member of Congress that the Iraqis had been killed "in cold blood" was an extreme description of the incident.

In the incident, marines patrolling Haditha, in western Iraq, in November opened fire after being hit by a roadside bomb and coming under small-arms fire from a nearby house, the military says. One marine was reported killed by the bomb.

But details of the incident went unreported until March, when Time magazine said Iraqi human rights advocates had accused the marines of killing civilians and after the military had opened an inquiry and admitted that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed in the cross-fire.

Another Pentagon official said Thursday that the marines had come under fire but that evidence gathered so far indicated the hostile fire had not come from the house where the civilians were killed. Defense Department officials had to be promised anonymity to discuss the case because of the continuing inquiry.

On Wednesday, Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, talked about the investigation at a news conference on Capitol Hill. "Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood," he said. "And that's what the report is going to tell."

He said he had not read the official findings of the inquiry, but had been told about them by officers he identified as commanders.

Mr. Murtha said the number of Iraqi civilians killed was about twice the initial report of 15. Defense Department officials said Thursday that evidence indicated that more than 15 had been killed, but that the inquiry had not confirmed his estimate of double that number.

A leading Congressional critic of the Iraq war, Mr. Murtha served in Vietnam in the Marine Corps and was known as a hawk on military issues before becoming a leader of Democratic Party efforts to withdraw American troops from Iraq.

"Now, you can imagine the impact this is going to have on those troops for the rest of their lives and for the United States in our war and our effort in trying to win the hearts and minds," Mr. Murtha said. "We can't sustain this operation."

A spokesman for Marine forces in the Middle East, Lt. Col. Sean D. Gibson, said Wednesday that he could not comment on the substance of Mr. Murtha's statements because the inquiry was not complete.

New Iraqi Government Prepares To Take Stage (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi leaders will announce the makeup of the country's new government this weekend, then turn to the task of running a country increasingly divided along ethnic and religious lines.

After months of wrangling, those leaders say they have come up with a system that will help develop consensus on critical issues.

The new government has established oversight committees in which representatives of Iraq's various groups will debate issues and resolve problems, said Humam Hammoudi, an influential cleric with the United Iraqi Alliance, the religious Shiite alliance that is the largest political bloc in parliament.

A 10-member Security Committee will oversee the Interior and Defense ministries, Hammoudi said. The Interior Ministry, responsible for internal security, has been dogged by allegations that its police abused their power and ran “death squads” that targeted mostly Sunni Arabs. The Security Committee will handle cases of alleged abuse and corruption in those ministries, Hammoudi said.

A separate, 19-member Political Committee for National Security will meet once a month, he said. Its functions: forging agreements on major issues before parliament takes them up, and trying to break deadlocks among lawmakers.

That committee will be made up of the prime minister and his two deputies; the president and his two deputies; nine members of the United Iraqi Alliance; and representatives from Sunni Arab, secular Shiite and Kurdish political groups, Hammoudi said.

“The fate of the national unity government depends on this committee,” Hammoudi said. “All the members will be high-ranking members of the Cabinet and the six main blocs. So, of course, if they reach an agreement (on a course of action), it will happen.”

DOJ_NMG_0028915

The United States has encouraged political leaders to form a government that represents all of Iraq's main religious and ethnic groups. The incoming prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has said most of the Cabinet will be presented to parliament Saturday.

Hussain al-Shahristani, a former nuclear scientist who was jailed under the regime of Saddam Hussein, is expected to be appointed oil minister, Hammoudi said. Bayan Jabar, who was criticized for not reining in militias when he was interior minister, will be nominated as finance minister, he said.

However, al-Maliki may not announce nominees for the Interior and Defense ministries this weekend, Hammoudi said. Political leaders had not reached agreement on those posts Thursday, he said.

Parliamentary elections were held in December. Parties and politicians have argued since then over the makeup of the government.

Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, was pessimistic about the chances that the new government will be able to get a handle on the militias and ethnic killings.

"The squabbling among major factions that led to the delay in forming a government will not end after the government takes office," he said. "It is highly unlikely that the government will be willing or able to dismantle the militias responsible for sectarian violence, which is getting worse."

But Robert Ford, a political officer at the U.S. Embassy, said the government will have wide support.

"These negotiations have been long and difficult because we have a fundamentally different kind of Iraqi government that is emerging," Ford said. It will be "a much broader government than before, and it has deeper roots throughout Iraq," he said.

Also Thursday:

•Four U.S. soldiers and their Iraqi interpreter were killed by a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

•The kidnappers of a diplomat from the United Arab Emirates demanded that the Emirates' embassy in Baghdad be closed. The demand came in a video aired on Arab television, the Associated Press reported.

National Dialogue Added To Cabinet (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi officials said yesterday that a new government to be announced as early as tomorrow will include a new Ministry of National Dialogue, in an effort to stop the sectarian killings and violence that has spread through most of the country.

But the effort might fall short, because Sunni leaders are not satisfied with the Cabinet lineup cobbled together after months of closed-door negotiations.

"To be honest, I am not very happy. I feel we have not changed much," said Saleh al-Mutlaq, a top Sunni leader. "The government is one based on sectarian, narrow-minded parties. It is not going to solve the security on the street or reduce the corruption."

He said the Sunnis were willing to continue working with Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki, adding that the Sunnis had been offered three ministries: the environment, women's affairs and national dialogue.

Negotiations over who will take which Cabinet post have been going on since the Dec. 15 national elections, with all the political factions demanding a role.

A member of the ruling Shi'ite majority United Iraqi Alliance said Mr. al-Maliki has tried to form a government of national unity that can rule Iraq effectively for the next four years.

"It is not necessary that all [political] blocs are presented in the government, or it might be a government that is too heavy to move," said Qassim Dawood, whose name has been mentioned as an Interior Ministry candidate.

"Like any compromise, you cannot please everyone," he said.

U.S. officials have been pushing for a government that would balance Iraq's ethnic and religious divisions, saying that is the key to ending the daily bomb attacks against Iraqi civilians and Iraqi and U.S. forces.

Mr. Dawood, who belongs to the same party as Mr. al-Maliki does, dismissed the idea of a Ministry of National Dialogue.

DOJ_NMG_0028916

"It's a silly idea," he said. "We have a parliament, with all the blocs representing most of the fragments of Iraqi society, so let them dialogue."

Four U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi interpreter died yesterday when a roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle northwest of Baghdad, the military said.

The military also reported running gunbattles for the seventh straight day between U.S. troops and insurgents in southeastern Ramadi, the capital of the Sunni Anbar province.

Critics of the emerging government said a strongly Shi'ite religious government would not ease the insurgency.

"We were hoping that technocrats and experts would be chosen. It would have been better for the country," said Issam Kadhum al-Rawi, a member of the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars and the Association of University Lecturers.

"But they chose the wrong people. We wanted experts, not religious people," Mr. al-Rawi said. "I am afraid everything will get worse and worse."

He said there was still no decision on who would lead the powerful Interior and Defense ministries.

Earlier, those close to the government talks had said Mr. al-Maliki would pick a Shi'ite to lead the Interior Ministry and a Sunni to lead the Defense Ministry.

Current Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, who is accused by many of allowing Shi'ite death squads to operate, is expected to move over to the Finance Ministry, Mr. al-Rawi said. But many on the street think Mr. Jabr will continue to hold the reins of the intelligence branch.

Ex-senator Linked To Oil-for-food Claims (FT)

By Claudio Gatti In New York

Financial Times, May 19, 2006

The US Senate is looking into allegations that a former US senator urged Baghdad to give a US company lucrative contracts under the much-criticised United Nations oil-for-food programme.

This is the first time that a leading US lawmaker has been linked to the controversial UN programme, whose shortcomings have been an important element of the Bush administration's critique of the UN.

The investigation involves one of the most vivid figures in US east coast politics, former senator Robert Torricelli, a New Jersey Democrat who was forced to pull out of the 2002 election after being "severely admonished" by the Senate ethics committee for accepting expensive gifts from David Chang, a campaign contributor. Mr Chang, a Korean-American businessman, was found guilty in 2002 of conspiring to violate federal campaign laws and was jailed for 15 months.

Senator Norm Coleman, the Republican chairman of the US Senate permanent sub-committee on investigations, said: "We take these allegations seriously and will continue to investigate in a bipartisan manner allegations of wrongdoing under the oil-for-food programme. We have investigated the illicit conduct of politicians in Russia, France, and the UK. We have a similar interest in preserving the institutional integrity of the US Senate, so we take these allegations regarding former Senator Torricelli seriously and will continue our investigation into them and will refer our findings to the appropriate agencies." The British, French and Russian politicians investigated by the subcommittee deny the allegations.

The allegations are based on Iraqi documents, including diplomatic cables, retrieved after the fall of Saddam Hussein, Iraq's former president. The Financial Times and Il Sole 24 Ore, the Italian business daily, have obtained copies of some of the Iraqi diplomatic cables. A source also described the contents of some of the other Iraqi documents.

The Iraqi documents also involve a former Republican congressman, James Courter, who allegedly met with Iraqi officials on behalf of Bright and Bright, Mr Chang's trading and lobbying company.

According to the documents, Mr Torricelli, nicknamed "the Torch" for his incendiary political style, had a series of meetings in the late 1990s, when he was a congressman, with Nizar Hamdoun, then the Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations. During these meetings, Mr Torricelli allegedly urged the Iraqi authorities to help Mr Chang and Bright and Bright get oil-for-food contracts on good terms.

DOJ_NMG_0028917

The first meeting between Mr Torricelli and Mr Hamdoun took place on March 10 1996, when, according to an Iraqi document that has been described to the FT, Mr Torricelli reportedly suggested that he was willing to play an active role in improving US-Iraq communications.

The two talked about Resolution 986, which was going to set the rules of the oil-for-food programme. Mr Torricelli said a number of US companies would be interested in doing business with Baghdad, and specifically mentioned Mr Chang.

According to the same Iraqi document, Mr Torricelli met Mr Hamdoun again two days later. At that meeting, Mr Torricelli said that since their previous conversation he had spoken with Edward Gnehm, the deputy US representative to the UN, who was leading negotiations with Iraq about the oil-for-food programme.

On June 22, according to the same document, Mr Torricelli allegedly met Mr Hamdoun again. Mr Torricelli told him he had heard that the Iraqis might not give US companies any contracts and advised him that this would be a mistake. Mr Torricelli told Mr Hamdoun that he expected to win a US Senate seat in the November election (as he later did), and said that Bright and Bright was important to him and his election campaign and that he hoped that the company would receive contracts from Iraq.

According to the Iraqi document, Bright and Bright initially asked for 60 per cent of Iraq's oil contracts and a discount of $1.50 a barrel. Then on June 11 1996, a Bright and Bright executive wrote to Mr Hamdoun asking for government contracts worth as much as $300m in the first 90 days of the oil-for-food programme. In return, he said Bright and Bright would continue to support the normalisation of relations between the US and Iraq.

In mid-November 1996, according to the Iraqi document, Mr Hamdoun met with Mr Courter, then a former New Jersey Republican congressman, who is described in the Iraqi documents as the president of Bright and Bright. A Dun and Bradstreet entry for Bright and Bright lists Mr Courter as one of its principals. Mr Courter refused to comment. However, a spokesman for the company Mr Courter now runs said he was not an officer of Bright and Bright, but that "he was their [Bright and Bright's] attorney and was representing them in a legal capacity".

According to the Iraqi document, Mr Courter reportedly outlined a possible deal to Mr Hamdoun: if Iraq committed itself to stop all delaying tactics against UN inspections, use peaceful means to deal with the Kurdish people, not seek weapons of mass destruction, join the convention against chemical weapons, steer clear of any neighbouring country's territory and reject terrorism, Bright and Bright would help Baghdad in its efforts to lift UN sanctions.

In return, the Iraqi authorities were to promise to write a letter of intent giving preference to Bright and Bright in the fields of oil, industry, transportation and communications. According to the Iraqi document, Mr Courter told Mr Hamdoun that he had discussed the proposal with US government officials in Washington and had their approval.

Contacted by telephone, Mr Torricelli, who now runs his own business consulting firm and remains a powerful figure in New Jersey politics and a prominent Democratic party fundraiser, admitted meeting Mr Hamdoun "many times", "probably both" in Washington and New York "and in Baghdad". He first denied mentioning Mr Chang or Bright and Bright during his conversations with Mr Hamdoun. When told about the Iraqi documents that suggested there had been discussions, he said he did not remember mentioning them.

Mr Torricelli said he was not concerned about being contradicted by Iraqi diplomatic cables: "Iraqi cables can state almost anything. They have absolutely no credibility." He said Mr Hamdoun was "very well known and respected in the US government" and that, "unlike most Iraqi officials, he had some credibility".

Mr Gnehm, the US diplomat, also confirmed meeting Mr Torricelli and discussing Iraq. Mr Gnehm, who has left the State Department and is a professor at George Washington University, said Mr Torricelli came to the meeting with a "Korean" businessman whose name he did not recall. "I remember being surprised that there was someone else there, and I didn't know then why he was present. As an American diplomat I would be responsive to a congressman and to an American businessman, even a foreign businessman who had plants in the United States, but somebody like him? I didn't have any sense of why he was there. I figured that he and Torricelli had some sort of friendship or relationship."

On the subject of that meeting, Mr Gnehm said: "I think the general discussion was on how one goes about getting contracts in the oil-for-food programme . . . Certainly, one of Torricelli's approaches to me over this period of time was an effort to try to get business for some of the companies in his district."

DOJ_NMG_0028918

An April 15 1996 cable from Mr Hamdoun to Tariq Aziz, Iraq's deputy prime minister at the time, if authentic, appears to corroborate these allegations. According to the cable, which has been obtained by the FT, the Iraqi mission to the UN had received a letter from the "American company that had been mentioned to us by Congressman Torricelli". In the letter the US company allegedly indicated its desire to send a delegation to Baghdad to negotiate possible commercial deals. The cable ends with a recommendation to sign an agreement with the company. A subsequent cable from Mr Hamdoun suggests that the "US company" being discussed is Bright and Bright.

During these talks, in August 1996, the Iraqi army seized the Kurdish city of Erbil. The Clinton administration responded by ordering air raids against Iraq. Engaged in a bitter Senate race, Mr Torricelli, together with all New Jersey lawmakers from both parties, backed the move. Ultimately, no concrete deals came of the discussions between Baghdad and Bright and Bright.

Mr Hamdoun died in July 2003. Mr Chang could not be contacted for comment, despite repeated efforts to reach him.

Taliban Stepping Up Attacks In Afghanistan (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Afghanistan is fast becoming the toughest peacekeeping mission in NATO's 57-year history as the Taliban presses some of its most intensive attacks since the Islamic militia was driven from power in 2001.

More than 100 people, including a U.S. contractor, a Canadian soldier and dozens of insurgents, died in clashes and suicide bombings on Wednesday and Thursday, mostly in the Taliban's birthplace of southern Afghanistan, according to U.S., NATO and Afghan officials.

In one incident, hundreds of insurgents attacked the southern town of Mosa Qala on Wednesday evening, and fighting raged through the night, leaving at least 13 Afghan police and dozens of Taliban dead.

The unrest comes as thousands of British, Canadian and Dutch peacekeepers are deploying into southern Afghanistan, replacing U.S. troops in a major expansion of NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

Until now, ISAF has overseen security in Kabul and reconstruction projects in relatively peaceful central, western and northern regions. But with its move south, NATO, which was created to defend Western Europe from a Soviet invasion, is becoming embroiled in an escalating guerrilla war in the heart of the Muslim world.

"In the Balkans, we never had ground forces that had to deal with insurgent organizations. We had ground forces that had to deal with riots, criminal groups and the occasional war criminal. But NATO has never faced a major insurgency," said Seth Jones of the RAND Corp., a research institute that advises the Pentagon.

The U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Army Gen. Karl Eikenberry, said last week that the Taliban is better trained, armed and organized than in the past and has adopted tactics used in Iraq, including sophisticated improvised explosive devices and suicide bombers.

Some of the violence is related to tribal rivalries and a major Afghan government drive to eradicate the poppy crops that make the country the world's largest producer of opium, from which heroin is made.

Eikenberry said that with NATO's expansion, more than 20,000 U.S. troops concentrating on counterinsurgency efforts in eastern Afghanistan and major strides being made in the training and deployment of Afghan security forces, the Taliban will be contained by year's end.

Despite its resurgence since last year, the Taliban isn't strong enough to overthrow President Hamid Karzai's government. But some U.S. officials and independent experts warn that the Taliban's real aim is to whittle away at the already seriously diminished confidence many Afghans have in their leader and his U.S.-led allies because of persistent violence, crime and corruption and the slow pace of reconstruction.

By targeting ISAF's southern deployment, the Taliban also appears intent on weakening public support in NATO nations for the peacekeeping operation. On Wednesday, only hours after a female Canadian soldier was killed, the Canadian parliament approved an extension of Canada's participation in ISAF until 2009 by only four votes.

"There are huge questions over how NATO will perform and whether countries will sustain this," said Bob Templer of the International Crisis Group, a conflict-prevention organization. "The further we get away from 9-11, the more difficult it is to sell."

"The situation is bad," agreed a U.S. official, who asked not to be further identified because he wasn't authorized to speak publicly. "It's going to be a hot summer. It's going to be bloody."

The bloodshed also has heightened tensions between Afghanistan and Pakistan, the Taliban's one-time chief patron.

Pakistan's continued cooperation is vital to the Bush administration's pursuit of al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, who's believed to be hiding on the rugged Afghan-Pakistan border, and the global network of violent jihadi groups that he inspires.

The violence "is a test of NATO and a test of the U.S. ability to coordinate in the war on terrorism between two countries that are at odds with each other," said Amin Tarzi, an analyst with U.S.-funded Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty.

As the violence persisted Thursday, Karzai accused Pakistan's military regime of aiding in the Taliban's resurgence by training and arming the insurgents.

"Intelligence agencies of Pakistan have been providing training to militants and send them back to Afghanistan after equipping them," he told tribal elders in Kunar Province, according to the Afghan Islamic Press agency.

Pakistan denies that it's backing the Taliban, pointing to the intense counterinsurgency operations that tens of thousands of its troops have been conducting in tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

But U.S. officials say that Islamabad could do more, and some experts contend that Islamabad is quietly aiding the Taliban because it's angry at the ties that Karzai and the Bush administration are cultivating with Pakistan's archrival, India.

"There is a huge anxiety in Pakistan with whatever the Indians are doing," said Templer. "There is a view in the Pakistan military that Afghanistan is really their backyard."

India's involvement in Afghanistan includes the construction of a highway in southern Nimroz Province, bordering Pakistan and Iran, by a state-owned Indian construction organization closely tied to the Indian military.

More Than 100 Killed In Fighting In Afghanistan (USAT/AP)

By Noor Khan, The Associated Press

USA Today, May 19, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan — About 100 people were killed in fighting as Islamic militants clashed with Afghan, U.S. and Canadian forces Wednesday and Thursday.

Close to 90 militants were killed as were at least 15 Afghan police, an American civilian training Afghan forces and the first female Canadian soldier to die in combat.

The fighting was concentrated in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar. The Taliban, an Islamic militia that controlled Afghanistan until its leaders were ousted in 2001, has stepped up attacks in recent months.

President Hamid Karzai said the violence was coming from the mountainous regions of neighboring Pakistan. The area is populated by ethnic Pashtuns, who make up the majority of the Taliban militants. “In the madrassas (Islamic schools), the mullahs and teachers are saying to their students: ‘Go to Afghanistan for jihad,’ ” Karzai said.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, called the allegations “baseless.”

The latest violence started late Wednesday in Musa Qala in Helmand province. About 300-400 militants attacked a police and government headquarters.

Deputy Gov. Amir Mohammed Akhunzaba said the bodies of about 40 Taliban militants were recovered. He said 13 police were killed and six wounded. British military spokesman Capt. Drew Gibson said Afghan police reinforcements forced the militants to flee.

In neighboring Kandahar province, up to 27 Taliban militants were killed during an operation by the U.S.-led coalition Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0028920

Elsewhere in Kandahar, 18 Taliban militants and Canadian Capt. Nichola Goddard died in fighting. Canada's first female soldier to die in combat was killed late Wednesday, said Maj. Scott Lundy, a Canadian military spokesman.

Gen. Zahir Azimi, a spokesman for the Afghan Defense Ministry, said U.S. forces' hand-over of security operations in the south to NATO could be fanning the violence. The transfer is to take place by July. “Maybe the Taliban is trying to show NATO that they are active there, but coalition and NATO forces are both strong,” he said.

Also Thursday, a suicide bomber attacked in Herat, near the Iranian border. The bomb killed Ron Zimmerman, 37, of Connersville, Ind. He was working on a U.S. project to train Afghan police. Other attacks near Kabul killed a civilian and two police officers.

Afghanistan Rocked As 105 Die In Violence (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

ASADABAD, Afghanistan, May 18 -- Afghanistan has been rocked over the past two days by some of the deadliest violence since the Taliban was driven from power in late 2001. As many as 105 people were reported killed in four provinces as insurgents torched a district government compound, set off suicide bombs and clashed fiercely with Afghan and foreign troops.

Between 80 and 90 Taliban fighters were killed in Kandahar and Helmand provinces, according to Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials. Two sites in Kandahar were struck by U.S. warplanes, including a long-range B-1 bomber, which U.S. military officials said destroyed a compound that Taliban guerrillas were using to stage an attack.

Among the dead were an American police trainer killed by a car bomb in Herat province, a female Canadian army captain and at least 12 Afghan national policemen, officials said.

Afghanistan experienced several years of relative calm after the pro-Western government took over in Kabul in 2001. But in recent months, the pace and scope of insurgent attacks have been increasing steadily, and now include suicide bombings, a tactic long foreign to Afghanistan. The violence has surged as NATO forces prepare to assume the lead military role in Afghanistan from U.S. troops this summer, a transition that some observers believe the Taliban and other insurgent groups are seeking to test.

President Hamid Karzai, visiting the capital of eastern Konar province under heavy security, angrily denounced the new violence as the work of religious extremists and intelligence services in neighboring Pakistan, saying they had sent young men across the border to stage attacks in the name of holy war.

"In Pakistan they train people to go to Afghanistan, conduct jihad, burn schools and clinics," he told a gathering of provincial elders in a long, emotional speech. "What kind of Islam is this?"

Karzai did not blame Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, calling him a "dear brother" and saying that "terrorism is a fire that will extend to your country, too." But he directly taunted Mohammad Omar, the fugitive Afghan Taliban leader, challenging him to "show yourself" and "come fight with me" instead of hiding.

The president expressed particular anguish over the death of the Canadian soldier, Capt. Nichola Goddard, who died Wednesday in a battle with Taliban attackers in Kandahar. "Our land is being protected by a lady from Canada, when we should be protecting her as a guest," he said.

The police trainer killed by a suicide blast in Herat was serving on a contract from the U.S. State Department's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement. A statement from the U.S. Embassy in Kabul did not identify him, but said that several other Americans and Afghans were wounded by the bomb and that U.S. forces fearing another attack later shot dead the Afghan driver of a truck who failed to stop at a checkpoint and drove directly at the Americans.

The escalating violence has led to a deepening rift between Karzai and Musharraf, who are both important U.S. allies in the region. The Afghan government has long asserted that Islamic fighters are being supported and sheltered by groups within Pakistan. In February, Karzai presented Musharraf with a list of alleged armed extremists living in Pakistan.

The Pakistani leader bristled at the accusations and dismissed them as outdated or fabricated. He has asserted repeatedly that he is doing his best to combat terrorism within Pakistan, and he has sent large numbers of soldiers into the desolate tribal areas bordering Afghanistan, where Taliban and al-Qaeda members are widely believed to have taken refuge.

"They talk about people crossing from Pakistan, but we have 78,000 troops and 800 check posts," said Aftab Khan Sherpao, Pakistan's interior minister, in a recent interview. "The militants used to feel safer in the tribal areas because of the culture and the religious bent of mind there, but now we are really exerting pressure and tightening the loop. We get flak from the local people but we have to do it."

U.S. military officials, who work closely with both the Afghan and Pakistani armed forces, say they believe Musharraf shares their concerns about regional terrorism and does not seek to destabilize Afghanistan. But it is not clear, they say, to what extent he can control powerful groups in his country that still support the Taliban or harbor a lingering ambition to dominate Afghanistan.

For those people, Karzai had harsh words Thursday, vowing that Afghanistan "will never become a colony of any country," and excoriating groups that use religion as an excuse to attack their neighbors.

Konar, which stretches alongside the Pakistani tribal region, has come under persistent attacks, including a rocket assault that killed seven children at a school in Asadabad in April. Since March, Afghan and U.S. forces have staged a massive sweep of troubled districts in Operation Mountain Lion.

Karzai, who rarely travels to remote provinces because of security concerns, arrived here from Kabul on one of a formation of U.S. military helicopters.

The president's vehement remarks about Pakistan were repeatedly applauded by provincial leaders, and in welcoming poems and songs young Afghans exhorted him to be tough on "our neighbor enemies."

Questions Karzai received here underlined why it has been difficult to uproot the revived Islamic insurgency even with thousands of foreign troops aiding the new Afghan army and police.

Several local leaders asked the president to help win the freedom of Konar tribal and religious figures held in U.S. military prisons as suspected insurgents. Others pleaded with him to build more Islamic schools in their province, a higher priority for many families than roads or clinics.

In a brief interview after his speech, Karzai said he had not given up on Musharraf and recognized his strategic importance to the U.S.-led anti-terrorist effort. But the Afghan president said he had come under a lot of domestic pressure to get tough with Pakistan.

"People see that nothing has changed and they are very angry," he said. "They want me to stop talking nicely and do something."

Afghanistan Bomb Kills American And Wounds 2 (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, May 18 — An American counternarcotics official was killed and two other Americans were wounded in a suicide bombing on Thursday in western Afghanistan, while heavy fighting between forces suspected of being Taliban insurgents and the Afghan police continued in two southern provinces, officials said.

The violence occurred amid increasing reports of many militants moving around rural areas. The fighting killed 13 police officers and possibly dozens of insurgents, officials said.

"We confirm that a U.S. citizen contractor for the State Department Bureau of International Narcotic and Law Enforcement, working for the police training program in Herat was killed in a vehicle borne I.E.D. attack," said Chris Harris, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, using the initials for improvised explosive device. "Two other Americans were injured; one critically, and one has minor injuries."

Col. Ghulam Sarwar Haidari, the intelligence chief for the provincial police department in Herat, a western town, said the attack was a suicide bombing. He said the bomber, who wore a long beard but was not identifiable, drove his car, packed with explosives, into the Americans' vehicle, which was part of a three-vehicle convoy on the main road leading north from Herat.

Another apparent suicide car bomb attack on Thursday killed the driver and a civilian passing on a motorbike near an American military base in Ghazni Province, south of Kabul, the capital, said Hajji Sher Alam, the provincial governor. Another civilian was injured, he said.

A Canadian military statement on Thursday described fighting in Panjwai, near Kandahar in the south, in which a Canadian soldier was killed Wednesday. The fighting in Panjwai lasted all day and through the night as coalition and Afghan police officers and army forces entered the district against scores of militants who have been moving through the area for weeks, the Canadian statement said. It said 18 fighters suspected of being Taliban members had been killed and 35 others had been captured. Local residents had told Afghan security forces of 15 armed men hiding in a mosque who were among those captured, the statement said.

In a second statement released in Kabul describing the fighting, Maj. Gen. Benjamin C. Freakley, the American operational commander of coalition forces, was quoted as saying, "This well-organized, cooperative engagement was exactly the operation needed to restore security to Panjwai, where extremists have been intimidating and threatening the people."

Heavy fighting also occurred Wednesday in the neighboring Helmand Province, when militants attacked a police post in Musa Qala, a district in the main poppy growing region in the northern part of the province. The police fought the militants off, said a spokesman for the provincial administration, Haji Muhaiuddin Khan.

He said that 50 Taliban fighters had been killed, but conceded the police had found the bodies of only 10 militants. Thirteen police officers were killed and six wounded, and 10 militants were captured, he said.

Medals Given For Valor In Afghan Fighting (WP)

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

FORT BRAGG, N.C., May 18 -- Sgt. 1st Class David Lowe and his Special Forces A-team were in their last week in Afghanistan on June 10, 2005, when their base received an urgent call: A small group of 82nd Airborne paratroopers was pinned down in a firefight near the Pakistan border and needed support.

"When you're that close to leaving the country and you've survived the whole time, you kind of stand down a little bit," said Lowe, 26, of Lancaster, Pa., recalling that much of the team's equipment was packed. "But they needed help," he said, "so we went," setting out on a mission that would prove vital and tragic.

Lowe's bravery in the Afghan mountains that sweltering summer day was rewarded Thursday with a Silver Star, which was pinned on by Brig. Gen. John F. Mulholland Jr., the head of the Special Forces Command, as Lowe and 12 fellow soldiers from 1st Battalion, 7th Special Forces Group, were honored at a ceremony here.

As fighting surges in Afghanistan against a reinvigorated Taliban, the stories behind Lowe's medal and others awarded for valor in combat offer vivid glimpses into the intensity of warfare in the country's most contested zones. Increased violence, particularly suicide and improvised bombs, has inflicted a worsening toll of U.S. troop deaths, which now total 234 -- including 10 for 7th Group.

U.S. military commanders acknowledge that the war that began in 2001 with the Special Forces' rapid overthrow of the Taliban government is far from over. They have put off plans to withdraw several thousand U.S. troops -- including conventional and Special Forces -- from Afghanistan this year.

The combat trials faced by Lowe and his comrades suggest the challenge that lies ahead.

It was midafternoon last June when Lowe's team, accompanied by Afghan forces, began climbing a steep mountainside to reach the 82nd Airborne paratroopers fighting off pockets of enemy on all sides.

Lowe's team moved through the brush without talking. The sun cast shadows on the hills, making it difficult to see. Lowe was uphill providing cover ahead of Sgt. 1st Class Victor Cervantes, who walked below through a dry streambed, when fire from a Kalashnikov broke out near Cervantes's position.

Lowe turned and dashed back, catching a glimpse of a camouflage coat and a figure ducking between the trees and rocks. Lowe fired at it with his M-4 and the gunfire stopped. Then he began yelling, "Vic!" "Vic!" trying to find his teammate.

"So anyway, Vic was dead," Lowe recalled, choking up at the memory. But Lowe, the team medic, said he controlled an urge to charge blindly up the hill in revenge.

Instead, according to his medal citation, during a six-hour firefight, Lowe moved deliberately to aid the wounded -- at one point dashing over 150 yards of open ground. He climbed an exposed rock pinnacle to shoot down a fighter who had a teammate pinned down, and helped kill six other attackers, including some who shot at the soldiers as they attempted to carry out Cervantes's body.

"We were a week from going home, and he's putting himself in harm's way -- he's the real hero today," Lowe said of Cervantes, 27, of Stockton, Calif.

Chief Warrant Officer 3 Jason Hope, 39, of Tulsa, also received the Silver Star for his daring leadership during a hastily executed spring 2005 raid on a fortified Taliban camp in Paktika province that killed a senior regional Taliban commander for southeastern Afghanistan.

As soon as they got off the helicopter near the camp, Hope's team came under withering fire from about 20 enemy fighters awaiting with rocket-propelled grenades, AK-47s, and machine guns with armor-piercing bullets. The team fought its way up a ridge overlooking the camp, and then, to reach the stronghold, Hope led a flat-out race across 600 yards of open desert.

Following Hope, Staff Sgt. Charles Maxwell watched as bullets chopped up dust around his feet. "I wasn't going to let him go without me," said Maxwell, 32, who was awarded a Bronze Star for valor.

Prosecutor Not Amused By "Sick...Joke" (ROANT)

By Lindsey Nair

Roanoke Times, May 19, 2006

Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Hogeboom is knowledgeable about a lot of things, but repairing wheelchairs is not one of them.

Nevertheless, he claims in court documents that he recently received calls from six elderly customers of Active Solutions, an Ohio-based medical equipment company, requesting that he service their broken-down motorized wheelchairs.

Hogeboom this week filed a motion seeking a temporary restraining order against Active Solutions and its parent company, CBI Co. LLC. The motion accuses Active Solutions of harassing its customers by referring them to Hogeboom for wheelchair repair requests.

Active Solutions used the customers' plight to "play a sick practical joke by harassing victims and witnesses," the motion states.

Valerie Eastwood, counsel for CBI, declined to comment on the motion except to say she would respond "fairly quickly."

Active Solutions and CBI are under federal investigation for suspected Medicare fraud, but they have not been charged with any crimes.

According to a search warrant affidavit unsealed this month, investigators believe Active Solutions advertised power scooters, then shipped customers much more expensive motorized wheelchairs instead and billed Medicare for the chairs.

As part of the investigation, federal agents in late March seized six vehicles and $1.8 million in assets from Active Solutions.

This week's motion claims that since the affidavit was unsealed, Active Solutions has been telling wheelchair owners that Hogeboom can "explain why the company cannot repair chairs" and address their concerns.

Hogeboom complains in the motion that these referrals were made with no explanation that he is a federal prosecutor, not a repairman, and at the expense of people who need working wheelchairs to live a quality life.

"The referrals were done in a callous disregard for the plight of the elderly and infirm," the motion claims.

Because the customers who were told to contact Hogeboom are potential witnesses or victims in the case, the government is requesting that a judge deem the company's behavior harassment. The motion requests that Active Solutions be ordered to stop referring calls to Hogeboom.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Next Lay Trial, Over Bank-Fraud Charges, Begins (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0028924

By Gary McWilliams

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON -- Former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1's "other" trial -- on charges of violating bank-lending agreements -- began Thursday with his defense attorney insisting Mr. Lay wasn't aware of any violations.

Mr. Lay is charged with bank fraud and misrepresentation for borrowing $75 million from three banks and using the money to acquire Enron stock. The government contends that Mr. Lay used personal loans from Bank of America Corp., Compass Bancshares Inc.'s Compass Bank and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.'s Chase Bank to acquire Enron stock in violation of loan agreements.

The bank-fraud case is being tried separately from the conspiracy and fraud case against Mr. Lay and former Enron president Jeffrey Skilling2. In that trial, the jury completed its first full day of deliberations (after a partial day on Wednesday) without reaching a verdict. The eight-woman, four-man jury won't meet on Fridays, so it will resume considering the charges against the two former executives Monday morning.

"Mr. Lay had absolutely no motive to do what he's accused of doing here," defense attorney Ken Carroll said of the bank charges. He called the regulation "confusing" and suggested the criminal charges were a stretch. The alleged violations are "a regulatory issue, a civil issue but not a crime," said Mr. Carroll. He said Mr. Lay repaid all the loans.

The bank-fraud charges are being heard without a jury before U.S. District Court Judge Sim Lake3, who also is presiding over the conspiracy and fraud trial of Messrs. Lay and Skilling. Each of the four charges carries an up to 30-year prison sentence. Judge Lake has said he won't issue a decision in the bank-fraud case until the jury in the conspiracy and fraud case returns its verdict.

Prosecutor Robb Adkins accused Mr. Lay of "lying to the banks" to increase his borrowing limit. The loans restricted the amount of money he could borrow to 70% of the value of shares held for collateral if the borrowings were used for nonstock investments, but only 50% of the value of shares if the borrowings were used to buy stock, he said. Mr. Lay, he said, was "not satisfied with a 50% loan, he wanted a...larger loan to buy his stock."

James Shelton, a former Bank of America private banking manager, testified that he several times advised Mr. Lay of the rules restricting the purchase of stock using so-called "nonpurpose" loans backed by shares. He said the bank initially set up two separate $8 million lines of credit, one for nonstock investments and another to allow him to purchase stocks.

The credit line that was set up to purchase stocks shrank over time, while Mr. Lay increased the line used for nonstock investments, said Mr. Adkins. By September 1997, Mr. Shelton said Mr. Lay sought to increase his line of credit for nonstock investments to $30 million and wanted just $750,000 for stock purchases, he said.

Sally Ballard, an assistant to Mr. Lay who handled the documents overseeing his personal investments, testified that she wasn't aware of the differing restrictions on the lines of credit when she prepared requests. She also testified that she used a machine to affix his signature to documents when he was unavailable to sign them.

Under questioning by a prosecutor, she acknowledged writing a note to Mr. Lay that suggested she was familiar with the stock-purchase restriction, called Reg. U. In that 1995 note, she wrote: "I realize we were advised by James [Shelton] that according to Reg. U we cannot use borrowing to pay off these lines. Please advise."

A 2nd Criminal Trial Begins For Former Enron Chief (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

New York Times, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON, May 18 — As a jury spent its first full day deliberating the fates of the former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, a second criminal trial began yesterday, with prosecutors accusing Mr. Lay of repeatedly lying to banks about how he would use $75 million in loans.

Using testimony of a bank loan officer, an investment adviser and a personal assistant who still works for Mr. Lay, prosecutors tried to show that he borrowed millions of dollars and violated federal banking regulations by investing much of the money in stocks after he signed documents saying he would not do so.

He did so "not just a few times, but repeatedly and time and again," the prosecutor, Robb Adkins, said in brief opening arguments.

In an unusual compromise, Judge Simeon T. Lake III broke off these four charges from the main Enron case after Mr. Lay's defense team sought to have the entire case against him separated from Mr. Skilling's. Last year, Mr. Lay waived his right to a jury trial on the bank charges, in part because of the technical nature of banking statutes, meaning the case will be decided by the judge. The charges — one of bank fraud and three of lying to banks — are based on a cache of prosaic loan documents and personal financial records from the early 1990's to 2001. The charges are not related to the fraud and conspiracy charges Mr. Lay faces in the Enron case with his co-defendant, Mr. Skilling.

Judge Lake has indicated that he will not issue his decision until the jury in the other case, which he also presided over, renders a verdict, which is expected to take a week or more.

Defense lawyers for Mr. Lay contended that he did not knowingly violate any laws in how he handled his personal loans from three banks and added that he did not have any reason to do so because he had more than adequate collateral to pay off the loans. "It may be a civil issue; it may be a regulatory issue, but it's not a crime," a lawyer for Mr. Lay, Ken Carroll, said.

Several times during the day, Judge Lake chided lawyers, particularly the defense lawyers, to pick up the pace.

At one point, Mr. Carroll asked a former Bank of America loan officer, James Shelton, about how he dealt with other clients who had loans similar to Mr. Lay's. Judge Lake asked if the defense intended to call other bank clients and Mr. Carroll responded he would call three or four people.

"No, you are not," Judge Lake quickly replied.

The prosecution contends that Mr. Lay started lying to his banks after Mr. Shelton told him in 1993 that banking laws dictated that he could borrow only 50 percent of the value of the stock that he was putting up as collateral if he used the proceeds to buy publicly traded stock.

He later took out two lines of credit from Bank of America — one that allowed him to buy stock and one that did not. The second line of credit allowed him to borrow as much as 70 percent of the value of his collateral.

"Mr. Lay wasn't satisfied with a 50 percent loan, he wanted a larger loan," Mr. Adkins said.

Financial documents displayed by prosecutors yesterday showed that Mr. Lay used millions of dollars from those credit lines to buy stock-based mutual funds and individual stocks like Eli Lilly & Company, on whose board Mr. Lay used to sit.

Mr. Lay's lawyers asserted that he was not fully apprised of the restrictions he faced and that the loan documents were not always clear.

The defense also said that on some bank documents, though they could not say how many, Mr. Lay's signature was rendered by a signature machine because he was out of town. Defense lawyers also tried to show that Mr. Lay's assistants were not aware of the difference between the two sets of loans.

"At any time did Mr. Lay ask you to do something you were uncomfortable doing?" George McCall Secrest Jr., another defense lawyer, asked Sally Ballard, Mr. Lay's assistant.

"Absolutely not," she replied.

Mr. Lay and his lawyers have said and repeated again Thursday, though not in the courtroom before Judge Lake, that the banking law Mr. Lay is accused of violating is an arcane Depression-era statute that has to the best of their knowledge, been used only once against a bank customer, more than a decade ago.

Congress passed the laws, now known as Regulation U, after the stock market crash of 1929 in an effort to make it harder for investors to speculate using borrowed money, said John C. Coffee, a law professor at Columbia University in New York. Also, lawmakers believed that it would be better for the economy and job creation if banks lent more money to farmers and manufacturers rather than investors, he said.

"These are standard parts of any loan agreement that you are not going to unlawfully use the proceeds," Mr. Coffee said. "These are not unknown and esoteric, they are plain-vanilla representations," he said about the statements signed by Mr. Lay in the course of obtaining his loan.

Enron's Ken Lay Goes On Trial On Another Front: Bank Fraud Charges (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON — A second trial began here Thursday for former Enron CEO Ken Lay, who stands accused of violating an obscure banking law that forbids using proceeds from certain types of loans to buy publicly traded stock.

The four bank fraud charges, which carry penalties of up to 30 years, were severed from the larger trial in which Lay and another former Enron CEO, Jeff Skilling, are charged with conspiring to hide Enron's financial condition from investors in 2000 and 2001. Jury deliberations in that trial began this week and will continue Monday.

The second trial is being held without a jury before the same judge who managed the Enron fraud case, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake. Unlike the jury trial — a sprawling drama which began in January and featured testimony from 56 witnesses including Lay and Skilling — the bank fraud case is narrow and should end early next week.

Lake has said he won't announce his verdict in the bench trial until jury deliberations have concluded in the larger Enron case.

In his opening statement Thursday, prosecutor Robb Adkins told the judge that Lay repeatedly violated "Regulation U," a rule put in place following the 1929 stock market crash to protect banks from borrowers who speculate in the stock market. According to the rule, when a borrower uses stock as collateral for a loan, banks are only allowed to lend an amount equal to 50% of the stock's value. Every borrower has to sign a form indicating he or she understands the rule.

The idea, Adkins explained, was to prevent a "daisy chain" effect that crippled many U.S. banks following the '29 crash, when speculators used stock as collateral for loans and then invested the loans in more stock. "The process only works if these forms are filled out truthfully," Adkins said.

James Shelton, a former Bank of America loan executive, told the court that he explained the limitations of Regulation U to Lay when he approved loans to the former Enron CEO in the 1990s. Asked whether he thought Lay understood the rule when he took out loans, Shelton said he did. "He was a very hands-on, detail-oriented person," Shelton said.

Lay's attorney, Ken Carroll, suggested that the former Enron CEO was so busy he didn't necessarily micromanage every investment he made.

"If anybody told him he wasn't doing the right thing with these lines (of credit), he would have fixed it," Carroll said. Carroll also pointed out that Lay traveled a lot, and didn't necessarily sign every document that needed his signature. An "auto-pen" was sometimes used at Enron for documents that needed Lay's signature when he wasn't around, Carroll said.

Sally Ballard, who works for Ken Lay and his wife, Linda, in a secretarial capacity, also testified. Ballard admitted that in grand jury testimony several years ago, she confirmed that Lay used proceeds of his bank loans to buy stock. But on the stand Thursday, she said she may have been mistaken during the grand jury proceedings. Thinking it over afterward, she said, she realized a document purporting to confirm Lay's use of bank loans to buy stocks could simply have been an old form that she never revised. She acknowledged that Lay was paying for her legal fees.

Lay's Second Trial Starts As First Jury Deliberates (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON, May 18 -- As jurors quietly deliberated conspiracy and false-statements charges against him Thursday, former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay endured the start of a separate trial on bank fraud violations that carry substantial prison time if he is convicted.

Lay, 64, stands accused of four criminal counts for allegedly lying to banks about how he would use multimillion-dollar lines of credit. Prosecutors accused the former corporate titan of falsely telling banks he would not use the loans to buy stock, then turning around and doing just that. Each charge carries a maximum prison term of 30 years.

Lay's alleged conduct violated Federal Reserve rules put in place after the 1929 stock market crash spurred policymakers to restrict how credit is used, prosecutor Robb Adkins argued.

"The process only works if the forms are filled out truthfully," Adkins said, pointing to "dozens and dozens" of instances when Lay signed documents pledging to follow the rules, then allegedly broke his promise.

DOJ_NMG_0028927

Former Bank of America executive James Shelton, the relationship manager on Lay's account in the early 1990s, testified that the rules are important because the bank could be held liable if its clients violate the law -- and "I might very well lose my job." Shelton said he met with Lay several times to discuss the rule, known as Regulation U.

Because scores of documents exist, the key question in the case is whether Lay intended to violate the rules, an issue that prosecutors say is clear from his signature alone.

Lay's lawyers, who previously have scoffed at the charges as an overly zealous attempt to target their client, suggested a number of possible defenses, including the argument that his subordinates may have used a machine known as an "autopen" to affix his signature to several of the forms.

But U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, the ultimate decision maker in the bank case, inquired whether the distinction was a real difference. "Is there a distinction if he knowingly caused an employee to affix his signature electronically?" the judge asked, directing defense lawyers to produce prior court cases to support their assertion.

On cross-examination by Lay attorney Ken Carroll, Shelton said he did not believe Lay had engaged in a scheme to defraud the bank. He added that he had never done an investigation of how Lay was using the loans or developed any suspicions about them at the time.

Defense lawyer George "Mac" Secrest also suggested that Lay, who traveled frequently during his tenure at Enron, was too busy to have paid much attention to the forms. Instead, Secrest said, Lay simply signed where his staffers instructed him to do so. Sally Ballard, an employee of Lay's for 22 years who continues to work for his family part time, readily agreed.

Earlier Thursday, prosecutor John C. Hueston presented a pair of memos Ballard had written to Lay in November 1995 indicating that he was "technically bound by" the bank rules. The judge interjected with his own question, wondering whether the memos were delivered to Lay himself. Yes, Ballard answered.

Lake said he will render a decision on the bank fraud charges sometime after the eight-woman, four-man jury in the broader case decides whether Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling are guilty of leading a conspiracy to defraud investors and employees about the energy trader's health. That case is the government's biggest and most heralded in an effort to hold corporate officials accountable for misconduct on their watch.

The jury broke for the day around 4 p.m. central time, after deliberating for six hours without sending a note or other tangible evidence of their progress. Jurors will return to their deliberations Monday, when the bank fraud case also will resume.

No Enron Verdict; Lay Starts 2nd Trial (LAT)

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON — Jurors in the trial of former Enron Corp. leaders Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling ended a second day of deliberations Thursday without reaching a verdict, meeting behind closed doors as Lay returned to court for a separate trial.

The jury of eight women and four men left the courthouse in downtown Houston for a long weekend, having decided at the beginning of their deliberations that they would not work on Fridays. The panel has so far made no requests of U.S. District Judge Sim Lake.

While Skilling, 52, has remained out of sight since the jurors retired to weigh the evidence, Lay was back in Lake's fourth-floor courtroom for the opening of his second trial, this one centering on charges that he misused personal bank loans.

In the second case, which is being heard by Lake without a jury at Lay's request, prosecutors say the once highflying executive used Enron stock as collateral for $75 million in loans, signing documents required by the bank and federal regulators pledging that he would not use the money to buy more stock.

But Lay, 64, did buy stock with those loans, Assistant U.S. Atty. Rob Adkins said in opening arguments.

"This is the stock he promises the banks he would not purchase," Adkins told Lake in a brief opening statement as the trial began. "Banks take these forms very seriously to protect against [stock] market failure."

Government witness James Shelton, a Bank of America Corp. executive who oversaw the bank's loans to Lay starting in 1993, told the judge that he explained to Lay many times that he was forbidden under federal law from using some of the credit lines to buy stock. Shelton said he also got Lay to sign forms explaining the limitation.

DOJ_NMG_0028928

During cross-examination, Lay's attorney, Ken Carroll, suggested that many of the loan documents may have been signed by an automatic signature machine both Lay and his wife, Linda, used, and that Lay's assistants would have used the machine "if somebody sends him a pile of bank documents and had to be signed in order to get a loan done."

When Lake asked Carroll whether there was a distinction to be made if the signatures were made electronically, Carroll responded that although it could be a civil or regulatory matter, "It's not a crime."

Carroll declined to make an opening argument. As he did in the first case, Lay was expected to take the witness stand in his own defense.

Each of the four counts of bank fraud and false statements to banks carry prison terms of as many as 30 years and a fine of $1 million. Those penalties are in addition to the decades in prison Lay could face if convicted in the fraud and conspiracy trial.

In the first case, Lay is charged with six counts of conspiracy and fraud, and Skilling with 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading linked to Enron's 2001 collapse.

Lay and Skilling have denied any wrongdoing at the company.

Enron Jurors End 1st Day Of Deliberations (AP)

AP, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON (AP) -- Jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling finished their first full day of deliberations Thursday in the premiere case to emerge from one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history.

The eight-woman, four-man panel received the case Wednesday and had deliberated for about 9 1/2 hours by day's end Thursday. Deliberations will continue Monday.

"It's nerve-racking," Skilling's lead lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said about the wait for a verdict. Skilling's trial was the California civil attorney's first criminal case.

Skilling can wait in his legal team's so-called "war room" in an office building across the street from the federal courthouse in Houston. But Lay went on trial again Thursday on bank fraud charges stemming from his personal banking.

The banking case is being tried without a jury before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, who presided over the pair's conspiracy case as well.

Lake plans to issue his verdict in the banking case, which is expected to last several days, after jurors in the larger conspiracy case render theirs. The jury aims to deliberate Monday through Thursday and take Fridays off, mirroring the conspiracy trial's schedule.

Next door to Lay's bank fraud trial, the first of three retrials of five former Enron broadband-unit executives was winding down in its third week, with closing arguments expected as early as Friday.

In that case, former unit finance chief Kevin Howard and former in-house accountant Michael Krautz are charged with conspiracy, fraud and falsifying records for allegedly using a sham deal to fake earnings in late 2000. Both testified this week that the deal was legitimate.

Last year's three-month trial ended in a hung jury, and the other three ex-executives are to be retried in separate cases later.

Enron, once a Wall Street favorite, landed in bankruptcy protection in December 2001 amid scrutiny of hidden debt and inflated profits. More than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs disappeared in the failure of the company.

In the conspiracy case, Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy. If convicted on all counts, Skilling faces a maximum of 275 years in prison. Lay faces a maximum of 45 years.

The government sought to prove through 25 witnesses that both men repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew accounting trickery and fudged numbers created a glossy illusion of success.

DOJ_NMG_0028929

The defense countered through 29 witnesses, including Lay and Skilling, that neither did anything wrong and no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives who ran lucrative side deals behind their backs. The defendants attributed Enron's collapse to bad publicity and lost market confidence.

Out Sick For The Enron Trial, And Rethinking It (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON, May 18 — It started with what felt like a heart attack.

Just minutes after he had cross-examined Enron's former chief financial officer two months ago, Michael W. Ramsey, the lead lawyer for Kenneth L. Lay, turned to one of Mr. Lay's daughters. "I think I just had a heart attack," he half-jokingly told the daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, looking her in the eye across the defense table.

Mr. Ramsey said he thought the discomfort would subside in an hour. It did not.

Within days Mr. Ramsey was forced into surgery to clear an arterial blockage. For the 66-year-old, who describes himself as a hard-drinking, chain-smoking legal warhorse, it was the beginning of the most challenging personal odyssey of his career and an event that may turn out to play a crucial role in the outcome of Mr. Lay's case.

After further heart complications, Mr. Ramsey missed more than a month of the 56-day trial, including the testimony of Mr. Lay, the former Enron chief executive who had paid Mr. Ramsey $2 million to lead the legal team in his criminal trial.

Despite his belated but powerful return to action on Tuesday, Mr. Ramsey's illness raises questions that probably will never be answered.

Would he have controlled an indignant Mr. Lay on the stand better than George McCall Secrest Jr., the lawyer who ended up questioning Mr. Lay? Should Mr. Lay have sought to delay the trial when his most experienced criminal lawyer was unable to participate?

"This is the major what-if in this case," said Joel M. Androphy, a criminal defense lawyer in Houston. "You can't just replace Ramsey's years of experience in not only defending people but in communicating with jurors."

Mr. Ramsey acknowledged that several lawyers advised him to push Mr. Lay to seek a delay. "Ramsey is the glue that held that defense together," said his good friend, Dick DeGuerin, another prominent Houston defense lawyer. "It was a mistake not to at least ask the judge for a continuance or a mistrial."

Mr. Lay, for his part, said he was "not second-guessing anything." He conceded that his own strained finances contributed to the decision to carry on with the case.

"They were important," Mr. Lay said Wednesday. "But the right decision was to move ahead and to get it done."

Without Mr. Ramsey, Mr. Lay's defense team appeared to drift into disarray. Mr. Ramsey, after all, had been defending the Enron founder since well before he was indicted in 2004. He had been a principal architect of the defense strategy, which he laid out in his opening statement — that Mr. Lay was a victim of government overreaching by prosecutors bent on punishing the top officers for Enron's collapse.

The company was forced into bankruptcy, Mr. Ramsey contended, by a virtual conspiracy of short-sellers and news articles that caused a "classic run on the bank."

Mr. Ramsey's absence mattered in other ways. He had led his team's selection of the jurors with an eye to how they would react to him, not the other lawyers.

"When you take me out of the equation, whoever takes my place may not have that same communication," he said.

And in the end, Mr. Ramsey was not able to help his client when a prosecutor, on cross-examination, confronted Mr. Lay with the provocative statements that Mr. Ramsey had made to reporters outside the courtroom: that short-sellers were "vultures" and Enron's former treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., was a "trained monkey."

Last week, on the last day of testimony, an unsteady, shuffling Mr. Ramsey returned to court against his doctors' advice, after more than a month of surgical procedures and fitful time spent mostly in a hospital bed. Even when he was at the hospital, he said he obsessively followed the trial through daily transcripts, media reports and daily calls to the other defense lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0028930

"Ken Lay is a good friend of mine, somebody I admire," Mr. Ramsey said. "I wanted very much to assist him. I really felt quite helpless in that situation, and helpless is not a condition I like to feel."

Weeks before, after the doctors first made the diagnosis, Mr. Lay had confidently forecast his lawyer's return. "I expect him to return in time to pull out the victory," Mr. Lay told reporters.

And return he did. On Tuesday, Mr. Ramsey anchored a four-lawyer lineup for Mr. Lay, arguing for 12 spirited minutes.

In his characteristic style, part Southern preacher and part angry grandfather, he raised his voice in indignation as he urged the jury to find the courage to reach an "unpopular" verdict of not guilty.

"Reasonable minds disagree on every point at issue in this case," he said in a near-shout. "Every one of them!"

And in a flourish that evoked Patrick Henry's famous revolutionary line, "Give me liberty or give me death!" he added, "When the spear of government starts to touch living flesh, we're proud of our liberty."

Mr. Ramsey lamented the next day that he needed about 50 minutes to really stir the jurors' emotions. But he said he might not have had the stamina — or the credibility with jurors after such a long absence — to argue that long.

Mr. Ramsey's original diagnosis of a blockage in one coronary artery seemed manageable, thanks to advanced treatments that rely on a less-invasive procedure from which patients often return to regular activities in just a few days.

After surgery on Friday, March 24, Mr. Ramsey returned to court the next Monday. But the symptoms soon returned. Further tests revealed a 95 percent blockage in a different artery, which could have led to a stroke, and Mr. Ramsey said he probably was not getting "enough blood to the brain."

His sudden health problems were particularly frustrating because, he said, he had undergone a complete physical and stress test just weeks before the trial began and been given a clean bill of health. He says he eschews drink when a case is on trial. His smoking habit has been harder to tame. "I have smoked three packs of Winstons a day for 50 years," he said.

On Wednesday, about an hour after the Enron case went to the jury, Mr. Ramsey dug into a tenderloin steak at a restaurant near the "war room loft" he rents downtown when he wants to focus on big cases. The doctors, he explained, said that if he would quit smoking they would not fuss at him about what he eats.

In interviews this week, some lawyers raised questions about whether Tuesday's closing argument would be the last hurrah in Mr. Ramsey's 40-year career, one spent exclusively as a criminal defense attorney.

"He has a fabulous talent before a jury," said Jamie Wareham, the global chairman of litigation for Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker. "But would he be the right choice in a lawyer, given his health issues, for an extended trial? He might not be anymore."

Raised in the blue-collar town of Channelview, Tex., outside Houston, Mr. Ramsey rose to prominence defending accused murderers and police officers accused of civil rights violations. After working under the renowned trial lawyer Richard Haynes, who was known as Racehorse, Mr. Ramsey cemented his national reputation in 2003 by helping win the acquittal of a New York real estate heir, Robert A. Durst, after Mr. Durst shot and killed a neighbor, dismembered him and tossed the body parts into Galveston Bay.

While he said he was not considering retirement, Mr. Ramsey said he did plan to slow down. He said he was "seriously thinking about trying a case overseas," possibly at a tribunal in The Hague. "They try cases in a much more civilized fashion over there," he said.

But the timing of his illness — in the midst of what he called the "biggest business case since Teapot Dome" — continues to haunt him. "I will always regret I got sick in the midst of this particular trial," he said. "That is something I will live with the rest of my life."

Who Wins This Case? Lawyers (LAT)

Firms that had once shunned criminal work now see white-collar defense as a potential growth business.

Daniel M. Petrocelli and his Century City law firm probably won't be fully compensated for their work defending Jeffrey K. Skilling, as the former Enron Corp. chief executive appears to have exhausted his defense fund.

But the payoff down the road could be well worth it, even if Skilling is convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0028931

The decision to defend Skilling is seen as a business move by Petrocelli and his firm, O'Melveny & Myers, to burnish their reputation and expertise in white-collar criminal defense.

White-shoe firms like O'Melveny that had once shunned criminal work as distasteful have come to see defending alleged corporate wrongdoers as a potential growth business. Enron's collapse, other corporate scandals and passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law tightening corporate accounting rules have fueled much of this growth.

"Law firms are finding that criminal law practice is lucrative," said Charles Weisselberg of UC Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law.

Said Bryant Garth, dean of Southwestern Law School: "Firms are competing really aggressively to get the bet-the-company or bet-your-career cases."

White-collar defense is one element behind booming revenues at law firm giants. Revenues at the seven top-grossing U.S. law firms last year exceeded $1 billion, according to American Lawyer magazine. New York-based Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom headed the list with a record $1.6 billion. O'Melveny ranked 15th with gross revenue of $808 million.

To sustain that cash flow, top-drawer firms fiercely compete for Fortune 100 clients. That competitive pressure means the decision to take on a corporation or executive in trouble may mean weighing a near-term loss of fees against the possibility of future work from that client or other corporations, legal experts say.

After a 3 1/2 -month trial — on top of years of preparation — Skilling probably has blown through the $23 million he set aside for his defense before the government froze about $55 million of his assets. The former Enron executive, charged with 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading tied to Enron's collapse, acknowledged in trial testimony that he owed quite a bit more — millions, according to a source in his defense camp.

Even with full payment in doubt, O'Melveny has fielded a deep bench in Houston for Skilling's defense. Petrocelli is one of at least four firm attorneys who have been in the courtroom throughout the trial. They have been backed up by a team of attorneys, jury consultants, experts and support staff laboring on the 25th floor of Bank of America Center in downtown Houston.

Their rabbit warren of offices and cubicles is cluttered with carts stacked high with documents. Whiteboards on the walls are covered with notations, many apparently relating to the fall of Enron.

The criminal defense bar has long included stars such as Thomas A. Mesereau Jr. and the late Johnnie L. Cochran Jr., whose Perry Mason-like courtroom style have made them the first call for celebrities in distress. Mesereau successfully defended singer Michael Jackson in his latest child molestation case, and Cochran became an international celebrity for gaining the acquittal of former football star O.J. Simpson on murder charges.

Until he took on Skilling's defense, Petrocelli did not have much criminal case experience. But he is hardly a stranger to the legal spotlight. His take-no-prisoners courtroom style helped him win a $33.5-million verdict for the family of murder victim Ron Goldman in a wrongful-death suit against Simpson, and last year he prevailed in a decade-long legal battle on behalf of Walt Disney Co. over the merchandising rights to Winnie the Pooh.

Petrocelli, 52, declined to comment for this article, and representatives of O'Melveny declined to discuss the Skilling case.

However, Seth Aronson, managing partner of O'Melveny's Los Angeles office, boasted of the firm's strong roster of former prosecutors. He noted its successful defense of Wen Ho Lee, a Los Alamos National Laboratory scientist accused of stealing nuclear secrets for China in 1999, along with other corporate defendants.

O'Melveny began building its white-collar criminal expertise several years ago, Aronson said, because "clients are facing more shareholder-driven investigations and criminal investigations." That practice continues to "grow significantly year after year," he said.

Other corporate firms are going after this business as well. Brian McCarthy, a partner with Skadden Arps in Los Angeles, said many firms took notice when in 1984 Six Flags Inc. and two of its executives were charged with manslaughter after a fire at its New Jersey theme park. The company was later acquitted of the charges, and charges against the executives were dismissed.

"That case opened people's eyes that there was a need for that practice," McCarthy said.

Enron and other high-profile corporate scandals convinced law firms that such work was here to stay, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0028932

According to UC Berkeley's Weisselberg, firms realize that "what begins as an in-house investigation by a corporation or a civil investigation by a regulatory agency might turn into a criminal investigation." Lawyers, particularly former prosecutors, can sometimes keep a small inquiry from mushrooming into an indictment, he said.

For an individual lawyer such as Petrocelli, however, fame is undoubtedly part of the appeal of these cases.

Skilling's trial is "a kind of historical event," observed William Henderson, an Indiana University law professor who studies large firms.

"If you've already made a living," he said, "why not be in the history books?"

Enron Arrogance On Trial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

JURORS FINALLY BEGAN DELIBERATIONS Wednesday in the nation's latest trial of the century, the criminal case against former Enron executives Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay. Although charged with multiple counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading related to the energy company's 2001 collapse, the ex-CEOs were really on trial for arrogance — "extraordinary arrogance," as one prosecutor called it in her closing argument.

Of course, arrogance is not technically a crime, or else half the CEOs in the country (and more than a few of their underlings) would be on trial. But in complicated cases like Enron's, it's what prosecutors often focus on and what that jury may be considering now.

The Enron case has become more than the sum of its criminal-act parts. Because Enron flamed out in such a spectacular way — it was the largest corporate bankruptcy ever when it folded, wiping out about 4,500 jobs and $70 billion of investors' money — it became the poster child for fin de siecle business abuse; its leaders, the faces of corporate greed and dishonesty.

It's hardly surprising that trial watchers have come to treat the long-awaited verdict as a proxy for the cause of business reform writ large. If Skilling and Lay go down with the ship, the thinking goes, it proves that the government really is looking out for the little guy. If the two men walk, big business has fleeced America once again.

But corporate reform's ultimate success doesn't depend on whether Skilling and Lay spend the next 20 years wearing orange jumpsuits. The legacy of Enron-inspired laws like Sarbanes-Oxley is far more important. Given their symbolic importance, however, one might have expected Enron's former executives to attempt to disprove to the jury the prevailing public view that they are, well, extraordinarily arrogant.

Skilling was at times prickly on the stand. The usually affable Lay, expected to perform more smoothly, tried to contact fellow witnesses inappropriately and snarled at his own attorney. Both men insisted doggedly that they were innocent, victims of short-selling investors and meddling reporters. The government? On a witch hunt. The many colleagues who pleaded guilty, expressed remorse and testified against them? Dupes or opportunists.

Now the fates of Skilling and Lay are in the hands of 12 fatigued jurors in Houston. Their charge is to consider only the evidence in the 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading against Skilling and the six counts of fraud and conspiracy against Lay. But it's unlikely that they will forget all that they have seen and heard in the last 15 weeks. Nor will the rest of us.

What Fraud? All Was Fine At Enron (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

New York Times, May 19, 2006

IT was not much of a defense. But I was very young and had little time to decide what to say.

I had violated the rules by sneaking ice cream from the freezer. The carton had slipped and split open on the floor, making a mess and a noise that my mother investigated.

"What happened?" she asked.

"Nothing," I replied.

She did not believe me.

DOJ_NMG_0028933

That long-forgotten incident came back to me as I read the closing arguments in the Enron trial of the two former chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, which went to a federal court jury in Houston this week.

"Enron was a good company," said Daniel M. Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lawyer. "There was no fraud there. There was no conspiracy."

In the previous trials of chief executives whose companies imploded in fraud, the defense has always been one of ignorance, that underlings pulled it off behind the boss's back. It is an embarrassing defense, given that it implies the boss got millions for doing a very bad job, but sometimes it has worked.

Instead, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling went for the "nothing happened" defense, holding that there was nothing really wrong until Enron folded because of a loss of confidence. "When did bankruptcy become a crime?" was the indignant question asked by Bruce W. Collins, a lawyer for Mr. Lay. "The company failed," he said, but "not because of fraud."

That is, in a way, accurate. The fraud hid the losses that stemmed from bad business decisions. The company failed when the fraud was found and the reality exposed.

That is what makes this defense so audacious. By claiming there was nothing really wrong at Enron, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling seek to preserve both their freedom and their reputations. If the company failed just because of overheated news accounts, then it is those horrible journalists (and their short-seller friends) who deserve the blame.

The witnesses against them were forced to lie, in the defense version, by unscrupulous prosecutors determined to get convictions. Most of those witnesses initially protested their innocence, before making plea deals and going to prison. It was the denials the defense found credible.

But there was some truth to the defense claims that the prosecution was upset about things that other companies also did.

After reviewing evidence that Mr. Lay misled investors about the company's condition, moving one money-loser to a different division where it might not be noticed, Kathryn H. Ruemmler, a prosecutor, explained why that was bad:

"The point is that this is all just smoke and mirrors," she said. "They can make the numbers say whatever they want to say. If they're going to miss, they have an excuse. If they have losses, they'll hide them. That's what Mr. Lay did here."

Mr. Lay was far from the only chief executive who made the numbers sing back then, nor was Enron the only company willing to change reserves after a quarter ended in order to make its numbers. "Why are they trying to criminalize this?" asked Mr. Petrocelli. "We might as well put every C.E.O. in jail."

Enron was different because the lying was so extreme. Many companies before it had been caught fudging profits, but when the truth was told about them there was still a functioning business. Employees kept their jobs. Creditors were paid.

Enron's lies made a company that was hemorrhaging cash look healthy. Some of the accounting maneuvers were legal; others were not. But the reality was very different from what was presented.

Something did happen, and it was shocking. That will be true whether or not the jury convicts the men who made Enron infamous.

Milberg Indicted On Charges Firm Paid Kickbacks (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke, Nathan Koppel, And Peter Sanders

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

A federal grand jury indicted the nation's best-known class-action law firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, alleging a 20-year conspiracy to funnel kickbacks to plaintiffs in dozens of securities class-action cases.

The indictment, made public in Los Angeles yesterday, could prove fatal to the pioneering plaintiffs firm, long a scourge of big business and a controversial champion of shareholders. In the 40 years since its founding, New York-based Milberg has filed hundreds of securities suits and won billions of dollars for investors, enriching its partners in the process.

The 102-page indictment details cases, reaching back more than two decades, in which partners in the firm allegedly conspired to pay clients who agreed to act as lead plaintiffs. This would give Milberg an edge in the scramble to be named lead law firm in a case by providing the firm with a "ready stable" of plaintiffs, the grand jury alleged.

The firm paid more than $11 million in kickbacks, the indictment charges, often going to great lengths to disguise the payments as referral fees or other legitimate payments. With the exception of expenses and incidentals, it is illegal for the lead plaintiff in a class action to be paid more than other members of a class.

"This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system," said Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles. "Class-action attorneys and plaintiffs occupy positions of trust in which they assume responsibility to tell the truth....This indictment alleges a wholesale violation of this responsibility." Officials said the investigation was continuing and that more indictments could be expected.

Melvyn Weiss, Milberg's co-founder, said in a statement that the firm and its employees are "outraged" at the indictment. "Our firm is the champion of consumers and investors. We provide access to the courts so that the victims of corrupt corporations can achieve justice." He added that over the years, the firm has recovered more than $45 billion for these victims. "We will vigorously defend ourselves and our partners against these charges, and we will be vindicated," he said.

The charges include conspiracy, racketeering, mail fraud, money laundering and filing false tax returns. Mr. Weiss is not named as a defendant. Two of the firm's partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, were indicted for allegedly having been directly involved in making secret payments to plaintiffs in dozens of securities class actions filed by Milberg between at least 1991 and 2005. Both men left the firm last week and are expected to oppose the charges in court.

Prosecutors asserted in court filings that Mr. Bershad used cash from a safe in a credenza in his office to pay kickbacks to plaintiffs. Access to the safe "was strictly limited," according to the indictment. Andrew Lawler, Mr. Bershad's attorney, said his client "categorically denies the allegations" and "intends to vigorously fight the charges."

The indictment also offers a glimpse of the huge payouts Milberg partners have enjoyed. Mr. Bershad owns 17% of the firm and his share of its profits from 1983 to 2005 was more than $160 million, the grand jury found. Mr. Schulman's stake was 15% and his profits from 1991 to 2005 were $67 million, according to the indictment.

The indictment came after the collapse of discussions between the firm and the government about a deferred-prosecution agreement that would have avoided criminal charges. Lawyers close to the case said the terms included a court-appointed monitor, an admission of responsibility and a fine of about $40 million. But the government and the firm were unable to agree on the government's demand of a waiver of attorney-client privilege and access to privileged internal records, the lawyers said.

'Impossible Concessions'

In a prepared statement, Milberg asserted that prosecutors "insisted that the firm make unfounded statements accusing its own partners of crimes and otherwise become an agent for the government." It added: "Unfortunately, the prosecutors insisted on indicting the firm unless it made these impossible concessions."

The indictment marks the first time since the indictment and collapse of accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP in 2002 that the Justice Department has charged a major firm or company with a crime because of the alleged misconduct of individual partners or executives. The Andersen prosecution was heavily criticized, and the Supreme Court overruled the conviction. Thousands of people lost their jobs with the firm's collapse.

The Milberg indictment is expected to bring new scrutiny of the government's tactics in its crackdown on corporate crime, including the increasingly common demand that companies under investigation waive attorney-client privilege and cut off legal-defense funds for partners or executives who have been accused -- not convicted -- of a crime. Rising concern over these tactics has attracted some unlikely conservative allies to Milberg, long a big contributor to the Democratic Party.

Theodore B. Olson, former Bush administration solicitor general and a leading conservative voice, said the message in many corporate-crime investigations is now unmistakable: "Raise the white flag or face capital punishment." Mr. Olson, while not commenting specifically on the Milberg case, said the risk of indicting a business is that "a firm can be effectively destroyed by an indictment, even if it is later found to be not guilty."

The Milberg investigation has been closely watched in corporate boardrooms. Lisa Rickard, a lawyer with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said yesterday that "plaintiff shopping and kickback schemes have been a persistent problem among some trial lawyers. Fraud and abuse in soliciting plaintiffs has been pervasive in securities, asbestos, silica, and pharmaceutical litigation."

Milberg is expected to argue that the firm's hundreds of employees and thousands of clients shouldn't be penalized for the alleged misconduct of individual partners. It has expanded its legal team as it girds for battle, adding lawyers and consultants including conservative legal scholar Viet Dinh, a former top Justice Department official who served as the Bush administration's voice on legal policy, and Mark Corallo, a former military officer who was a spokesman for the Justice Department until last year.

Within minutes of yesterday's indictment, Milberg launched a Web site, www.milbergweissjustice.com1, where it defends itself against the charges and provides links to news articles that it says highlight the "politicization of the Justice Department." In Los Angeles, U.S. officials said the case was "absolutely not" influenced by politics.
